ligation of the treaty? Is an extent of territorial limit all that is required? In contracting to create a State, you promised to promote its population. In stipulating that it should become one of a confederacy of free republics, you promised the means of making that population worthy of the name, and capable of exercising the duties of freemen; you promised them the means of moral, religious, and scientific education; you promised such a disposition of the lands as would fill the space assigned to the new member of the Union with independent freeholders, the product of whose labors, after supporting themselves in comfort, would contribute to the necessary expenses of the local Government, and increase, by their consumption, the revenues of yours. Unless you did this, you did nothing. Your assignment of boundaries, your statutory provisions, would have been a mockery, if we had not, by almost miraculous exertions, broke the shackles imposed on our progress, and supplied by the energy of our scanty population, the want of numbers which your laws denied us. You forgot that population, as well as soil, was necessary. You forgot the lesson taught by a Greek, and elegantly paraphrased by a British poet—

“What constitutes a State?
Not high raised battlement, nor labored mound,
Thick wall, nor meated gate,
Not cities fair, with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride!
Not star’d and spangled courts,
Where low-bowed baseness wafts perfume to pride!
No! men! high-minded men!
Men who their duties know;
But know their rights, and knowing dare maintain,
Prevent the long aimed blow,
And crush the tyrant when they burst the chain—
These constitute a State.”

These your policy would have refused; but these Heaven had provided, by inspiring the little band which our sparse population could afford, and their few associates, with the energy, patriotism, and self-devotion, which the moment of danger required. Think you, sir, that, if my constituents, instead of the noble-minded men who flew to the standard of the country the moment its soil was invaded; who heroically and successfully contended against odds in discipline and numbers, and braved dangers, before which even high courage might quail; who can boast of having gained the honor of that resolution on your statute book, which records, in terms to which they and their posterity may look with pride, that “the brave Louisianians are entitled to the thanks, and deserve well of the whole people, of the United States”—an honor to which, as yet, no other State has attained; if, instead of the enlightened people who gave the first example to their sister States, of providing a written code of laws, and will be the last to give them an example of dishonor, or want of attachment to the Union; if, instead of these, they had been the degraded vassals of arbitrary power, hugging, rather than bursting their chains, incapable of appreciating the advantages of liberty and self-government, such as their calumniators in and out of Congress represented them to be: I ask, sir, whether all the laws you could have passed would have enabled them to assume their place in the Union, unless those laws, by rendering the acquisition of lands easy, should have supplied us with a race of independent, well-informed cultivators of the soil, the bone and sinew of every State?

You have left us, for this, to our own resources: you have done worse; by denying the power of trying our titles, you have deprived us of those to which we are legally entitled, independently of your laws; and you have for twenty-five years forced the proprietors of grants to contribute to the support of the State Government, according to the value of their lands, while you, by unfounded claims, prevent them making any use of them.

In these, as in the case with most unjust measures, the interest of those who adopt them has been most materially injured. If our titles had been confirmed; if the lands had been surveyed and disposed of at low prices to actual settlers; if large allowances had been made out of them for public education and other useful institutions; if, while the lands remained unsold, the Government had subjected itself to the duties required of other land holders, it is no extravagant calculation to say that the State would have, at this day, contained a million of inhabitants, producing from the soil an excess above their own consumption of forty millions of dollars, and, if there be any truth in the calculations of political economy, paying annually, by the duties on their consumption, according to the present rates, more than ten times as much as the aggregate sales of all your lands have produced in any one year.

As I said, sir, I confine my remarks to my own State, and I consider the policy pursued with respect to the lands it contains, as unjust, narrow, unwise, and in the highest degree injurious to the Union. If, twenty years ago, the land had been parcelled out to actual settlers, according to the policy pursued by the French and Spanish possessors of the province, without exacting any consideration, I have not the slightest doubt, that, in a mere pecuniary point of view, it would have been the wisest measure; and that, through your custom house, you would, as long as you chose to continue your duties, receive more dollars and cents twenty fold, than you will annually receive in the comparatively few years that your lands in the State will be on sale. It is because I think it not too late to change this policy that I have seized this occasion to expose it. Confirm all our just titles, submit those of which you doubt to the Judiciary, endow all our public institutions liberally: Remember that you deprive us of laying taxes for this purpose by condemning to sterility six-sevenths of the land in the State. Supply this defect, rescue your own lands, and those of our citizens which adjoin your's, from the destructive effects of inundation, and connect us by canals and roads with the rest of the Union. Give, if you cannot sell, your lands to settlers who will become consumers, and add to your revenue; who will be hardy and independent, and add to your strength; and who will form an iron frontier on your Southern and Western boundary, that will set invasion at defiance.

In asserting the rights of my constituents, I address my just complaints to the Representatives of the people and the States. I trace our injuries to no section of country, to no party, to no particular men. I can make proper allowance for opinions that may have actuated all who advocated the different measures of which we complain, without imputing them to a marked and improper hostility. Constitutional objections were entertained to our admission—they are removed. Doubts existed of our attachment to the Union, of our courage to defend it; they have been triumphantly destroyed. Our ability for self government was made a question, but our legislation has long since solved it. Now, therefore, we look for justice, and I trust, sir, that we shall not look in vain.

Having finished what I thought myself obliged to say on the policy pursued with respect to the State, I have tried to find some chain by which this subject might be connected with another, to which frequent allusions have been made—the existence of present, and the history of past, parties in our Legislature. This I have found it difficult to do, unless from the consideration that, in popular governments, party connects itself with every thing: nothing too high, or too low, too grave or too trivial—from a construction of the constitution to the merits of an actor; from the election of a President to that of a constable. It is not surprising, therefore, that party views may at times have mixed themselves with the measures pursued by the General Government towards the Western States. But I cannot willingly bring myself to believe that there is a party permanently, and on principle, hostile to the prosperity of those States. Allusions have been made to those which formerly divided us, and which are still, under other names, supposed to exist. It may be useful to examine their nature, and refer to their history. It is quite obvious, that parties must exist in all popular governments, and not less so, that they are, when not carried to excess, useful, and even necessary; but we must carefully observe their different kinds. The first and most important is, that which divides the supporters of general tenets on the construction of the powers of Government, or of any of its branches, from the opposers of those tenets. These being, from their nature, permanent, and occurring in almost every operation of the Government, form, until their doctrines are fully established, or finally given up, a marked line of division between all who take any part in public affairs. There can be in the nature of things no neutrals; every man who has any opinion, or even acts on those of others, must be united with one or the other of these parties; and when they are thus arrayed, great sacrifices of individual opinion must be made in matters of minor importance, in order to secure strength in those which regard the great question. Hence we find, that, whenever the country is divided by a permanent party of this kind, it brings within its vortex every measure of Government, and that useful laws are opposed by the one party, and injurious measures favored by the other, from the effect that the one or the other will have in gaining proselytes, or preserving friends.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

When this great party division ceases to exist, it is generally replaced by such as are formed for the elevation or depression of particular men, or the support or opposition to particular measures. These last having no permanent principle to rest upon, continually change with the men, and the operations which they purport to favor or oppose. A vigilant opposition is, in both of these descriptions of party, extremely useful; in the one, to preserve the organization of Government inviolate; in the other, to secure integrity in its operations.

The establishment of our present happy constitution, (happy unless corrupted by false constructions or torn by mad and ruinous resistance) was preceded by the contest of two parties, whose names (no common occurrence) designated their principles and the object for which they respectively contended. It was general, and founded on principle; the one contending for a radical change in the confederation of the States—these were designated as federalists; the other, opposed to this change, who were styled anti-federalists. When the States had agreed to the constitution, this party became extinct; the object on the one side having been completely established, and the opposition on the other generally abandoned. Coeval with the operations of the new Government, arose a new party of the same general permanent kind, because it was founded on a contrariety of opinion on the powers of the new Government. Among those who had most zealously promoted its adoption, were men of high talents, who strove in its formation to give it a character of greater energy, and increase its power at the expense of those of the States. Being obliged to yield many of their ideas to those of others, who thought it too energetic as it was, they compromised with their opponents, and agreed to the constitution as it is, or, rather, as it was before the amendments. It was natural that men entertaining those ideas should put every construction on the words of the compact that would bring it nearer to what they thought the point of perfection. Men of equal eminence and abilities had co-operated as indefatigably in procuring the adoption, but from a conviction that the powers given to the Federal Government, strictly construed, were sufficient for all national purposes; that any extension of them would be injurious, if not ruinous; and that no construction or direct change should be permitted that would lessen the power or influence of the State Governments. These last description of federalists were naturally joined by the individuals who had formed the extinct party of anti-federalists; and, together, under the name of the republican party, they watched the movements, and opposed the suspicious measures, of those whom I have first designated, and who retained the name of federalists.

The first and most dangerous principle, not always avowed by the federal party, but generally acted upon, was this: that, under the construction of the words in the preamble, declaring that the intent of the constitution was to promote the general welfare, and the use of the same phrase in the clause giving the power to lay taxes, a right to do any thing which promoted the general welfare of the United States, unless expressly inhibited, was included. The direct operation of this interpretation in consolidating the General Government, and annihilating the power of the States, was evident, and the avowal of it alarming. Besides this, there were many incidents which, to minds already excited by more important opinions and events, created suspicions of a design to change the forms, as well as the substance, of the new Government; and which, although by one party considered "trifles light as air," were by the other thought to be "confirmation strong as proofs from holy writ." The President having opened the session by a speech to both Houses, as was then, and for twelve years continued to be, the mode, one of the first subjects of deliberation in the Senate was the style by which he should be addressed in their answer. A committee was appointed to consider this subject, and they reported that the President should be styled, His Highness. The democratic branch, however, insisted on calling him simply what the people had made him—the President of the United States; and the Senate, yielding to the necessity of the moment, came to the following resolution:

"In Senate of the United States, May 14, 1789.

"The committee, appointed the 9th instant, to consider and report under what title it will be proper for the Senate to address the President of the United States of America," reported, that, in the opinion of the committee, it will be proper thus to address the President: His Highness the President of the United States of America and Protector of their Liberties.

"Which report was postponed, and the following resolve was agreed to, to wit:

"From a decent respect for the opinion and practice of civilized nations, whether under monarchical or republican forms of government, whose custom is to annex titles of respectability to the office of their Chief Magistrates; and that, on intercourse with foreign nations, a due respect for the majesty of the people of the United States may not be hazarded by an appearance of singularity, the Senate have been induced to be of opinion, that it would be proper to annex a respectable title to the office of the President of the United States; but the Senate, desirous of preserving harmony with the House of Representatives, where the practice lately observed in presenting an address to the President was without the addition of titles, think it proper, for the present, to act in conformity with the practice of that House. Therefore,

"Resolved, That the present address be 'To the President of the United States,' without addition of title.

"A motion was made to strike out the preamble as far as the words 'but the Senate,' which passed in the negative; and, on motion for the main question, it passed in the affirmative."

By which you will perceive that, as the resolution has never been further acted upon, we may, to-morrow, confirm the report of the committee, and decorate our President with the princely title of Highness, and the ominous appellation of Protector. One other incident which I remember took place in the gay world of which my youth then made me a denizen. The citizens of New York, among other marks of hospitality, and desire to show a proper attention to the Great Man, who had just reluctantly given up his retirement at the unanimous voice of his fellow-citizens, gave a grand inauguration ball; on the ceremonial of which it was said one, at least, of those who afterwards composed his cabinet, was consulted. But though he came from the Eastward, I do not mean to say that this was an Eastern measure. In a conspicuous part of the large ball room was erected a superb canopy, and under the canopy was placed what the ill-natured democrats called a throne. [Whether it was or not, never having had the honor to see one, I cannot tell.] Napoleon said, a throne is a block of wood covered with velvet. This was a small sofa or large chair, covered with some costly material, and on it they induced the President to sit; and when the music sounded for the dance, every couple, before they took their station in the long column of the country dances, then in fashion, were directed to go up and make a low obeisance, to the great annoyance of the President, who is said, when he quitted the seat, (in which he had thus reluctantly and by surprise been placed) thus to have addressed the contrivers of the ceremonial, with some warmth: "You have made a fool of me once, but I will take care you never do it again." Such fooleries, sir, are hardly worth relating, but they are characteristic of the views of parties; at least they were thought so then. Hæ nugas, said the democrats, (or such of them as understood Latin) seria ducent; and many of the more apprehensive thought they saw royalty typified in these signs of the times. These imaginary fears soon gave way; but others of greater reality succeeded them. Circumstances of historical notoriety influenced the minds of both parties with foreign predilections and animosities; and the federal party, which had constantly been predominant in Congress, sealed their construction of the powers of the General Government by the passage of the alien law and the sedition law. Nothing could exceed the indignation which these practical applications of the federal doctrine excited in the minds of their opponents. An attack on the liberty of the press, not only unauthorized but forbidden by the constitution by the one act, the arbitrary power vested in the President by the other, opened the eyes of the people to the principles of the party by which they were passed, and, at the very next election, they were deprived of a power they had so grossly abused. Having mentioned the alien law, let me stop to perform an act of justice to deceased worth. In the first stages of that bill, for it was hurried through the House, I was absent from the seat with which I was then honored in the House of Representatives. I returned on the day set for its third reading. Before I went to the House, I met with a Senator from Virginia,* who, notwithstanding the disparity of our years, honored me with his friendship, sometimes instructed me by his advice, and always stimulated me by his example. The conversation naturally turned on the measure depending before the House; and he detailed to me its provisions, spoke with his usual animation of its unconstitutional features, and inspired me with his own indignation against its attack on the liberty of the nation. Warmed with this conversation, I went to the House and made a speech in opposition to the bill, which was at the time spoken of with applause, and sometimes attracts attention even now, but whatever of merit it had, was owing to the circumstances I have related; and I might have addressed him who urged me to declare my sentiments on the occasion, in the words of the poet to his muse—

"Quod spiro et placeo (si placeo) uim est."

The country has since been deprived of the services of that Senator, but she has the consolation to know that the mantle of his patriotism, talents, and virtues, has fallen on his son and successor in this body.

I have given you, sir, so much of the history and state of parties as was necessary for the understanding of the refutation I must make of a charge brought against me, and those with whom it was my happiness to associate, and will always be my pride to have acted, in those times. I repeat the charge verbatim, from the printed speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] Speaking of the merits of New England, which I, at least, never attempted to lessen, he says, he "will not rake into the rubbish of by-gone times to blot the escutcheon of any State, any party, or any part of the country;" yet, sir, in the same page, he endeavors to fix a blot of the blackest ingratitude on a party, on men (I do not speak, sir, of myself) who have rendered most important services to the country; to one of whom it has given the highest mark of its confidence and esteem, and all of whom were, in the transaction alluded to, much more sinned against than sinning. The honorable gentleman goes on to say: "General Washington's administration was steadily and zealously maintained, as we all know, by New England. It was violently opposed elsewhere. We know in what quarter he had most earnest, constant, and persevering support, in all his great and leading measures. We know where his private and personal character was held in the highest degree of attachment and veneration; and we know too where his measures were opposed, his services slighted, and his character vilified. We know, or we might know, if we turn to the Journals, who expressed respect, gratitude, and regret, when he retired from the Chief Magistracy; and who refused to express respect, gratitude, or regret: I shall not open these Journals."

Sir, the honorable gentleman would have done well to open the Journals, or not to have referred to them. If he had opened them, he would have found the name of the individual who addresses you arrayed with those of men more worthy of note, in the vote to which he alludes. If he had opened the debates which led to that vote, as I think he ought to have done, he would have seen how utterly void of foundation is the charge he has brought. I do not think the gentleman intended any personal allusion to me—the terms of civility on which we are, forbid it—the consciousness of having said nothing to provoke the attack forbids it—but, sir, the individual who cannot arrogate to himself sufficient importance to justify the supposition that he was the object intended, was, at that time, the Representative, the sole Representative, of the first commercial city in the Union. That individual is now one of the members of this body, representing a sovereign State. He owes it, therefore, to those who have offered him these marks of their confidence, to show that they were not unworthily bestowed; he owes it to himself to disprove the reflection which the allegation casts on his character. Suffer me, also, [said Mr. L.] to remark, that this very charge was used during the late election; and that the refutation I am about to give was so widely diffused that it is somewhat singular it should never have come to the Senator's knowledge, or that he should have forgotten it if it had. Yet one or the other must have been the case, or he would not now have repeated the tale, nor, by incorporating it in his eloquent harangue, have given new currency to a refuted calumny which had long before been nailed to the counter. Since the honorable gentleman believes the story to be true, and surely he would not otherwise repeat it, hundreds of others must give it the like credit; and it increases the obligation I am under to explain all the circumstances attending it.

I have shown, sir, what were the doctrines and measures of the federal party at that time. During the whole of the Presidency of Washington they were predominant in both Houses; and as Washington was the head of the Government, one of their greatest objects was, to cover all their proceedings with the popularity of his name; to represent all opposition to their measures, as personal hostility to him; and to force the republican party either to approve all their measures, or, by opposing them, to incur the odium of being unfriendly to the Father of his Country. In this they were for the most part defeated. The universal confidence reposed in the high character of Washington, the gratitude felt for his services, the veneration for his name, had practically produced the effect, in our Government, which a constitutional maxim has in that of England. He could not, it was believed, do wrong—most certainly he never meant wrong—most certainly his ardent wishes were for the happiness of the country he had conducted through so many perils, and the preservation of that form of Government which had been adopted under his auspices—yet measures were adopted, during his Presidency, which a very large proportion of the country thought injurious to their interests, and, on one occasion, a majority of their Representatives deemed them to be an infringement on their privileges. None of these were ascribed to the President: a practice which he introduced, enabled us to ascribe to his administration (to which in truth they belonged) all the measures of which we disapproved. The practice alluded to, was that of assembling the Heads of Department in a cabinet council, and being guided, as was generally understood, by the opinion of a majority in all important concerns. Hence the official acts of the President came to be considered as those of his cabinet, and were, in common parlance, called the acts of the administration; and they were opposed, when it was deemed necessary, and canvassed, and freely spoken of in debate, without any hostility being felt, or supposed to be felt, towards the President. Indeed, several of those most prominent in opposition to the acts of the administration, were men for whom Washington had the highest esteem, and who were among those who most admired and revered him.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

Of the acts to which the republican party were opposed, it may be necessary to specify some, in order to show that the opposition was not a frivolous or a personal one.

The Chief Justice of the United States was sent as a minister plenipotentiary to England, while he held his judicial office, which he retained until after his return. Thus, in our opinion, blending the Executive and the Judicial Departments, directed by the constitution to be separated, and setting an example which might create an undue influence on the bench, in favor of the Executive.

This minister negotiated a treaty, which contained stipulations requiring the agency of the House of Representatives, in the exercise of their constitutional powers over the subject of them, to carry into effect. To enable them discreetly to exercise these powers, the House respectfully requested the communication of such papers, in relation to the treaty, as could, without injury to our foreign relations, be made public. This request the President was advised to refuse; and the refusal was grounded on a denial of the constitutional right of the House to exercise any discretion in carrying the treaty into effect. On this refusal the House of Representatives passed a resolution declaratory of the right which the President had denied. I will not trouble the Senate with adverting to any other measures which I, and those who acted with me, opposed. We opposed them, sir, without, in any instance, forgetting the sentiments of respect, gratitude, and high admiration, which were due to the name and character of Washington. We believe that it would have been a dereliction of duty to give up the independent expression of that opinion, because it was contrary to measures falsely ascribed to a name they revered; and conscious of the weight of that name, I may, without vanity, say, there was some degree of merit in stemming the tide of popularity that was attached to it.

The mission of Mr. Jay took place after the second election of General Washington, and the discussions on the treaty in the first session of the fourth Congress, the seventh year of his Presidency. In his speech on the opening of the second session of the same Congress, (I repeat, sir, what I formerly wrote on this occasion) he alluded in affecting terms to his approaching retirement from office. I can solemnly say, for myself, that, on this occasion, so far from any ill feeling towards the President, none among those who arrogated to themselves the title of his exclusive friends, could feel more sincerely, or were more disposed to express, every sentiment of gratitude for his services, admiration for his character, or wishes for his happiness, than I was. These were ideas that had grown up with me from childhood. I had never heard the name of Washington pronounced but with veneration by those near relatives who were engaged with him in the same perilous struggle. Independence, liberty, and victory, were associated with it in my mind; and the awful admiration which I felt, when, yet a boy, I was first admitted to his presence, yielded only to the more rational sentiments of gratitude and national pride, when, at a maturer age, I could appreciate his services, and estimate the honor his virtues and character had conferred on the nation. I had seen him in the hour of peril, when the contest was doubtful, and when his life and reputation, as well as the liberties of the country, depended on the issue. I had seen him in the moment of triumph, when the surrender of a hostile army had secured that independence. My admiration followed him in his first retreat, and was not lessened by his quitting it to give the aid of his name and influence to the union of the States under an efficient Government. In addition to this, he had received me with kindness in my youthful visits to his camp; and, without having it in my power to boast of any particular intimacy, circumstances had thrown me frequently in the way of receiving from him such attentions as indicated some degree of regard. With these motives for joining in the most energetic expressions of gratitude, with a heart filled with sentiments of veneration, and desirous of recording them, my concern can scarcely be expressed, when I found that I must be debarred from joining my voice with those of my fellow-citizens in expressing those feelings, unless, in the same breath, I should pronounce a recantation of principles which I then thought, and still think, were well founded, and declare that I approved measures which I had just solemnly declared I thought injurious to the country.

Thus, Sir, it was contrived: At that period, the President opened the session by a speech, (the more convenient mode of sending a message having been introduced five years afterwards by Mr. Jefferson) and the House made an answer, which they presented in a body. The answer on this occasion was most artfully and most ably drawn. It was the work of a federal committee, and was supported by a federal majority. It contained, as it ought to have contained, every expression that gratitude, veneration, and affectionate regret, could suggest; and to the adoption of these there would not have been a dissenting voice; it would have been carried, not only unanimously, but by acclamation. But the dominant party had other views; it was to be made the instrument of degrading their opponents, if they could vote for it, or of holding them up to all posterity as opposers of the Savior of his country if they refused to pronounce their own condemnation. They preferred a paltry party triumph to the glory of the man they professed to honor, and deprived him of the expression of an unanimous vote, that they might have some pretence to stigmatize their opponents with ingratitude. The press, sir, the omnipotent press, and the publicity of our debates, have enabled me, even at this distant day, to defeat this unworthy end—unworthy of the honorable men who contrived and executed it, and which nothing but the excitement of party could have suggested to them.

SENATE.]

Mr. Foote's Resolution.

[MARCH 15, 1830.]

To understand this fully, sir, I should read to you the whole of the address. Its general character I have stated. But I will confine myself to one or two passages, which show what was endeavored to be forced upon us, and the amendment offered will show what we were willing to say, and I will then ask who it was that refused a unanimous expression of gratitude, respect, and merit?

The debates of that period were very concisely taken down; but (in Carpenter's Debates, p. 62) we find enough for our purpose. It is there stated that Mr. Livingston expressed his sorrow "that the answer was not so drawn as to avoid this debate, and his sincere hope that parties would so unite as to make it agreeable to all. He moved some amendments, first, to correct an error in the phraseology, which were adopted; and, in the course of his remarks, used these expressions: 'He hoped, notwithstanding the tenacity of adherence to words, that all might agree in the address; he would be extremely hurt, [he said] could he conceive that we differed in sentiments of gratitude and admiration for that great man; but, while he was desirous to express this, he could not do it at the expense of his feelings and principles. The former he might sacrifice, but the latter he could not, to any man.'"

I invite the particular attention of the Senate to the passage which I proposed to alter. As it stood in the address, it was in these words:

"And while we entertain a grateful conviction that your wise, firm, and patriotic administration has been signally conducive to the success of the present form of Government, we cannot forbear to express the deep sensations of regret with which we contemplate your intended retirement from office."

Now, sir, mark what were the words objected to in this sentence; bear in mind the distinctions that have been drawn between the character of the President, and that of his administration; remember what was the sense in which that word was universally used at that day: recollect, too, what I have just said of the opposition to one of the leading measures of that administration, and you will then be enabled to judge whether I, and those with whom I acted, could give our assent to this passage as it stood. To show, however, that, while we could not, with consistency or truth, say, that the measures of the cabinet were wise and patriotic, but that we were perfectly willing to use these epithets as applied to the President, I moved to strike out the words "wise, firm, and patriotic administration," and insert "your wisdom, firmness, and patriotism." The sentence then would have read thus: "While we entertain a grateful conviction, that your wisdom, firmness, and patriotism, have been signally conducive to the success of the present form of Government, we cannot forbear to express the deep sensations of regret with which we contemplate your intended retirement from office." Now, sir, compare this clause, which we were all ready to vote for, and did vote for, with that which was supported by the majority; and say which of them expresses the greatest veneration for the person, and the personal character of Washington—that which ascribes wisdom, firmness, and patriotism, to the measures of his cabinet, or that which attaches them to himself. Say, whether we refused to express regret at his retirement, when that word, accompanied by an epithet most expressive of its intensity, is readily adopted. Say who were the real friends to the glory of our great leader in war, and director in peace—those who, for a party party triumph, deprived him of an unanimous expression of thanks and admiration; who forced him to appear rather as the chief of a party, than in his true character, of the man uniting all affections, regretted, beloved, venerated by all his fellow-citizens; or those who intreated that, on this occasion at least, party considerations should be laid aside, and that they might be permitted to join their voice to that of their country, and of the world, in expressing the sentiments with which their hearts were filled. Say, finally, sir, whether the Senator from Massachusetts is justified in the allegation, that we refused to express respect, gratitude, and regret, on the retirement of Washington; or, what is more than insinuated, that we slighted his services and vilified his character. Sir, the register I have quoted shows, that I supported my amendment by expressing the very sentiments you have just heard; and I must add, that, shortly after this transaction, while my votes, speeches, and conduct, were fresh in the recollection of my constituents, my term of service expired, and I was re-elected by an increased majority. Would a man, entertaining the sentiments towards Washington that have been ascribed to me, have received the votes of a city where his name was adored? Nay, more sir, one of the most conspicuous of those who have incurred the reproach of the Senator from Massachusetts, and for whose sole use it was perhaps designed—the President of the United States—was not long since elected, by the veteran relics of the Revolutionary war, the chosen companions in arms of their venerated commander, the New York Society of Cincinnati, as one of the very few honorary members on whom that distinction has been bestowed. They have, since that, done me the same honor. Would the venerable remnant of the friends and companions of Washington, associated under his auspices for the purpose of cherishing the friendships contracted during the contest he so gloriously conducted, and watching over his fame, so inseparably connected with their own—would they have conferred this distinction on two men, who had, at any period of their lives, shown themselves his enemies or detractors? Me, sir, they knew from my childhood—my whole life was before them. At the time these votes were given, I was their immediate Representative; many of them were opposed to me in the politics of the day, but they knew my conduct to have been such as I have described, and they did justice to my motives; and most assuredly would not have joined in my unanimous association with their honorable body, had they doubted the purity of either.

In the course of this defensive part of my address to the Senate, I have been obliged to refer, with some minuteness, to the state of parties at a remote period. I have done so with no desire to renew forgotten animosities, or impute injurious designs to the living or the dead. The latter consideration has induced me to stop short of the scenes which occurred in this place, in the first session that was held here; much of what I know, more of what I heard, would have this tendency, if detailed. Designs of the most violent and disorganizing kind were ascribed to some of the federal party, in a letter bearing the signature of one of its distinguished members. This statement was attributed by mistake to another, a no less respectable leading man of the same party, both of them since deceased. It does not enter into my purpose to determine between them. I had a high respect for both, and an intimacy with one, which was never interrupted by our difference in political tenets; in truth, I had, during the whole course of those violent times, the good fortune to preserve the most friendly intercourse with most of my principal political opponents. I thought their political principles dangerous, and they thought my ideas of Government inefficient; but we did justice to the purity of each other's motives, and preserved social harmony amid party discord. It is far, therefore, I repeat, from my intention, to renew heats which are now allayed, by a reference to the olden times of party; but I referred to them because they were necessary to my defence. Because, having left the Atlantic States soon after the triumph of the republican party in 1800, I thought, on my return to public life, after a retirement of more than twenty years—I thought I discovered some of the great dogmas of federalism prevailing in our public councils; and thinking them always dangerous, I felt it a duty to take this occasion to guard against their revival. Engaged during my absence in professional pursuits, and wholly absorbed by them, I had not marked the changes of political parties or events. I knew not even the appellation by which they were distinguished; but in whatever shape the old dangerous federal doctrine of assuming all power under the claim of providing for the general welfare, may have appeared; under whatever colors its partisans may enrol themselves, quocunque nomine gaudet, Federalists, Federal Republican, or National Federalists, I now do, and ever will, hold it a paramount duty to discover and oppose their doctrines. I know that many who belonged to the federal party never did entertain this dangerous opinion: I believe that many who did entertain, have abjured it; I most sincerely hope they all have; and thinking this a favorable occasion to produce a disclaimer of them, I have seized it to submit the propriety of doing so. Should this doctrine be formally abandoned here, one great source of suspicion and ill feeling will be destroyed; and even after that is done, sufficient causes of dissension will remain to satisfy the most zealous lover of party.

These [said Mr. L.] were some of my reasons for speaking of the history of party under our Government. I had another. It was to mark the difference between the necessary, and, if I may so express it, the legitimate parties existing in all free Governments, founded on differences of opinion in fundamental principles, or an attachment to, or dislike of, particular measures and particular men; between these and that spirit of dissension into which they are apt to degenerate, to throw the weight of my experience, and the little my opinions may have, in the scale, and lift up a warning voice against the indulgence of the passions which lead to them, the illusions that irritate, the personal reflections that embitter debate, and the altercations that debase it. The spirit of which I speak originates in the most trifling as well as the most important circumstances. The liberties of a nation, or the color of a cockade, are sufficient to excite it. It creates imaginary, and magnifies real causes of complaint; arrogates to itself every virtue—denies every merit to its opponents; secretly entertains the worst designs, publicly imputes them to its adversaries: poisons national happiness with its dissensions; assails the character of the living with calumny, and, invading the very secrets of the grave with its viperous slanders, destroys the reputation of the dead, harangues in the market place, disputes at the social board, distracts public councils with unprincipled propositions and intrigues, embitters their discussions with invective and re- crimination, and degrades them by personalities and vulgar abuse; seats itself on the bench, clothes itself in the robes of justice, soils the purity of the ermine, and poisons the administration of justice in its source; mounts the pulpit, and, in the name of a God of mercy and peace, preaches discord and vengeance, invokes the worst scourges of Heaven, war, pestilence, and famine, as preferable alternatives to party defeat: Blind, vindictive, cruel, remorseless, unprincipled, and at last frantic, it communicates its madness to friends as well as foes, respects nothing, fears nothing, rushes on the sword, braves the dangers of the ocean, and would not be turned from its mad career by the majesty of Heaven itself, armed with its tremendous thunders.

The Irides iræ of the poet,

Quas neque noxious
Deterret ensis, nec mare naufragum,
Nec sævus ignis, nec tremendo
Jupiter ipse ruens tumultu.

And to which, with an elegance of expression and profundity of thought rarely united, he ascribes the ruin of republics:

Et altis urbis ultima
Stetere caussæ: cur perirent
Funditis, imprimebatque muris
Hostile aratrum exercitus insolens.

Yes, sir, the poet tells us true. These few lines contain a most important lesson. Not long before he wrote them, there existed a confederacy of independent States, united, as ours are, by the same religion, language, manners, and laws. Fair cities, adorned with noble edifices, decorated by the miracles of the imitative arts, governed by wise magistrates, and defended by intrepid warriors—where sages gave lessons of morality and wisdom—poured forth their numerous inhabitants at stated seasons to assist at solemn games, where poets sung, and historians read their instructive pages to admiring crowds; where the young contended for the prize of agility or strength, and the old recounted their former exploits; where the wisdom, and valor, and talent, and beauty, of each State, were the boast and pride of the whole. What followed? Civil dissension breathed its poisonous influence over them, and they met to contend, not for the peaceful prizes of dexterity or genius, but in the deadly strife of civil war. Where are their magnificent temples, their theatres, their statues of gods and heroes? They have vanished: they have been swept with the besom of destruction! The ploughshare of devastation has been driven over their walls, and their mighty ruins remain as monumental warnings to free States, of the danger of falling into the excess of party rage.

From these evils, may Heaven, in its mercy, preserve our beloved country: but, that this prayer may be heard, we must begin by correcting in ourselves every approach of the passions which lead to them. Is there no danger? Have no symptoms appeared to justify a fear that too great an excitement has been already produced by no sufficient cause? I am no censor of the conduct of others: it is sufficient for me to watch over my own. The wisdom of gentlemen must be their guide in the sentiments they entertain, and their discretion in the language in which they utter them. No doubt they think the occasion calls for the warmth they have shown; but of this the people must judge; and, that they may judge with impartiality, let the facts which have drawn forth the invectives we have heard, be fairly submitted to them.

We have heard much of supposed lines of division in this body. "This side of the House" and "the other side," "majority" and "minority," "opposition" and "administration," are as familiarly mentioned as if they were universally understood. Now, sir, I profess my ignorance. In what cause have the Senators of the United States arranged themselves into different bodies, and arrayed themselves under adverse banners? If the dangerous doctrine of undefined and undefinable powers in the General Government be assumed as the watchword; if the dormant—I had thought the extinct—principles of persecuting federalism are to be revived, let it be declared; and I, for one, will not hesitate on which side of the party line I shall be found. As yet, sir, I see no constitutional question of a permanent nature to divide us. We undoubtedly think differently of particular measures, and have our preferences for particular men; these, surely, cannot arrange us into any but temporary divisions, lasting no longer than while the election of the man is pending, or the debate on the measure continues. The election has been long decided. Do gentlemen understand that, because they preferred another candidate, they are to form an opposition to all measures the President recommends, or to all appointments he has made? Do they imagine that those who supported him in his election are, in this House, to form a separate party for the indiscriminate approbation of all he may advise or do? Of their own intentions, gentlemen are the best judges; they must think for themselves, and draw what lines they choose for their own conduct; but, for one, sir, I inform them they cannot do so for me. I shall now, as I have always done, exercise my own judgment, guided by the instruction I receive from debate, on all important measures. I gave to the election of the present Chief Magistrate all the aid which my vote and little influence could give. My own knowledge of facts enabled me to refute many slanders; my intimate acquaintance with his character and services gave some weight to the testimony by which I cleared them from misrepresentation. I thought him entitled to the place, because he possessed talents which eminently qualified him to execute its duties; because he had rendered services such as but one man had ever before rendered to the country; because I had witnessed the energy, courage, prudence, and talent, by which he saved the State I represent from the worst of desolations. These were my inducements for his support during the first election when he was a candidate. The decision of that election, in favor of a man having a fewer number of votes, was calculated to embitter the minds of his friends, and make them hostile to the successful candidate. Yet, sir, during his Presidency, I gave a practical proof of the profession I now make. A measure of great importance was proposed by his administration—I mean the Panama mission—I thought great good might result from it; and, although it was violently opposed by those with whom I had acted in the election, I not only voted for, but supported it by argument. I then thought, and I still think, that its nature and object were both of them misrepresented or misunderstood; and that, if the assembly had taken place as it was first proposed, our envoys attending in a diplomatic, not a representative character, might, by their influence and advice, have prevented many dissensions that have since distracted those republics; might have introduced stipulations favorable to commerce, social intercourse, and the great interests of humanity. My reasons for that vote are published. And the fact, that, although one of the warmest friends of the unsuccessful candidate, and one of those who felt the deepest regret when his opponent was declared to be elected, I yet supported such measures of his administration as I approved, when they were opposed by my political friends, ought to be a sure pledge of my sincerity when I say, that I will support no important measure that I disapprove, merely because it is one of the present administration. I have not, however, the passion avowed by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES] who told us, if I understood him, that he had always been, and always wished to be, in a minority. [Mr. HOLMES explained—He did not say he desired to be in a minority, but that he believed he always would be.] Mr. LIVINGSTON continued: It seems I have not repeated the words used by the Hon. Senator, which I regret; but the sense is the same. If he has always been in the minority it must have been a matter of choice, otherwise, in the ups and downs of his congressional life, in the turns of the political wheel, it must have so happened that, for a short time at least, he must have been uppermost; if so, it struck me as a singular predilection. But there is no disputing about tastes; and the Senator has, at least, one great precedent for his:

Victrix causa diis placuit, sed victa Catoni.

And I am sure he cannot be offended by my classing him with the stern republican who would not survive the liberties of his country, as a fitter associate than the nameless one offered to him by my friend from Tennessee. But, sir, neither the example of Cato nor of the Senator tempt me. I am contented with the victrix causa; contending for what I think right, I like to see it succeed. On this occasion, I have, as yet, had no cause to repent my choice; nor have the charges, urged with so much warmth against the measures of the President, changed the opinion I had formed of his talents to conduct the affairs of the nation with honor, advantage, and success. I listened to them attentively, resolved to weigh calmly, and determine impartially, on all that could be urged. Sir, I expected a like disposition in those who have expressed their disapprobation. I expected a detail of facts supported by proof, and of calm and clear deductions from those facts. Need I say that I have been mistaken? When I heard from the Senator from Maine "that this administration had glutted its vengeance upon the purest patriots on earth; that no age, condition, or sex, had escaped; that the sins of the fathers had been visited upon the children to the third and fourth generation; that innocence, virtue, patriotism, had all, all been swept into the gulf of misery;" and listened to the impressive tone in which the eloquent Senator from Delaware reprobated the spirit of oriental despotism, which had displaced deputy postmasters, and recalled unoffending ministers from abroad: need I repeat that I was disappointed? Now, I ask, will not the country ask, 'What is there to justify such exaggerated invective? Language that might be applied to the tyranny of Nero or Caracalla, but which is evidence of nothing but a heated imagination, when used to express disapprobation of removals from, and appointments to, office. But let us, sir, before we catch the infection of this fever, while our pulse still beats evenly, and our heads are cool, examine calmly into the oppressions of the Executive, which have excited this patriotic fervor. The honorable Senator from Maine did not deign a single specification, except one; which, I confess, I cannot fully comprehend—this bloody administration, which, in its savage warfare, spares neither men, women, nor children, has visited, in its vengeance, the sins of the fathers upon the third and fourth generation of their descendants. Now, sir, cannot comprehend what offence the great-grandfather of any one of the removed officers, who must have lived in the reign of Queen Ann, could have given to the President, or any one in his administration: this, I confess, puzzles me.

The Senator from Delaware has been more explicit; and, from his address, to which I listened with great pleasure, I gathered that these were the grounds of complaint: That the principles of the administration are destructive of the liberties of the country. Such were the words used as I noted them, and not without much surprise.

That the public treasure has been extravagantly and illegally expended.

That the press has been subsidized, for party purposes.

That persons have been removed from office, without the advice and consent of the Senate—the President having no constitutional right to do so.

That, if there be such a right, it is illegal to exercise it, without giving to the Senate the reasons for which the removals were made.

That removals have been made for no other cause than to satisfy the vengeance of the President, or for the purpose of rewarding his friends.

That he has made appointments out of the two Houses of Congress, and particularly out of the Senate, for the purpose of rewarding his friends.

Of each of these grave charges in its order:—

First, [says the Senator from Delaware] the principles of the administration are destructive of the liberties of the people. By administration the Senator must mean, here and on other occasions where he uses the term, the President: for, as far as I have understood, there is now no cabinet, in the sense in which that word has been usually taken. If my information be correct, the words of the constitution, and what I have always believed to be its true intent on this subject, have been pursued, rather than the example of former Presidents. The constitution, in enumerating the rights and duties of the President, says, "he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officers in each of the Executive Departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices." Instead of this, from the first organization of the Government, the Heads of Departments have been convened, and converted into a cabinet council, not where, according to the constitution, each was to give his opinion on the affairs of his own department, but where all were consulted on every difficult question relating to the affairs of each, or of the Government in general; and where, it has been generally understood, particularly during the presidency of Washington, that the President was guided by the voice of the majority; and the responsibility of the Executive, so far as regarded public opinion, was, if not thrown on the cabinet, at least divided with them. Indeed, sir, I know that, at a long subsequent period, a most illegal and oppressive act, by which I was deeply injured, was justified as being done by the advice of the cabinet. Now, sir, as I have said, there is no such cloak for Executive acts. The President performs the duties of his office, and assumes the responsibility they incur. The cabinet, a body unknown to the constitution, does not exist. The chiefs of the departments are consulted on the business of their respective offices; they are answerable to the President, and he, so far as he sanctions their acts, to the country. Of this, however, I have no farther information than any other Senator has obtained, or may obtain. In speaking of the administration of the Executive department, therefore, it must be understood that gentlemen mean the acts of the President, or of his officers, sanctioned by him. His principles, then, according to the charge, are subversive of the liberties of the people. The only modes by which the principles of a man may be known, are either by his professions or by a long course of action evincive of them. Submit the principles of the Executive to these tests. First, his professions. He has made two communications to us and to the country—his inaugural address and his message at the opening of this session. Surely the gentleman does not mean to apply the epithet he has used to the principles avowed in either of these instruments? If he does, the voice of the whole people of the United States, re-echoed from foreign nations, will contradict him; the principles there announced as those by which he will be guided, are, an adherence to the constitution of the United States: a respect for those of the individual States; economy, justice, liberty; equal protection to industry, manufactures, and trade; and a strict enforcement of the laws at home, and the extension of commerce; the observance of treaties; the assertion of our rights, and the establishment of a good understanding with all nations abroad. Which of these principles, thus professed, are subversive of the liberties of the people? If any, let them be pointed out. The charge, then, is not justified by any principle openly professed. Examine the other source. Can those principles be discovered by his course of conduct? Observe, sir, that this is a sweeping accusation of evincing dangerous principles. Any single improper act, even if it could be substantiated, would not justify it; it may be in contradiction to his professions; it may be injurious; but, unless persevered in, or followed up by others, that can be accounted for only by supposing that they were dictated by such principles, it does not justify the charge. The present Chief Magistrate has been in office a year. During that time he has assumed no new power; he has evinced no desire to enlarge those confided to him by the constitution; and if, in their exercise, he has not exactly followed the march which the Senator thinks the proper one; if he has selected for office those in whom he, and not the Senator, had confidence; if he has consulted his own, and not the Senator's, discretion; surely he ought not to be denounced as entertaining principles destructive of the liberties of the people. In examining the constitution, for the rules which were to direct his duties, he certainly found nothing written there by which he was bound to conform his own opinion to that of any Senator or any party. Where discretion is given to him he has used it, on his responsibility to the people; and the exercise of this discretion, even if it be not conformable to that which would have been suggested by the superior wisdom of those who arraign his conduct, cannot authorize them to call his principles in question. Where no discretion was given him he has confined himself, as far as I have heard or observed, to the strictest rule of the constitution and law.

Enough, then, and more than enough, in refutation of this vague and general charge. Let us come to those that are more specific.

The public treasure has been extravagantly and illegally expended.

It is not, under this head, even pretended that any other or greater sum has been taken or paid to any individual than that which was due, by law, for the service or salary for which it was given. But comparisons are made between the amount of expenditure made under the last, and that made under the present administration. As applied to our Government, there cannot be a more fallacious rule for measuring the true economy or wisdom of the exercise of Executive functions. What has the President to do with the extravagance of the general expenditure? These are directed by legislative wisdom. But he must approve all laws! True, he must approve them; but remember that, if there was any extravagance in the expenditures of the last year, his predecessor, not he, is answerable for it. He has not approved a single law under which a dollar was disbursed in the year 1829; and all of the contracts for the service of that year were made before he came into office. But, sir, there was no extravagance in the appropriations; (for the contracts I will not vouch, because I am uninformed) on the contrary, there was a marked, I will not say, a designed reduction of a usual and necessary appropriation for the contingent expenses of foreign missions. In former estimates, this had been put at twenty-five thousand dollars: in the estimate for 1829, it will be found, by deducting the salaries and outfits provided for, it was only eleven thousand dollars.

But, although I protest against this mode of testing the economy or profusion of the Executive, yet, as it has been relied on, let it be looked into, and it will be found that the expenditure of the year 1828 exceeded that of 1829 by more than four hundred thousand dollars; it is true that near seven hundred thousand dollars, properly chargeable to the year '27, was expended in '28, for awards under the Convention with England, but this was balanced again by a payment of nearly the same sum in 1829, for expenditures for objects of Internal Improvement, directed in the year 1828, and properly chargeable to that year.

But, sir, I have done with these irrelevant calculations. If the criterion contended for was the true one, it would make in favor of the present Executive; but, in truth, it shows neither extravagance nor profusion in that Department. It shows what the united legislative wisdom of the Union thought necessary to be expended, and it shows nothing more; and the truest economy is frequently found in the largest expenditure. This depends, altogether, on the object for which it is incurred.

There is, however, one branch of expenditure more immediately under the President's direction, which, indeed, like all other expenditures, must be provided for by law, but which, from its peculiar nature, demands a greater degree of confidence in the Executive than any other—I mean the expenses of our foreign intercourse. All negotiations with foreign Powers, being a part of Executive duty vested in the President, the nature of the service frequently forbids that previous disclosure which is expected in every other case; in the estimates, the existing missions are enumerated, and if any new one is contemplated, which requires no secrecy, it is also mentioned; but, to provide for unforeseen cases, an appropriation for the contingent fund of missions abroad is made, and placed at the President's order; besides this, if the interest of the country should require an expense which the contingent fund cannot cover, it must be left, as in the case of all other excess of expenditure, to be provided for under the head of "deficiencies in the appropriations" of the preceding year—an item to be found very frequently in the estimates. Here, again, the same reasoning which I have used with respect to the general annual expenditure will apply to this particular head. It may be large, and not extravagant. The occasion must determine whether it was judicious or not; and, therefore, though again the comparison is greatly in favor of the present administration, yet I am, in candor, obliged to admit that this circumstance alone will not decide the question in favor of its economy, as compared with that of its predecessors. That depends on other circumstances, and other inquiries must be made to determine their weight. But it would seem that, if the same number of missions be kept up, and some of them of an increased rank and expense; if additional expenditures have been incurred, by the necessary change of ministers, and yet the whole expenditure is less than under the preceding missions; it would seem to follow that, if all this is now done, at a less expense than formerly occurred, there must have been a saving in some part of the expenditure, under the present, that did not exist under former administrations. Figures cannot deceive us; let us bring the question to that test, and compare the years 1817 and 1818, the two first of Mr. Monroe's administration; 1825 and 1826, the two first of Mr. Adams's; and the last and the present years, the two first of General Jackson's.

To the comparative view of the expenses of foreign intercourse, let us add that of the contingent expenses of the Department of State, during the same years. From which it results, that the expenditures for foreign intercourse, in the year 1829, added to the whole appropriation asked for the year 1830, supposing the whole to be expended, are less than those of the two first years of Mr. Monroe's administration, by two hundred and thirty-three thousand sixty-five dollars and fifty-six cents; and less than the two first years of Mr. Adams's presidency, by one hundred and thirty-four thousand twenty-four dollars and ninety-eight cents. That the contingent expenses of the Department of State, in the last and present years, is less than the two corresponding years of Mr. Adams's administration, by ten thousand two hundred and eighty dollars and forty-five cents; and exceeds that of Mr. Monroe only two hundred and nineteen dollars—an excess more than counterbalanced by the increased expense of printing the biennial calendar. But, as a part of this excess consists of items of occasional and temporary occurrence, only, we must bring the comparison to bear only on the permanent items, consisting of

The diplomatic department, strictly so called;

The contingent expenses of foreign intercourse;

And treaties with the Mediterranean Powers.

On comparing these, the balances will stand thus:

The expenditure in the two first years of the present administration falls short of that in the two first years of Mr. Monroe, by the sum of thirty-eight thousand two hundred and fifty-eight dollars; and of that in the corresponding years of Mr. J. Q. Adams, by five thousand three hundred and two; notwithstanding the additional expense of outfits incurred in the last year.

[Mr. L. here read an abstract of the expenses of foreign intercourse for the several years above referred to. He then proceeded:]

For the full understanding of the accounts I have just referred to, it may be necessary to state that, previous to the year 1801, the accounts of our foreign relations were kept at the treasury under the head of "intercourse with foreign nations," and included every charge in relation to our foreign relations—even the "contingent expenses of foreign intercourse," commonly known by the appellation of the "secret service fund." In 1801, according to an arrangement made by Mr. Gallatin, the bankers of the United States in Europe were directed to open an account headed "the diplomatic department;" a correspondent account was, of course, opened at the treasury, and under this head, until the year 1814, were brought every item which had formerly been comprehended under the head of the intercourse with foreign nations; and this fund was provided, by general appropriation, in the same words. In 1814, the appropriations became more specific "for the salaries, allowances, and contingent expenses, of ministers to foreign nations, and for secretaries of legation;" and in 1818, the present form of appropriation, designating the several missions, was first adopted. But, from the date I have mentioned, 1801, until the present day, the accounts have been kept in the treasury under the general head of the "diplomatic department." And the course has been, to remit to our bankers in Europe, and charge to this fund, the moneys necessary for the payment of the salaries and allowed expenses of our foreign agents. These bankers are sometimes in advance to the United States, when unforeseen occurrences oblige the President, during the recess, to increase the expenses of our foreign intercourse, by new missions; and in those cases, appropriations are asked for, and made at the next session of Congress, to reimburse them. This was the case in the year 1816, to the amount of fifty thousand dollars; in the year 1818, to the amount of twenty thousand dollars; and probably other instances may be found, by a more careful examination than I have been able to give to the subject.

In the last year, owing to the insufficiency of the contingent fund for the expenses of foreign missions, which must not be confounded with the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, (the secret service fund) there was a deficiency of about forty thousand dollars, which was included in the estimates for the current year, and, as I stated in the debate on the appropriation bill, would have been more accordant with form to have been asked for as a deficiency in the appropriations of the last year. But the effect is precisely the same; by appropriating for the salaries and outfits of foreign ministers, &c. as it stands in the bill, it is carried to the credit of the diplomatic fund, and will be remitted to our bankers to make good their advances.

After having shown that the sum expended for our foreign intercourse is actually much less than in former administrations, the statement I have just made of the mode of keeping the accounts may be necessary, when we consider another charge, loudly made out of the House, and confidently, and with a triumphant air, repeated on this floor, that the laws which forbid a transfer of one appropriation to meet a deficiency in another, have been violated by the President. The Senator from Delaware, who most earnestly urged this charge, added, that the President had appropriated money for outfits contrary to law. Now, sir, the honorable Senator, in the charge of an illegal transfer, must have been ill informed, or he would not have hazarded it. No transfer whatever has been made. The balance in the treasury to the credit of the "diplomatic department" was applied to outfits that have been paid; that balance was what remained unremitted to our bankers in Europe. If our ministers there have drawn upon them for their quarter's salaries, due on the first of January last, they of course are in advance, because, as I have stated, the appropriation of 1829 fell short of the expenditure about the sum of forty thousand dollars. The appropriation for the contingent expenses of missions abroad always formed part of the "diplomatic fund," and without any exception has been made liable to the drafts on that fund; therefore, there was no illegal transfer. The other contingent fund (that for foreign intercourse, the secret service fund) might, consistently with former usage, have been applied to this use; but, with a scrupulous regard to the directions of the law, the President suffered it to remain untouched, and, to the amount of thirteen thousand nine hundred dollars, it has been carried to the surplus fund, having been more than two years appropriated. There has been, therefore, no illegal transfer of appropriations—there has been no transfer whatever. And this charge also falls under the investigation, which the President should rejoice has been provoked here, where it must meet its final overthrow. Now to the one connected with it, and urged with equal warmth, (I will not say violence.) Outfits have been paid, for which there were no specific appropriations. Can the gentleman have calculated the consequences of the doctrine implied in this charge? Can he have reflected on the blot its establishment would fix on the characters of men whose memory I know he reveres? Surely not. But as to the consequences of the doctrine. If it be true, the President cannot, in time of war, send a minister to make peace in the recess, when no previous appropriation has been made for an outfit. He must lose the most favorable opportunities for negotiation, and suffer the ravages of war to go on until he can call Congress, at the expense of more than one hundred thousand dollars, to get an appropriation of nine thousand. Observe, sir, that, if our bankers were ready to advance the sum—nay, if he were ready to advance it himself, the doctrine contended for would make it equally illegal. How comes it that gentlemen who agree with the Senator from Delaware in this doctrine have ever voted an appropriation to supply the deficiencies of former years? Why have they not censured the Presidents under whose authority they were created? No, sir; they were silent under Madison, silent under Monroe, when deficiencies in this department were voted for without a word of dissatisfaction. They, and all our predecessors, were silent; and it was reserved for the present occasion to discover that an outfit could not be legally paid until there was a specific appropriation. Gen. Washington appointed Mr. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney to France; Mr. Jefferson appointed Mr. Charles Pinckney to Spain, Mr. Monroe to England, Mr. Armstrong to France, Mr. Monroe again to Spain, Mr. William Pinkney to England, and Mr. Erving to Denmark; Mr. Madison appointed Mr. Crawford to France, and Mr. Erving to Spain; Mr. Monroe appointed Mr. Rush to England, and Mr. Everett to the Netherlands; and Mr. J. Q. Adams appointed Mr. Tudor to Brazil. All these appointments were made in the recess, and without any specific appropriations. Their salaries and outfits were paid out of the diplomatic fund generally, and when that fund was indebted to our bankers, provision, as we have seen, was made to reimburse them.

Now, sir, let the gentleman, and those who join him in the crimination of the Executive, determine whether they are willing to incur the ruinous consequences attending the establishment of their doctrine, and the inculpation of every former President, the Father of his Country included, in their sweeping charge. And I pray the Senate also to remark, that, if these appointments and outfits in the recess, without a special appropriation, were proper by former Presidents, (as they undoubtedly were) even in the cases where the appropriations were specified for particular missions, without providing for outfits in the recess, the present case must be infinitely more justifiable: for the appropriations for 1828 give a gross sum for salaries, outfits, and contingencies, without specifying how much was intended for each, thereby creating a general fund, applicable to all such objects; but, being inadequate to the exigencies of the year, an appropriation has been asked for to provide for the deficiency, as has been usual in this and in every other department of the Government. This deficiency was provided for in the House of Representatives without any opposition, and in the Senate with only, I think, three or four dissenting votes. And this, sir, is the whole extent of the affair of the outfits, and the illegal appropriations and transfers, which has been made the ground of so much serious accusation against the President. I hope we shall hear no more of this groundless charge. Now, sir, to another, connected with it: the missions for which these outfits were expended were totally unnecessary. The men whose recall occasioned them were fit persons to be entrusted with the business they were charged with; they ought to have been left; their recall was not only unnecessary, but, in the opinion of the Senator, a proscription. Now, sir, what means the Senator may have of judging on this point, I cannot tell; all I know is, that I have none that would justify me in believing that all these gentlemen possessed just such qualities and talents as ought to have induced the President to constitute them his agents in the important negotiations we have with foreign Powers. And if I had brought myself to this belief, there are certain considerations that would induce me to think, that a man selected by the people of the nation to manage for them this very concern, might, possibly, have rather more information, and must be much better qualified than I was, to form a proper opinion. I might say, as I do say, although these are very estimable men, in my opinion, yet the President possibly may have reason to believe that others may succeed where they have failed. He may not unreasonably think that, in addition to a minister's being a man of ability and integrity, he ought to possess the perfect confidence of the First Magistrate, whose views he is to carry into effect. These reflections, sir, would probably occur to me, did I disapprove of the nominations which have been made, and would prevent my expressing any warm disapprobation of measures, of the propriety of which I had not the means of judging. Much more would this induce me to refrain from stigmatising them as illegal usurpations of power and cruel proscriptions.

Do gentlemen really suppose that, by applying to the recall of a minister a word which leads the mind to the murders and assassinations of Marius and Sylla, and the Triumvirate, they can identify the two cases? Sir, the attempt is not very complimentary to our understanding; and the approximation only tends to show the ridiculous disparity of the cases.

What are these proscriptions? Five ministers plenipotentiary, at one "fell swoop!"—incarcerated? banished? decapitated? No, sir. Invited to return to their country—to their friends. Let us see, sir, who were the sufferers, whose fate excites so much commiseration.

First, sir, our late minister to France. I can, fortunately, lessen the gentleman's distress on his account, at least: for, having had the happiness to enjoy an intimate and uninterrupted friendship with him for many years, I know that he returned by his own desire, after having faithfully and ably represented his country with honor to himself, and possessing the esteem and the confidence of the First Magistrate, who acceded to his request.

The Senator from Delaware will not find fault with the mission to the Netherlands, when he knows that it was provided for under the administration of Mr. Adams. And the Senators from Maine, I am sure, cannot object to the selection of the distinguished citizen from their State, who so thoroughly understood the important question submitted to the decision of the court to which he has gone—a question so vitally interesting to their constituents.

Our minister to Spain had been there for five years, the usual period for them to remain abroad; during that time, as far as has been made public, he had been able to effect nothing, and the important claims of our citizens remained unsettled; it was not extraordinary, therefore, in any view, (doing full justice to that gentleman's assiduity and ability) that the efficacy of a new mission should be tried.

There remain our ministers to England and Colombia, and their cases seem particularly to have excited the sympathy of the Senator from Delaware. He pathetically exclaims—What had General Harrison done? what had Mr. Barbour done? that they should be proscribed. Sir, I cannot answer this question: I know not what they have done. But I do not consider their recall as a punishment. As far as the individuals are concerned, I presume they do not think it any great hardship: each of them, for a year's service, had received eighteen thousand dollars; and one of them has returned from a country which is, from all accounts, no very agreeable residence in its present unsettled state. I esteem both of these gentlemen: with the former I have an acquaintance of a very old date; and although I think highly of his character, and as highly of his military services as the Senator can, yet I scarcely expected from that quarter to hear these last insisted on as a qualification for diplomatic duties. But because I have this opinion, am I to join in the lamentations that are uttered over their recall, as if the act were an offence, and the consequences of it a public calamity? The President, for aught I know, may have as high an opinion of them as the Senator has, and yet he may very properly have chosen others to replace them; and if we may judge from what we hear, his choice has not been injudicious or unsuccessful.

Sir, I disavow any invidious comparisons, but it cannot escape observation that, in one of these missions, so loudly reprobated, Mr. Moore has already completed an arrangement for compensation to our fellow-citizens, which his predecessor was unable to obtain; and, in the other, under Mr. McLane, a gentleman well known to all of us, and highly esteemed wherever he is known, the important negotiations with which he was charged, and which had so long slumbered, were, from the moment of his arrival, revived. They were begun and have continued with his characteristic activity, talent, and perseverance. They may fail: for there are some errors which it is a most difficult task to repair. But, whatever be the event, neither the honor of the country, nor the reputation of its minister, will have suffered by the change. But I feel as if I had been led astray by the example of the gentleman to whose argument I am replying, and were treading on unconstitutional ground. Both of us, sir, have a right, as individuals, to form an opinion, and freely to express it, in such terms as our sense of propriety will permit, on appointments, removals, or any other measures of Government. As Senators, we have a duty to perform in relation to appointments; but, in our legislative capacity, I am at a loss to discover what duty requires, or what right permits us to pass upon the propriety of acts which the constitution has vested exclusively in the Executive hands; and that, too, without knowing the reasons or circumstances which induced them. Whether we accuse or defend, it must be in the dark. To know whether a minister has been properly recalled or appointed, we must know the precise object which the Executive had in view. We do not know it. We must know what particular talents or qualities were necessary to be employed. We do not know it. We must know what were the instructions of the recalled minister, and whether he had obeyed them. We do not know it. We must peruse his correspondence, and know the whole progress of the pending negotiation. These we have not perused, and this we do not know. We must know the difficulties which prevented his success, and whether his successor may be better enabled to overcome them; and of this, too, we are ignorant, and must be ignorant, and ought to be so, until the constitution is changed, and the Executive power is taken from the President, and placed in our hands: for, without totally subverting it, we cannot arrogate to ourselves the rights claimed in this argument.

So much for the despotism, and oppression, and illegality, alleged in our foreign relations. Let us now come to the domestic corruption: for such is the charge. The public treasure has been employed in destroying the liberty of the press, and subsidizing its venal conductors; the interest of a million of dollars (I think that was the calculation) employed for this corrupt purpose. There are, I believe, on a moderate computation, above one thousand newspapers printed in the United States: of these, seventy-two are employed to print the laws of the United States, and the advertisements and notices issued by the Departments; for which they receive, I believe, on an average, about one hundred and twenty dollars each. Now, sir, suppose, instead of eight thousand dollars, the sum mentioned by the gentleman, or even a greater, for these necessary objects, were expended, would that incur the charge made? The printing must be executed. Who is to do it, the men designated by the proper officer, or those selected by the gentleman and his friends? One tenth or one twelfth of the printers in the United States are paid a very small price for doing a necessary duty, and this is called subsidizing the press for corrupt purposes. I have not inquired, but I take it for granted, that, at the expiration of the year, the Secretary of State has restored the public printing to those presses which were deprived of it for opposing the election of Mr. Adams; that he has not given or continued it, to those who manufactured or published the vile slanders by which the present Chief Magistrate and his dearest connexions were assailed; and that, in making the selection, he has taken care to choose such papers as had a proper circulation. This is a business confided to the Secretary of State, not to us, or even to the President. A proposition was made some sessions ago to give it another destination, but it was violently opposed by the friends of the gentleman who then filled that office; a similar proposition is, I believe, now before the other House. The subsidies, then, are paid to seventy-two printers out of a thousand, and amount to one hundred and twenty dollars each, for which they perform a service of equal value. Those who make this grave accusation must go farther, if they mean to support it; they must show that these presses are employed in some other service; that a part of the consideration is the promoting some object hostile to the interest or liberties of the country; that they are undermining the constitution, or preparing the minds of the people for revolt; and that this condition was written in their bond. No, sir, the sin is, that they do not join in the clamor which restless, disappointed men, out of doors, are raising against the Chief Magistrate of the people. While they are independent, those men will call them corrupt.

Having exhibited what I think must be an abundant refutation of the charge of extravagance, so perseveringly made against the present administration in the expenditure of the public moneys, let us now see whether there is not some evidence, not only that there is no illegal or extravagant expenditure, but of a system which has already effected some savings, and promises greater, by the application of greater vigilance, and the introduction of new checks in the administration of the revenue. I speak only facts that are notorious; but I have reason to believe that others of the same nature exist, which will be developed when time is given to put the system in complete operation. One collector, whose accounts had been frequently examined under the late administration, without the detection of any fraud or error, was, in the course of the summer, found to have abstracted the sum of eighty thousand dollars; another, nearly under the same circumstances, was found in arrears to the amount of thirty thousand dollars, and both have absconded; a minor defect was found in the accounts of the Patent Office, also undiscovered, from the want of official superintendence; and, by the introduction of a simple system of checks, losses can never again occur without detection before the amount becomes considerable.

In the office of the Treasurer a most material and highly important check has been provided. Heretofore, the Treasurer might, by his own draft on the banks, with no other guard than its registry, command all the moneys in the treasury. The highly respectable character of the venerable officer who held that place from the first institution of the Government rendered every check on his drafts unnecessary; and the integrity of his successors has secured the public against any loss, and forbid the suspicion of any. But the Senate will perceive how necessary it was to introduce a different system, as well to guard the reputation of the officers from unjust suspicions, as the treasury of the nation from embezzlement. One has been provided, which, by requiring the signatures of different officers and registers in their respective offices, effectually answers the end. The value of this single regulation can scarcely be too highly appreciated. Seeing these evidences of regularity and economy, and hearing of many others, that either have already taken place, or are projected, I cannot but consider the charge of extravagance as entirely undeserved. Whenever it shall be again made, and supported by proof, I promise the gentleman that no one will go farther to blame or to correct the evil than I will. But, if I dared to offer my advice to men who want it so little, I would say, reserve your invective against extravagance until you have clear proof of its existence; by making it without reason now, you lessen the weight of your testimony hereafter, when, perhaps, it may exist.

[SENATE.]

My friend and worthy colleague seems to have transferred this charge from the President to those in this House who favored his election; he has taken up the report of a Committee of Retrenchment at a former session, and rebukes us for not following up the plan traced out in that report, some of which reforms he has honored with his approbation. If this is meant as a reproach upon the administration, it is hardly a fair one; for I know of no means, of no influence, by which they could induce the members of this body to pursue the course of reform, other than that which has been pursued; the President's message, if acted on in the spirit which dictated it, will certainly satisfy the severest economist; and although I am not prepared to say that I should adopt all the measures he recommends, yet he sufficiently indicates a desire to advise and approve every plan for reforming abuses that the wisdom of the Legislature might devise. Let my colleague, therefore, give his aid in the work; let him select the measures he approves from the report of the Committee, support them with the ability he is known to possess, and there is no doubt they will be adopted; in the mean time a little patience will show perhaps that others are laboring in the same cause, and it is hoped their labors will be successful.

The remaining charges are so connected with the constitutional question of the right of removal from office, that it will be necessary to examine the several doctrines now resuscitated after having been at rest forty years. The first position (I do the Senator from Delaware the justice to say that this strange construction is not his) is, that the power of removal from office is annexed to the appointing power, from its very nature; and that the constitution having vested the right of appointment in the President, by the advice and consent of the Senate, the same advice and consent is necessary to effect a removal. There is so much color for this argument, that, at the outset of the constitution, men of much discernment were deceived by the fallacy it contains, and argued strenuously for the joint power; it was, however, differently, and, as I hope to show, rightfully decided, in the year 1789; and from that time to this, has not, as I hope also to show, been departed from.

One error of the argument lies in the first position assumed, that the power of removal, where there is no constitutional contrary provision, is inherent at that of appointment. It has no connexion whatever with it. The power of creating a vacancy might certainly, but I concess, not without great inconvenience, be vested in one department, and that of filling it in another; but they are not inseparable. The constitution has no express cause declaratory in terms that the President shall have the power of removal; but it gives it to him by a necessary inference, when it declares that he shall have the Executive power—the signification of which is amplified in the subsequent clause, declaring it to be his duty to “see that the laws are faithfully executed.” Here the power of removal is as fully granted as if it had been developed by the clearest periphrase. No principle is clearer than that the grant of power or the requisition of a duty, implies a grant of all those necessary for its execution; and it is equally clear that the power and the duty of causing the laws to be executed must carry with it that of selecting those persons necessary and proper to carry them into effect. But if, after having selected them, they are found unfit for the purpose, the same necessity exists of changing the selection which has been made; but this cannot be done in any other way than by removal; therefore, the power of removal is a power necessary for the due execution of the laws: and, being necessary, must be presumed to have been given with, and annexed to, the power of executing the laws; which is the Executive power of the President alone, and cannot be divided with the power associated with him in making appointments. If my mind be capable of appreciating the force of reasoning by deductions, this is conclusive against the participation claimed by the Senate in the right of removal. But this is not all. Supposing the position were true, that the power which appoints must, of necessity, remove: how would the case stand? Who is it appoints? The President—he alone appoints. But, because there is a restriction on the one branch of his power, by making the advice of the Senate necessary to an appointment, does it follow that he cannot execute the other branch without that assent also? He has two powers by the argument—to appoint and to remove: surely the constitution might reasonably provide that the Senate should have a veto on the first, without having it necessarily implied that they gave it in the second. Let it be remembered that the Senate do not appoint; they can never select; they can only approve or disapprove, they can advise, or refuse to advise. But, independent of abstract reasoning, let us examine, from practical results, what the constitution really intended. The wise framers of that instrument could not be ignorant of the great republican principle, that to every grant of power, responsibility ought to be annexed—responsibility to the laws for its wilful abuse or neglect—responsibility to public opinion for its indiscreet or erroneous exercise. If there were, then, even a doubt of the construction in this case, to what solution ought this principle to lead us? When the President removes, his act is known: should he act from corrupt motives, he is liable to impeachment. Should he act from indiscretion only, public opinion, from which there is no escape, will pass upon his conduct. But admit the co-operation of the Senate. What happens? First, the perfect irresponsibility of the President, both at the bar of this House and at that of the public. Having co-operated in the offence, by advising the removal, how could we punish it as a crime? And with the public, our confirmation of the act would be a complete cloak to cover the indiscretion, if there were one in the measure. There would then be no responsibility whatever attached to the President. Would it be shifted upon us? As little. Our sittings are secret—our opinions and votes must necessarily be so. The act of the Senate is known: a majority have advised the removal; or, by refusing to do so, have kept a negligent, or incapable, or unfaithful officer at his post. Who is chargeable with this? When our terms of service expire, will the Legislatures of our respective States know which of us have disappointed the expectations they have formed of the prudence, discretion, or judgment, of their Senators, so that they may continue or withdraw their confidence? No, sir, the whole plan would present the anomaly of most important powers exercised in a free Government without any check from the fear of punishment or of popular disfavor.

If it were possible then for the Senate to participate in this power, it would be not only contrary to the true construction of the words of our social compact, but would be destructive of one of the most important principles on which it is founded. But it is totally impracticable, morally and physically impracticable, in its exercise, consistently with the existence of the Government. Take the case of a minister to a foreign court, charged with a negotiation of the most important kind, on the subject of which the commercial prosperity, perhaps the peace of the country depends; he becomes negligent in his correspondence, he addicts himself to play, to pleasure, to intemperance; he becomes unworthy of his trust, from these or other causes; or from malady, mental or bodily, becomes incapable of performing his duties; or, he makes himself so obnoxious to the court to which he is sent, that it demands his recall. The knowledge of these facts is brought to the President, soon after the adjournment of Congress; he cannot recall this minister, because he has been appointed by the advice and consent of the Senate; and by the newly vamped doctrine, the same advice is necessary to displace him. The President must then convene the Senate—sixty days, at least, is necessary for this operation.

All this while the unworthy, or inefficient, or obnoxious minister must remain, to betray or disgrace his country, or irritate the Power which he was sent to conciliate. The Senate are at length convened, and the President communicates the information which he has received. But here another new principle stands in the way of his recall. The minister, like all other officers, (such is the doctrine of the day) has an interest in his office, which it is injustice, tyranny, and proscription, to deprive him of without cause. He ought not then to be deprived of this interest unheard; he must have a copy of the charges, the names of the witnesses, time to reply, and a right to examine his evidence in discharge. Gentlemen must acknowledge this, or they must give up their favorite cry of oriental despotism and cruel proscription. The examination of ex parte evidence here is quite as fatal to the vested interest they contend for as any removal the President has made. These formalities are gone through, and at the end of three or four months the charges are substantiated, and the minister is recalled, or the proof is not deemed satisfactory, and he remains, having lost the confidence of the President, who is forced, however, to retain him, and he himself irritated by the accusation, and endeavoring to defeat every negotiation that will reflect credit on the administration of his country. Ten days after this trial is concluded, before the members from the distant States have reached their homes, advice is received that a collector is speculating with the funds committed to his charge; the same operation is to be renewed, the same delay incurred, the same waste of public money, the same vexation to the members of this body, the same impossibility—let us come to the conclusion at once—the same utter impossibility of carrying on the operations of Government with such machinery.

This was seen, felt, and acknowledged, as I have said, in the outset of our Government, and, from that time to the present, it has never been made a serious question. Why is it raised now? Doubtless from conscientious motives, by those who advocate it here; but, out of this House, it has been (in the total absence of better matters, for a reproach to the President) made a party cry, which will be hushed as soon as the matter is examined by an enlightened people. The gentleman from Delaware does not go this length; his doctrine is this:

The President has the right of removal for just causes. If he abuses it for corrupt or party purposes, he is liable to impeachment.

Whenever the Senate suspect that a removal has been made without cause, or from such improper or corrupt motives, they may ask for the reason of the removal.

The President is bound to communicate the cause whenever it may be demanded by the Senate.

The Senate, if he should refuse to give any, or give an unsatisfactory answer, may, and ought to, reject, successively, all the nominations he may make.

And the conclusion to which the gentleman is brought by this series of positions, is, that the temporary appointments made by the President, being in force only until the end of the session, the vacancy that is thus created is not one occurring in the recess, and therefore cannot be filled by the President, but the office must remain vacant.

These are, as accurately as I could note them, the positions laid down by the Senator from Delaware.

Let us inquire whether they are more tenable than the general doctrine I have just examined.

The first position I accede to. The President has the right of removal, and he is liable to impeachment for corruption and malconduct in the exercise of this, as well as any other of his functions. But this true position is fatal to all the errors which the Senator has built upon it.

He admits the right of removal to be in the President, without the advice of the Senate. As it is no where in terms given by the constitution, it must exist as a necessary means of executing some power which is expressly given. What is that power? Clearly the Executive; or, as more fully expressed, the duty of "seeing that the laws shall be faithfully executed." He has it then, amply, completely, solely, and the second member of this proposition proves it; he is impeachable for corruption in its exercise; he has the power without participation, and must bear the responsibility without any one to share in it.

Having seen that the President derives the power he is admitted to possess from a legitimate constitutional source, and that this gives it to him without any other limitation than that of his own responsibility, we must inquire from whence the Senate derives the control with which they are, gratuitously, I think, invested by the argument. They may call on the President for the reasons of the removal; and if they have the right, the obligation to comply with it follows of course. But in what part of the constitution is this right given? It is not pretended that there is any express provision. From what part is it a necessary inference? To the execution of what power, vested in the Senate, is it the necessary means? Not to the power of advising on the fitness of a candidate proposed to fill the vacancy, because the vacancy must be created before that advisory power can be exercised, and the argument admits that the President has the right to create the vacancy by a removal. Of what power, then, I ask, vested in the Senate, is this the necessary appendage? Or where is it expressly given as a distinct power? If given neither expressly nor by implication, it cannot exist.

But for what purpose should it exist? What is the advantage to be derived from it that should make us solicitous to give a construction that should admit it? Remember in this inquiry the first position which is assumed by the argument, and which I admit, that the President is impeachable for a corrupt removal; and remember also, that we are the judges of fact and of law on an impeachment. The power, then, is one that makes us accusers as well as judges, and judges who have predetermined the guilt of the accused: for if, on the inquiry, the corruption appear, and we make it the ground of refusing to confirm the President's nomination, do we not prejudice the question on the impeachment that must follow? This is an insuperable objection, which the doctrine of the Senator entirely overlooks in zeal to apply his remedy.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

And what is that remedy? One surely worse than the disease, although that should have all the bad symptoms ascribed to it. The evil complained of is, the removal of one good officer, to be replaced by another as good. Observe, sir, that I grant the fact in dispute. I admit, for the sake of showing the weakness of the argument, that all the removals have been of men well qualified for their offices; and all I ask in return is, a similar admission that the Senate, for whose powers they contend, will consent to no nomination of a person not qualified. This is the evil. What is the remedy? It is contained in the Senator's last position, that, if the President refused to give his reasons, or the Senate are not satisfied with them, they may refuse to confirm his nominations, and suffer the appointment to expire by its limitation, at the end of the session; and then it is the opinion of the Senator that the office can no longer be filled; because, according to his reasoning, it is not one that accrues during the recess. This is his remedy: for this you are to suppose powers that are no where given. For this admirable result you are to strain the construction of the constitution until it breaks. For this you are to add the accusing to your judicial power. For this you are to leave the laws unexecuted, and disjoint the whole machinery of Government. No matter whether the offices to be filled are the commanders of your army, or the captains of your fleet in time of war, or the heads of departments, or collectors of revenue, or marshals to execute the decrees of your courts in time of peace—all must remain vacant. Apply it in the present case. A number of removals in every department has been made. Suppose the Senate should have asked for the causes, and the President, as he most probably would, should have declined to comply with the request: what would have followed? All our diplomatic relations would have at once ceased: for all the ministers appointed in the recess would cease their functions at the end of the session. The revenue in some of our largest ports would be uncollected. The administration of justice in most of the districts would be stopped for want of district attorneys and marshals. This is the remedy for an evil, perhaps of doubtful existence in any case, but certainly much aggravated in all.

But suppose this right in the Senate to call for the causes of removal, and an acknowledgment by the President of an obligation to comply. He sends us his reasons, and in one case they are that he has no confidence in the man he has dismissed. Confidence cannot be commanded; it is the result of observation on character and conduct; on a thousand indescribable impressions. But a majority of the Senate say we have confidence in him. What is to be the result? Is he to be restored to office? No one pretends it: What then? The grand remedy to punish the President for his want of confidence in an officer whom he has not appointed, is to adopt the plan of the Senator from Delaware, and leave the office vacant. The whole reasoning on the general question of the right of the Senate to participate in removals, applies with the same force to this power of inquiring into the causes of removals; both are gratuitously assumed in argument; both are destitute of either express or implied authority in the constitution; both lead to absurd consequences, and to impracticable results; ruinous, if they were practicable.

But I deny that the remedy proposed (ruinous and extraordinary as it is) could be applied. The offices would not, in my opinion, remain vacant. The President would have a right to fill them, and would certainly exercise that right; the expressions used in the constitution are general: he shall have a right to "fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate." Now, sir, in the case supposed, the vacancy arises when the commission expires; when is that? At the end of the session? When is the end of the session? Certainly not before the beginning of the recess; not at any moment while the session continues. An official act, done at the last instant of the session, would be well done. The vacancy then happens at the first instant of the recess; but the constitution makes no distinction whatever; whether at the first moment or the last day is immaterial. When I use this argument, I am free to admit that I do not think the framers of the constitution did intend to provide for so extraordinary a case as that which the ingenuity of the Senator from Delaware has imagined, of the Senate rejecting all the nominations of the President, successively, because they might be dissatisfied with a removal. But the words of the constitution permit the exercise of his powers to fill all vacancies, whenever they should occur—with the advice of the Senate, if in session; without it, by temporary appointment, when they are not. The exercise of the extraordinary and destructive power contended for never certainly entered into their minds; it was left for the ingenuity of our times to discover. But, it has been said that this power is liable to abuse; the President may remove from caprice, prejudice, or a worse motive. No doubt, sir, he may; he may do worse; he may embroil you with foreign nations, by his abuse of the treaty making power; he may cause your fortifications to be dismantled and your army to be dispersed in time of war; he may destroy your revenue by the appointment of corrupt men in the management of the treasury: but what argument can be drawn from this? That he has not the constitutional power? Certainly not. But if the President might abuse the power of removal, may not the Senate abuse the control with which it is attempted to invest them? If he has enemies to displace, may not they have friends to keep in? If he is liable to be actuated by political feelings, are bodies, constituted as this is, at all times free from their influence? The President has the power to remove, it is said again, but only for just cause; but who is to judge of what is just cause? not the Senate, or if so, the power would be theirs, not the President's; he must himself be the judge, or else it would be a solecism to say that he has the power; he must judge and he must act, as I have said, uncontrolled but by his responsibility to the laws for corrupt acts; to his country for those which are indiscreet or erroneous.

This, sir, is my view of the constitutional power of the President in relation to removals—a power, in my view of it, vested solely in him, and for the due exercise of which he must bear the sole responsibility. I will not consent to divide it with him. No terms seem sufficiently energetic for the gentlemen to express their disapprobation of the manner in which the President has exercised this power. As it is their only subject for declamation and invective, it would be cruel to deprive them of it; but, by their own showing, are they not accusing without evidence? Why all these attempts to call on the President for his reasons of removal, if they already know he has none? Why call for evidence if they already have it? If these proofs of corruption, of favoritism, of persecution, are sufficient, plead the cause before the people, or prefer accusations of impeachment in the other House; but do not render yourselves, by prejudging the cause, liable to be challenged for the favor, or, by bold accusation, endeavor to influence the minds of your fellow judges with your own prejudices! If their doctrine be true, as it undoubtedly is, that, for corruption in the exercise of this as well as any other function, the First Magistrate is liable to impeachment; and if they believe, as they repeatedly allege, that there is evidence of it in the late removals; I put it to them whether they are correct in showing a feeling inconsistent with the calm investigation that becomes a judge. If, on the contrary, as I am more inclined to believe, the warmth that has been expressed arises only from a feeling for political friends, who have lost their places, are not the expressions they have used highly exaggerated? and ought they not to have been suppressed? But if there has been, in their opinion, an indiscreet use of the power, let them plead the cause before the people, who have the power to apply the remedy. To them the President is responsible, and to them, I have little doubt, his conduct will appear, as on other occasions it has done, correct, upright, disinterested, and intended for their best advantage. Yet, sir, if the contrary be proved, I shall, as a Senator and an individual, hold myself open to the conviction that evidence may produce.

I had almost forgotten [said Mr. L.] a complaint that this body was deprived, by Executive appointments, of one-eighth (I think that was the alleged proportion) of its members. There is only one view of the subject by which this can be considered as matter for reprehension. But that is one so derogatory to the dignity of this body, that I can scarcely think it was so intended. A Senator of the United States, dividing with a single colleague the representation of a sovereign State; the constitutional adviser of the President in appointments, and the formation of treaties; a judge of the High Court of Impeachments, to which the President is himself amenable; holds a station superior in importance and honor to any the Executive can give.

Whoever, therefore, quits it for one of the Departments, must be considered as having made a sacrifice rather than accepted a reward. The President's recommendation of a change in the constitution, which should disqualify members of the Legislature from office, has been alluded to as inconsistent with his practice. To this, it appears to me, his message gives a satisfactory answer; and it may be added, that the refusal by any of the States to adopt the amendment he suggested, afforded a conclusive proof, that neither the States nor the people desired that the requisite talent and fitness for office should be excluded, because it was found in the Legislature. In these appointments, then, the will of the people has been pursued, provided the choice has fallen on persons properly qualified; but this we cannot question: for we have concurred in all the appointments.

I now approach a graver subject—one on the true understanding of which the Union, and of course the happiness of our country, depends. The question presented is, that of the true sense of that constitution which it is made our first duty to preserve in its purity. Its true construction is put in doubt; not on a question of power between its several departments, but on the very basis upon which the whole rests; and which, if erroneously decided, must topple down the fabric raised with so much pain, framed with so much wisdom, established with so much persevering labor, and for more than forty years the shelter and protection of our liberties—the proud monument of the patriotism and talent of those who devised it, and which, we fondly hoped, would remain to after ages as a model for the imitation of every nation that wished to be free. Is that, sir, to be its destiny? The answer to that question may be influenced by this debate. How strong the motive, then, to conduct it calmly; when the mind is not heated by opposition, depressed by defeat, or elated with fancied victory, to discuss it with a sincere desire, not to obtain a paltry triumph in argument, to gain applause by tart reply, to carry away the victory by addressing the passions, or gain proselytes by specious fallacies, but, with a mind open to conviction, seriously to search after truth—earnestly, when found, to impress it on others. What we say on this subject will remain; it is not an every day question; it will remain for good or for evil. As our views are correct or erroneous; as they tend to promote the lasting welfare, or accelerate the dissolution of our Union; so will our opinions be cited as those which placed the constitution on a firm basis, when it was shaken or deprecated, if they should have formed doctrines which led to its destruction.

With this temper, and these impressions of the importance of the subject, I have given it the most profound, the most anxious, and painful attention; and differing, as I have the misfortune to do, in a greater or less degree, from all the Senators who have preceded me, I feel an obligation to give my views of the subject. Could I have coincided in the opinions given by my friends, I should most certainly have been silent; from a conviction, that neither my authority nor my expositions could add any weight to the arguments they have delivered.

My learned and honorable friend, the Senator near me, from South Carolina, [MR. HAYNE] comes, in the eloquent arguments he has made, to the conclusion, that whenever, in the language of the Virginia resolutions, (which he adopts) there is, in the opinion of any one State, "a palpable, deliberate, and dangerous violation of the constitution by a law of Congress," such State may, without ceasing to be a member of the Union, declare the law to be unconstitutional, and prevent its execution within the State; that this is a constitutional right, and that its exercise will produce a constitutional remedy, by obliging Congress either to repeal the law, or to obtain an explicit grant of the power which is denied by the State, by submitting an amendment to the several States, and that, by the decision of the requisite number, the State, as well as the Union, would be bound. It would be doing injustice, both to my friend and to his argument, if I did not add, that this resort to the nullifying power, as it has been termed, ought to be had only in the last resort, where the grievance was intolerable, and all other means of remonstrance and appeal to the other States had failed.

In this opinion I understand the honorable and learned chairman of the Judiciary Committee [MR. ROWAN] substantially to agree, particularly in the constitutional right of preventing the execution of the obnoxious law.

The Senator from Tennessee, [MR. GRUNDY] in his speech, which was listened to with so much attention and pleasure, very justly denies the right of declaring the nullity of a law, and preventing its execution, to the ordinary Legislature, but erroneously, in my opinion, gives it to a convention.

My friend from New Hampshire, [MR. WOODBURY] of whose luminous argument I cannot speak too highly, and to the greatest part of which I agree, does not coincide in the assertion of a constitutional right of preventing the execution of a law believed to be unconstitutional, but refers opposition to the unalienable right of resistance to oppression.

All these Senators consider the constitution as a compact between the States in their sovereign capacity; and one of them [MR. ROWAN] has contended that sovereignty cannot be divided; from which it may be inferred that no part of the sovereign power has been transferred to the General Government.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in his very eloquent and justly admired address on this subject, considers the Federal constitution as entirely popular, and not created by compact, and, from this position, very naturally shows, that there can be no constitutional right of actual resistance to a law of that Government, but that intolerable and illegal acts may justify it on first principles.

However these opinions may differ, there is one consolatory reflection, that none of them justify a violent opposition given to an unconstitutional law, until an extreme case of suffering has occurred. Still less do any of them suppose the actual existence of such a case.

But the danger of establishing on the one hand a constitutional veto in each of the States, upon any act of the whole, to be exercised whenever, in the opinion of the Legislature of such State, the act they complain of is contrary to the constitution; and, on the other, the dangers which result to the State Governments by considering that of the Union as entirely popular, and denying the existence of any compact; seem, both of them, to be so great, as to justify, and indeed demand, an expression of my dissent from both.

The arguments on the one side, to show that the constitution is the result of a compact between the States, cannot, I think, be controverted; and those which go to show that it is founded on the consent of the people, and, in one sense of the word, a popular Government, are equally incontrovertible. Both of the positions, seemingly so contradictory, are true, and both of them are false—true, as respects one feature in the constitution; erroneous, if applied to the whole.

These States, during the short period of the contest with Great Britain, which preceded the Declaration of Independence, although colonies in name, were, in fact, independent States, and, even at that early period, their political existence partook of this mixed character.

By a popular or consolidated Government, I understand one that is founded on the consent, express or implied, of the people of the whole nation; and which operates in all its departments directly upon the people.

By a federative Government, as contradistinguished from the former, I mean one composed of several independent States, bound together for specific national purposes, and relying for the efficiency of its operations on its action upon the different States in their political capacity, not individually upon their citizens.

In the incipient state of our political existence, we find traces of both of these features. When the oppressive acts of the mother country had excited the spirit of resistance, we find the colonies sending delegates to a General Congress; and, without any formal federative contract, that Congress assumed, by general consent, and exercised powers which could strictly be classed only under the head of such as belong to a consolidated Government. In order to effect a non-importation of goods from Great Britain, instead of operating through the agency of the separate colonies, and recommending that they should use their influence or authority to effect the object, the Congress addressed their recommendation to the merchants of all the united colonies individually. It is true this was only in the shape of a recommendation, not an imperative order; but this makes no difference in the argument: it was still an action of the Government, addressed to individuals of the colonies, not through the medium of the colonial authority, as would have been the case under a strictly federative compact. This was on the 19th of September, 1774. On the 27th of the same month, they proceeded more directly, and resolved that there should be no goods imported after a certain day, and that those so imported should not be used or sold; and a few days after, a resolution of non-exportation was entered into; the negotiation of British bills was prohibited, and besides levying and equipping a naval and land force on the continental establishment, they erected a Post Office Department, emitted money, and declared that persons refusing to receive the bills, on conviction, be deemed, published, and treated as enemies of the country. All these acts were, in a greater or less degree, direct operations of the general temporary Government upon the citizens, and, in that degree, were proofs of its character as a mixture of popular with a federative Government. After all these acts, and many more of the same nature, came the Declaration of Independence, in which they jointly declare themselves independent States, but still, it would seem, as one nation. In the preamble they assert the right, as "one people," to take the station, not the stations, to which they are entitled. The whole instrument complains of illegal and oppressive acts against them jointly.

After this decisive act, for more than two years the States, thus declared free, remained connected by no other bond than their common love of liberty and common danger, under the same authority of a general Congress, which continued to exercise all the powers of a mixed kind, which, if they had been formally conferred, would have constituted a Government which could not properly be called either purely a federation of States, retaining all their sovereignty, or a consolidated Government, to which it had been surrendered.

The Confederation was at length entered into. This was certainly a compact between the States; but, among a number of stipulations strictly federative, contained others which gave to the Congress powers which trench upon the State sovereignties; to declare war and make peace; enter into treaties binding on the whole; to establish courts of admiralty, with power to bind the citizens of the States, individually, in cases coming under that jurisdiction; to raise armies, equip fleets, coin money, emit bills of credit, and other similar powers. The defects of this bond of union are well known: among these the most prominent was the want of a power, acting directly on the citizens, to raise a revenue, independent of the agency of the States. And it is a most instructive fact, that the common danger, though at times extremely imminent, during the continuance of the war, could never produce any kind of attention to the requisitions of Congress; yet there was no want of patriotism or attachment to the cause. Each State then possessed, on the subject of the requisition, the practical power of giving a veto to the operations they disliked, by refusing its quota; and the power was abused, and will always be abused, whenever it is the interest of the State possessing it to exercise that right.

In the Federal constitution this combination of the two characteristics of Government is more apparent. It was framed by delegates appointed by the States; it was ratified by conventions of the people of each State, convened according to the laws of the respective States. It guarantees the existence of the States, which are necessary to its own; the States are represented in one branch by Senators, chosen by the Legislatures; and in the other, by Representatives taken from the people, but chosen by a rule which may be made and varied by the States, not by Congress—the qualification of electors being different in different States. They may make amendments to the constitution. In short, the Government had its inception with them; it depends on their political existence for its operation; and its duration cannot go beyond theirs. The States existed before the constitution; they parted only with such powers as are specified in that instrument; they continue still to exist, with all the powers they have not ceded; and the present Government would never, itself, have gone into operation, had not the States, in their political capacity, have consented. That consent is a compact of each one with the whole; not, as has been argued, (in order to throw a kind of ridicule on this convincing part of the argument of my friend from South Carolina) with the Government which was made by such compact. It is difficult, therefore, it would appear, with all these characters of a federative nature, to deny to the present Government the description of one founded on compact, to which each State was a party; and a conclusive proof, if any more were wanted, would be in the fact, that the States adopted the constitution at different times, and many of them on conditions which were afterwards complied with by amendments. If it were strictly a popular Government, in the sense that is contended for, the moment a majority of the people of the United States had consented, it would have bound the rest; and yet, after all the others, except one, had adopted the constitution, the smallest still held out; and if Rhode Island had not consented to enter into the confederacy, she would, perhaps, at this time, have been unconnected with us.

But with all these proofs (and I think them incontrovertible) that the Government could not have been brought into being without a compact, yet I am far from admitting that, because this entered so largely into its origin, therefore there are no characteristics of another kind, which impress on it strongly the marks of a more intimate union and amalgamation of the interests of the citizens of the different States, which gives to them the general character of citizens of the united nation. This single fact will show, that the entire sovereignty of the States, individually, has not been retained: the relation of citizen and sovereign is reciprocal. To whatever power the citizen owes allegiance, that power is his sovereign. There cannot be a double, although there may be a subordinate fealty. The Government, also, for the most part, (except in the election of Senators, Representatives, and President, and some others) acts in the exercise of its legitimate powers directly upon individuals, and not through the medium of State authorities. This is an essential character of a popular Government.

I place little reliance on the argument which has been mostly depended on, to show that this is a popular Government: I mean the preamble, which begins with the words, "We, the people." It proves nothing more than the fact, that the people of the several States had been consulted, and had given their consent to the instrument. To give these words any other construction, would be to make them an assertion directly contrary to the fact. We know, and it never has been imagined or asserted, that the people of the United States, collectively, as a whole people, gave their assent, or were consulted in that capacity; the people of each State were consulted, to know whether that State would form a part of the United States, under the articles of the constitution; and to that they gave their assent, simply as citizens of that State.

This Government, then, is neither such a federative one, founded on a compact, as leaves to all the parties their full sovereignty, nor such a consolidated popular Government, as deprives them of the whole of that sovereign power. It is a compact, by which the people of each State have consented to take from their own Legislatures some of the powers they had conferred upon them, and to transfer them, with other enumerated powers, to the Government of the United States, created by that compact; these powers, so conferred, are some of those exercised by the sovereign power of the country in which they reside. I do not mean here, the ultimate sovereign power residing under all governments, democratic or despotic, in the people; a sovereignty which must always in theory exist, however its exercise may be foreign or domestic power be repressed; but I mean that power to regulate the affairs of a nation, which resides in its government, whatever the form of that government may be; and this may be, and generally is, distributed into several hands. As to all these attributes of sovereignty, which, by the federal compact were transferred to the General Government, that government is sovereign and supreme; the States have abandoned, and can never reclaim them. As to all other sovereign powers, the States retain them.

But the States have not only given certain powers to the General Government, but they have expressly given the right of enforcing obedience to the exercise of those powers. They have declared that "the constitution and the laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." And they have also expressly consented, that the Judiciary of the United States shall have cognizance of all cases coming under those laws. Here the words of the compact provide for the means by which controversies coming under it are to be decided; but this must be taken with the understanding that they are controversies arising not only under the laws of the United States, (including the constitution and treaties) but they must be between parties over whom the constitution has given jurisdiction to the courts. Every case, then, of this description, must be submitted to the Judiciary of the United States; and as, in all cases, the constitution of the United States is paramount in authority to a law of the United States, and as both of them are so to a law of the State, the Supreme Court of the United States must, of necessity, when a contrariety between these authorities is alleged, in any case legally before it, determine that question, and its determination must be final; the parties must be bound; the States to which they belong must be bound; for they, in this compact, have agreed that their citizens shall be so. But it is asked, suppose the law of Congress is palpably contrary to the constitution, and endangers the liberties of the country, must the State submit? If the question be, whether the State can constitutionally resist, there is but one answer. She has by the constitution consented that the Supreme Court shall finally decide whether this be constitutional or not. If the question be, of the right which all people have to resist ruinous oppression, the answer is as clear; and I should be the last man in the world to contravene the existence of that unalienable right. But that is not the question; it is of a constitutional right, whenever, in the opinion of the Legislature, (or as some think, of a convention of the people of any one State) a law of Congress is palpably unconstitutional, such State has a right, under the constitution, not only to declare the act void, but to prevent its execution within the State, until Congress shall propose a declaratory amendment to the States, and their decision shall be obtained; and all this without quitting their place in the Union, without disturbing its peace, it is said; but, on the contrary, it is contended, for the purpose of preserving the general compact inviolate. Now, sir, independently of the argument drawn from the express consent of the people of the several States, that in all matters where the Supreme Court have jurisdiction between individuals, they should determine, and must determine whether a law be unconstitutional; independently of this, and supposing no such powers given to the court, can it be supposed that so essential a feature of the Government, as a positive veto given to, or reserved by each State, upon the operations of the whole, would have been left, not only unprovided for by express words, but without even an ambiguous phrase—a single doubtful word, to hang the argument upon? It is derived solely from the rights attached to the sovereignty of the States, unimpaired by its accession to the Union, indivisible, according to the argument of my learned friend from Kentucky, and always alive and active, (not one of those which he expressly says will keep cold) and ready to go into operation whenever it is attacked.

I have called it a positive veto on the operations of the whole Government. Is it not so in effect? That the right, when exercised by a single State, can only prevent the execution of the obnoxious law in the State alone which objects to it, does not take from the power the character I have given to it, is apparent. For, if the General Government were under an obligation to desist from executing the law in the opposing State, they must, of necessity, refrain from putting it in force in the others: if it were a tax, because they must be equal; if any other subject of legislation, imposing a burthen or restriction, they could not, in justice, force the others to bear what one was relieved from, nor would the other States submit to so unequal an imposition. The argument, then, supposes a feature in the constitution which certainly is not expressed in it, which, most assuredly, would have been expressed, if it had been intended: for it totally alters its character; puts the power of the Union at the will of any one of its members; and allows it, without risk, to throw off all the burthens of Government at its pleasure. Remember, sir, that I am speaking of a constitutional right; (for that is the one claimed) a right under the constitution, not over it; a power that may be exercised without incurring any risk, or committing any offence—without forfeiting a place in the Union, or any right or privilege

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

under it. The State has only to resolve, by its ordinary Legislature, or, according to others, in a convention of its citizens, that a law enacted by the General Government is palpably unconstitutional and dangerous, and that it shall cease to operate, and it must cease to operate; and, as an inevitable consequence, it may be resisted by force; as another consequence, if death ensues, it is murder in those who act under the General Government; justifiable homicide in those who resist. Now, sir, would not these serious consequences have presented themselves to the enlightened men who framed this constitution? and, if they did, would not some provision have been made to prevent any illegal exertion of power by the Executive, fraught with such danger? If they had supposed that this was a right reserved, would they not have declared the correlative obligation in the General Government to respect it? For, sir, it is superfluous to say that every right carries with it its correspondent obligation, and that there cannot be two conflicting rights. If, then, the States have a right to prevent the execution of a law, the General Government is under an obligation to refrain from enforcing it; yet, instead of declaring this obligation to respect this reserved right, not the slightest allusion is made to it. On the contrary, when a law is once passed, it is made the duty of the President to execute it. But, by the argument, the law has been passed as constitutional by both Houses of Congress; it has been approved as such by the President; and a judgment has been given by the Supreme Court, declaring it to be constitutional, and directing that, in the particular case before them, it shall be executed. The State against whose citizen the judgment is given declares it to be palpably and dangerously contrary to the constitution, and that it is null and void, and shall not be executed. What is to be done? The right of the State, says the gentleman, must be respected; but, unfortunately for the argument, the constitution does not say so; unfortunately, it says directly the contrary. The President is bound by his oath to cause every constitutional law to be executed. But he has approved this law, therefore he believes it to be constitutional; but both Houses have passed it, therefore they believed it so; but the judges have decreed that it shall be executed; therefore, they, too, have believed it to be constitutional. Must the President yield his own conviction, fortified as it is by these authorities, to the opinion of a majority—perhaps a small majority—in the Legislature of a single State? If he must, again I say, show me the written authority. I cannot find it. I cannot conceive it. I am not asking for the expression of the reserved right; I know that they are not enumerated. But I ask for the obligation to obey that right; I ask for the written instruction to the Executive to respect it; I ask for a provision, that nothing but the grossest inattention, or the most consummate folly, could have omitted, if the doctrine contended for be true.

This might have been done by an article in these words: "Whenever, in the opinion of any one State, a law passed by the Congress shall be deemed unconstitutional and dangerous, such State may prevent its execution, and the President and the courts shall forbear to enforce the same; but Congress shall, in that case, if they persevere in thinking the law expedient, submit the question as an amendment to conventions of the States, in the manner prescribed by the constitution." Now, sir, the inquiry cannot be too often repeated, if such had been the intention of those who framed our form of government, or of those who adopted it, and considered and amended it, would not some expression of this kind have been inserted? and if inserted, would it not have been recommended or adopted? and, if adopted, how long would it have continued in operation? how many votes would have been interposed? how many conventions would have been assembled? Not an embargo, not a restriction, not a declaration of war, not a measure for defence, not a tax or an impost, but would produce a stoppage in the wheels of the political machine; the most pressing operations of Government must be suspended until the amendments are proposed by Congress, until conventions are called in all the States, and they have made their decisions. It is unfortunately no answer to say that this power would not be abused; that the argument supposes it to accrue only in palpable cases. Let the constitutional right be acknowledged, let it be known that it may be exercised without risk, and local interest will always be strong enough to suggest constitutional scruples; nor will common interest, the incalculable interest of our Union, be a sufficient argument. When was the interest of union more apparent than during the latter years of the Revolutionary war, and those which immediately succeeded the peace? Yet, when was the apathy of the States more apparent to the considerations of common good? When were local interests more consulted? When was it more difficult to procure the slender contributions which each State was bound to furnish to the common fund? It is a most important truth, that the existence of the General Government must depend on that feature which permits the exercise of all its legitimate powers directly upon the people, without the intervention of the States. Make that intervention necessary for the execution of those legitimate powers, or permit it to arrest them in cases which the States may deem illegal, and your Government is gone; it changes its character; it becomes, whatever other features you give to it, essentially an inefficient confederation, without union at home, without consideration abroad, and must soon fall a prey to domestic wars, in which foreign alliances will necessarily intervene to complete its ruin. No, sir; adopt this as a part of our constitution, and we need no prophet to predict its fall. The oldest of us may live long enough to weep over its ruins; to deplore the failure of the fairest experiment that was ever made, of securing public prosperity and private happiness, based on equal rights and fair representation; to die with the expiring liberties of our country, and transmit to our children, instead of the fair inheritance of freedom, received from our fathers, a legacy of war, slavery, and contention.

But it is asked, will you deny to the States every portion of their former sovereignty? Will you call this, with the Senator from Massachusetts, a strictly popular Government? Will you deny them all right of intervention, and reduce them to the condition of mere corporations? Do you renounce the doctrines for which you contended in 1798, and consider the Supreme Court as the umpire provided in all cases to determine on the extent of State rights? God forbid that I should hold such doctrines. If my friends had stopped at the declaration that they adopted the resolutions of the Virginia Legislature, I should not, perhaps, have thought the difference between us of sufficient consequence to have troubled the Senate with my opinions. For the most part, I coincide in the sentiments of those resolutions; but my friends carried them out into their practical consequences farther than, I think, they warrant; farther, certainly, than I am willing to follow them.

As I understand them, they assert the right of a State, in the case of a law palpably unconstitutional and dangerous, to remonstrate against it, to call on the other States to co-operate in procuring its repeal, and, in doing this, they must, of necessity, call it unconstitutional, and, if so, in their opinion, null and void. Thus far I agree entirely with the language and substance of the resolutions. This, I suppose, is meant by the expression, interpose for arresting the progress of the evil. I see in those resolutions no assertion of the right contended for, as a constitutional and peaceable exercise of a veto, followed out by the doctrine that it is to continue until, on the application of Congress for an amendment, the States are to decide.

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

If these are the true deductions from the Virginia resolutions, I cannot agree to them, much as I revere the authority of the great statesman whose production they are. I cannot assent to them; and it is because I revere him, and admire his talents, that I cannot believe he intended to go this length. I cannot believe it, also, for another reason. He thought, and he conclusively proved, the alien and sedition laws to be deliberate, unconstitutional, and dangerous acts; he declared them so in his resolutions. Yet, sir, he never proposed that their execution should be resisted; he never uttered or wrote a word that looked like this doctrine, now contended for, of a constitutional right to arrest the execution of the law until amendments could be proposed. The right he asserted, when he alludes to resistance, was one that all acknowledge, that of opposition to intolerable and unconstitutional oppression. Mr. Jefferson, in the Kentucky resolutions, has used a word of equivocal authority, as well as signification: he asserts the right of a State to "nullify" an unconstitutional act. If he means by this any thing more than is contained in the Virginia resolutions, he must apply it to the extreme case of resistance, on the right of which there can be no contrariety of opinion: for Mr. Jefferson does not, if I read him aright, avow, any more than Mr. Madison does, the right now contended for, of a State veto, with its consequences. This, it appears to me, is a more modern invention, and, as I think I have proved, utterly incompatible with the nature of our Government. Was it ever conceived, before the present day, to form a part of it? If it was, why is it not alluded to in any of the debates of the Federal convention which framed, or the State conventions which adopted it? Surely it is of sufficient importance to have attracted attention, either as an advantage or an objection; yet not a word is said about it. Nay, more, if we refer to that luminous exposition of the whole character of the General Government, and of its expected operation, "The Federalist," not a word can be found that favors this idea of a veto, now for the first time set up as a part of our constitution. The constitution, its advocates, its opposers, the great contemporary exposition of its character, the practice under it for forty years, all silent on so important, so fundamental a doctrine! Is not this a fair, I might say a conclusive argument that it does not exist; that it is what I have indicated it to be, a modern invention? But this is not all: the case of a conflict of authority between the General and State authorities, under the new Government, was one that could not escape the foresight of the authors of "The Federalist." A series of chapters on this, and subjects connected with it, are found in that collection, written by Mr. Madison. Here would have been the place, certainly, to have developed the character and operation of this legal veto, if, in his opinion, it had existed. He could not have been silent on the subject. It is impossible that he could then have held the doctrines which are erroneously, in my opinion, said to be those of his Virginia resolutions. In the 44th number, in arguing the necessity of the article which makes the laws of the United States, made in pursuance of the constitution, paramount to the State constitutions, he says, if the State sovereignty had been left complete in this particular, among other absurd and dangerous consequences, "The world would have seen, for the first time, a system of government founded on an inversion of the fundamental principles of all government; it would have seen the authority of the whole society every where subordinate to the authority of the parts: it would have seen a monster in which the head was under the direction of the members." And, as more immediately applicable to the present subject, in the 46th number, he gives expressly what he supposes the only remedy for an "unwarrantable," by which he must mean unconstitutional measure. "On the other hand, (he says) should an unwarrantable measure of the Federal Government be unpopular in particular States, which would seldom fail to be the case, or even a warrantable measure be so, which may sometimes be the case, the means of opposition to it are powerful and at hand." Now, sir, if the new doctrine were the true one, if the veto were a constitutional measure, now we should hear of it! What more powerful? What more at hand? What more effectual? Why look for any other? Yet this constitutional right, so clearly deducible from the very terms of our national compact, never occurred to the very man whose doctrines, in 1798, are said erroneously, I again repeat, to embrace it. What are the remedies which he there points out? "The disquietude of the people, their repugnance, and, perhaps, refusal to co-operate with the officers of the Union, the frowns of the Executive magistracy of the State, the embarrassments created by legislative devices, which would often be added on such occasions, would oppose, in any State, difficulties not to be despised; would form, in a large State, very serious impediments; and where the sentiments of several adjoining States happened to be in unison, would present obstructions which the Federal Government would be hardly willing to encounter." These were the sentiments of Mr. Madison, in 1787; and such, I think, is the true construction of his language in 1798. For he goes on, in the same paper, to follow up the consequences of a perseverance of the Federal Government in unconstitutional measures, into the only result that all agree must, in extreme cases, happen—a resistance by force; and that he may not be misunderstood, makes it analogous to the case of the colonial resistance to Great Britain.

Although, in my opinion, in every case which can lawfully be brought within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, that tribunal must judge of the constitutionality of laws on which the question before them depends, and its decrees must be final, whether they affect State rights or not; and, as a necessary consequence, that no State has any right to impede or prevent the execution of such sentence; yet I am far from thinking that this Court is created an umpire to judge between the General and State Governments. I do not see it recorded in the instrument, but I see it recorded that every right not given is retained. In an extreme case that has been put, of the United States declaring that a particular State should have but one Senator, or should be deprived of its representation, I see nothing to oblige the State to submit this case to the Supreme Court; on the contrary, I see, by the enumeration of the cases and persons which may be brought within their jurisdiction, that this is not included; in this the injured State would have a right at once to declare that it would no longer be bound by a compact which had been thus grossly violated.

I consider the existence of the States, with that portion of their sovereignty which they have reserved, to be a most invaluable part of our Government; their rights should be most zealously watched over and preserved—preserved but not enlarged. An organized body, ready to resist either Legislative or Executive encroachment, round which the people, whenever oppressed, may rally, will always keep oppression in awe; they are an intermediate corps between the people and the Federal Government, and being a permanent one, they answer the same end in our Government that a hereditary aristocracy does in some others. They check the power of the federative head, while they themselves are kept within constitutional bounds by the direct operation of the general laws on their citizens through the Judiciary. Their agency and its effective utility were shown in 1798, in the stand which Virginia and some other States took against the obnoxious alien and sedition laws. They reasoned, they remonstrated, they appealed to the high feelings of patriotism and freedom, as well as to the understanding of the people; they demonstrated the usurpation of the power which had enacted these laws; they proved to conviction that they were void; and this had the desired effect. But they did not declare that the laws should not be executed; they did not array the force of the State against the decrees of the Judiciary; they did not interpose, or threaten to interpose, their constitutional veto.

But if the power contended for, on the one side, be dangerous, the doctrine by which it is opposed, on the other, seems no less so. If this be strictly a popular Government, as contended for by the Senator from Massachusetts, that is to say, a Government formed by the people of the United States, considered in one mass, without any consideration of the relation in which they stand to each other as citizens of different States, then the following important consequences follow. Not a denial of State rights, as has, I think, been incorrectly and unjustly, in and out of the House, charged to the Senator's argument: he expressly, as I understand him, acknowledges that they retain all that are not given to the General Government. But, sir, although his argument acknowledged the existence of the reserved rights, yet it took away the means of preserving them. If it be a popular Government in the sense I have described, then what a majority of the whole people will, must be executed, and rightfully executed. If this be the true construction of our fundamental compact, then, in any future changes that our situation may call for, the people of a few large States, making a majority of the whole number of voters, must give the law to the greater number of States, and may materially and injuriously alter or totally destroy the Union, which the argument supposes not to be a compact between the States, but the work of the people, that is to say, the whole people of the nation. It will be no answer to this to say, that alterations cannot be made in the constitution but by the assent of the States; because, if there is no compact, there is no injury to the States, any more than there would be by altering the boundaries or the representation of a county; or giving to or taking from it advantages which were enjoyed under a State constitution. The majority of the people of a State may do this at their pleasure, with regard to a county; so might a majority of the people of the United States do, with regard to a State, if the Government has the same popular character in the one instance that it has in the other. As to the impediments imposed by the constitution to the power of making alterations, by the clause which designates the mode in which they are to be made, by the assent of a requisite number of States, it affords no insurmountable difficulty. If the Government was made by the people, the same people have the right to alter it, and a majority may alter that clause with the same ease and the same right that they change any other in the constitution. It is plain, therefore, that this argument places three-fourths of the States at the mercy of one-fourth of their number. Six States having on an average a million of inhabitants each, form a majority of the population. In a popular government, the will of the majority must be obeyed in making or altering constitutions as well as laws; therefore, if this be a popular Government, without any feature of compact in it, there is plainly no security for even the existence of the State Governments under it. It is true, that the argument allows to them certain rights; but if those rights were the result of the will of the people, expressed by their adoption of a popular Government, is it not clear that whenever that will changes, and another kind of Government is preferred by a majority, the rights are gone, and rightfully gone? In short, the doctrine puts the States precisely in the situation of counties, or any other political division of a consolidated Government.

It is true, that, while the present form of Government exists, States are necessary for its organization; but if it be simply popular—if no compact enters into its composition, the State agency may be easily dispensed with in the new changes that a majority may deem expedient.

Observe, sir, that, by popular government, the Senator does not mean one adopted or made by the people of each State, acting separately in their State capacity; if he did, there would be no dispute: for it cannot be denied, that the constitution was adopted by the people of each State in its separate convention. This would not contravene the idea of a compact, which his argument totally denies. He means, and so I understand him clearly to express, a Government framed by the people of all the States, acting in their aggregate capacity; and this doctrine, for the reasons I have stated, I think dangerous in the highest degree. Even if no attempt be made under it, it will, if acknowledged, lessen the dignity and utility of the State Governments; they will be considered as mere tenants of their power at the will of the Federal head; which will be looked to as the source of all honor and all profit. State rights will be disregarded, when held by so precarious a tenure; encroachments will be submitted to that would not be otherwise hazarded, until gradually we are prepared for a consolidated Government, which, on experiment, will be found to require more energy for its support over the extensive country which it must embrace; and then the dormant resolution on your Journals will be called up, and His Highness the President of the United States will be invested with dictatorial or protectorate powers, for an enlarged term, for life—and at last with reversion to his children. Sir, this is the natural consequence of the doctrine, should it be acquiesced in as correct, but not carried into effect in an immediate attempt against the State sovereignties. Suppose, however, the reverse should take place, and the citizens of a number of States, sufficient to constitute a large majority of the inhabitants of the Union, should become converts to the Senator's doctrine, and determine to exercise the lawful right which a majority of every consolidated Government has, to change the constitution. The minority of numbers, constituting, perhaps, two thirds of the number of States, are incredulous, and entertain the heretical opinion that there were certain portions of their State sovereignty never surrendered, and which they deem it a duty to defend. Can no case be imagined that may, by a diversity of local interests, produce such a state of things? and can the consequences be calmly considered by any lover of his country?

The most dangerous of all errors are those which give false impressions of fundamental political rights. When firmly convinced that they are true, it is thought a duty to defend them at the risk of life—at the expense of fortune. The tranquillity of the country is sacrificed, its institutions destroyed, and its dearest interests disregarded, by men, who, with the purest intentions, have adopted on trust the opinion of others, in whom they have confidence; and who are taught to believe that disobedience to legitimate authority is resistance to oppression, or the exercise of an unauthorized power is the assertion of a constitutional right. This consideration alone, it appears to me, should make us most tremblingly apprehensive of inculcating any new doctrine of this character; and it has made me scan with greater attention those which have been offered in this important branch of the debate. But, with a becoming distrust of my own judgment, and a proper respect for that of the Senators who have preceded me, I cannot but see, in the doctrines of all, excepting only those of my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. WOODBURY] dangers of the gravest cast. Those I have endeavored respectfully but decidedly to point out, and to state what are my own views on the subject, that they may be weighed and compared. I resume them.

I think that the constitution is the result of a compact entered into by the several States, by which they surrendered a part of their sovereignty to the Union, and vested the part so surrendered in a General Government.

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[MARCH 15, 1830.]

That this Government is partly popular, acting directly on the citizens of the several States; partly federative, depending, for its existence and action, on the existence and action of the several States.

That, by the institution of this Government, the States have unequivocally surrendered every constitutional right of impeding or resisting the execution of any decree or judgment of the Supreme Court, in any case of law or equity, between persons, or on matters, of whom, or on which, that court has jurisdiction, even if such decree or judgment should, in the opinion of the States, be unconstitutional.

That, in cases in which a law of the United States may infringe the constitutional right of a State, but which in its operation cannot be brought before the Supreme Court, under the terms of the jurisdiction expressly given to it over particular persons or matters, that court is not created the umpire between a State that may deem itself aggrieved, and the General Government.

That, among the attributes of sovereignty retained by the States, is that of watching over the operations of the General Government, and protecting its citizens against their unconstitutional abuse; and that this can be legally done—

First, in the case of an act, in the opinion of the State palpably unconstitutional, but affirmed in the Supreme Court in the legal exercise of its functions,

By remonstrating against it to Congress;

By an address to the people, in their elective functions, to change or instruct their Representatives;

By a similar address to the other States, in which they will have a right to declare that they consider the act as unconstitutional, and therefore void;

By proposing amendments to the constitution, in the manner pointed out by that instrument;

And, finally, if the act be intolerably oppressive, and they find the General Government persevere in enforcing it, by a resort to the natural right which every people have to resist extreme oppression.

Secondly, if the act be one of those few which, in its operation, cannot be submitted to the Supreme Court, and be one that will, in the opinion of the State, justify the risk of a withdrawal from the Union, that this last extreme remedy may at once be resorted to.

That the right of resistance to the operation of an act of Congress, in the extreme cases above alluded to, is not a right derived from the constitution, but can be justified only on the supposition that the constitution has been broken, and the State absolved from its obligation; and that, whenever resorted to, it must be at the risk of all the penalties attached to an unsuccessful resistance to established authority.

That the alleged right of a State to put a veto on the execution of a law of the United States, which such State may declare to be unconstitutional, attended (as, if it exist, it must be) with a correlative obligation on the part of the General Government, to refrain from executing it, and the further alleged obligation, on the part of that Government, to submit the question to the States, by proposing amendments, are not given by the constitution, nor do they grow out of any of the reserved powers.

That the exercise of the powers last mentioned would introduce a feature in our Government not expressed in the constitution, not implied from any right of sovereignty reserved to the States, not suspected to exist by the friends or enemies of the constitution, when it was framed or adopted, not warranted by practice, or contemporaneous exposition, nor implied by the true construction of the Virginia resolutions in '98.

That the introduction of this feature in our Government would totally change its nature, make it inefficient, invite to dissension, and end, at no distant period, in separation; and that, if it had been proposed in the form of an explicit provision in the constitution, it would have been unanimously rejected, both in the convention which framed that instrument, and in those which adopted it.

That the theory of the Federal Government, being the result of the general will of the people of the United States, in their aggregate capacity, and founded, in no degree, on compact between the States, would tend to the most disastrous practical results; that it would place three-fourths of the States at the mercy of one-fourth, and lead, inevitably, to a consolidated Government, and, finally, to monarchy, if the doctrine were generally admitted; and, if partially so, and opposed, to civil dissension.

These being my deliberate opinions on the nature and consequences of the constructions hitherto given of the Federal compact, and the obligations and rights of the States under it; deeming those constructions erroneous, and, in the highest degree, dangerous to the Union, I felt it a duty to my place, and to my country, to say so. Having done this, I ought, perhaps, to stop. But, sir, I dare not! I dare not stifle the expression of apprehensions which have fastened upon my mind.

It would be useless affectation to pretend ignorance of the discontent that prevails in an important section of the Union; its language is too loud, too decisive, too menacing, not to have been heard, and heard with the deepest concern. It has already been more than once alluded to, in this debate, in terms of severest censure. I shall not assume that tone, although I cannot but deprecate the light manner in which the greatest evil that can befall us is spoken of, as if it were an every day occurrence. Arguments for and against the dissolution of the Union are canvassed in the public papers; form the topic of dinner speeches; are condensed into toasts; and treated, in every respect, as if it were "a knot of policy that might be unloosed familiar as a garter." Sir, it is a Gordian knot, that can be severed only by the sword. The band cannot be unloosed until it is wet with the blood of brothers. I cannot, therefore, conscientiously, be silent; and, humbly as I think of my influence or powers of persuasion, I should feel myself guilty if they were not exerted in admonition to both parties in this eventful controversy. The tariff is the prominent grievance that excites the discontents in some of the Southern States, and particularly in South Carolina. It is denounced as unconstitutional, injurious to the whole country, ruinous to the South, and beneficial only to a particular interest in the North and East. My sentiments on this subject may be expressed in a very few words. A decided convert to the free trade system, I think it may be departed from in the few cases in which restrictions may be used, with a hope of producing a relaxation of similar restrictions by a foreign Power. I therefore believe the present tariff unwise, unequal, and oppressive in its operations, but I cannot think it unconstitutional. And I consider one of its worst consequences to be, that, when it has been long persisted in, and considered as the settled policy of the nation, so much of the capital and population of the country may be employed in the manufactures protected by it, as to make it a matter of serious calculation whether a sudden and total abandonment of the policy may not produce greater evil to the whole nation than the benefit to be expected from throwing open the trade. With these opinions on the subject of the Southern discontents, I enter largely into their feelings, and join them in lamenting a policy which operates so distressingly on their prosperity.

There is no doubt that, for some years past, the pecuniary difficulties of that part of the country have increased; that the value of property has diminished; and that, from a state of affluence, many of the citizens are, without extravagance or individual misfortune, greatly reduced in circumstances. But would it not be prudent calmly to consider whether all this distress is to be attributed to this one cause; whether the low price of the staples of that district (the immediate cause) has been produced by that measure; whether the actual price of imported goods, paying the duty, or the same kind of goods protected by it, have not, from other causes, been kept down nearly to their former value? And that, therefore, although they may lose the advantage which the fall of prices would have given, independent of the tariff, whether the actual expenditure is increased beyond that of former years; and if this should be the result, whether the evil is not of such a nature as may be borne, without recurring to extremities, in the hope, in the certain hope, that it will not be of long continuance.

For, sir, let them also consider the powerful agents that are at work for their relief. First, in point of efficiency, is the press. It may spread errors, but it also diffuses truths; and, with an intelligent, an educated people, such as ours, these last will ultimately prevail. Political Economy was but lately, with us, considered as a science: a false, but specious, and now exploded policy, usurped its place, under the imposing title of the American System. The true science was the subject of idle sneers and jests, by those who found it easier to adopt an old error than to study a new science, and to found political combinations upon sectional interests than to acquire popularity on the broad basis of the general good. These doctrines are in a course of examination; they cannot stand the test of theory, still less of practice. Sir, the professor is in his chair! the press is at work! and a powerful but demoralizing agent is demonstrating the truth of their science. The smuggler is abroad; his boats and cutters are in all your bays, and inlets, and rivers, on the Atlantic; his canoes are on your lakes; he is lurking in the woods of your frontier; and presently, sir, when your oppressive laws have become unpopular, he will come in at noonday, in defiance of them. You may seize and sue and prosecute; but when the feelings of the people, in such a Government as ours, are enlisted against the laws, you cannot execute them; and this is one of the worst consequences of the restrictive system—an unavoidable consequence. Oaths are disregarded, evasions of the law considered as proofs of genius; and the agent, or captain, who has most address in defeating the officers of the customs, is sure to be most employed. Let any one who doubts this look back to the times of non-intercourse and embargo. How many vessels bound from Charleston or New Orleans to New York, blown by irresistible gales from Sandy Hook to Liverpool; how many false log books, how many perjured protests, how many acquittals against evidence; presenting a mass of perjury, fraud, and combination to defeat the laws, perpetrated by men, in every other view respectable, but who had become contaminated by the corrupt influence of these demoralizing laws. In every country in the world, high duties have been defeated by illicit trade; it is inevitable; no cause is more certain of producing its effect; it will be so forever. If the morals of the country are correct, it will corrupt them. If the frontier is small and guarded, the officers will be bribed; if it is extensive, their vigilance will be avoided. If France, with thirteen thousand men, and England, with a fleet of revenue cutters, cannot prevent it, what can be expected from our insignificant revenue force, on a coast of more than two thousand miles, and an inland frontier of the same extent? These causes will disgust those, for whose exclusive use the system was intended, with its operation, and, at the same time, convince the people of its injustice. It is possible, also, that the improvements in machinery, and the competition fostered by the protection, may reduce the price of some of the domestic articles, so as materially to lessen the evil.

But, if these should fail, I cannot but place great reliance on an address to the justice of the nation, and do not believe, when, in the confidence of private correspondence, the venerable Jefferson, in a moment of warmth and irritation, said of the Representatives of the nation, "that you might as well reason with the marble columns which surround them," that he uttered the cool dictate of his judgment. No, sir, he had a higher idea of the value of representation in Government. In a debate like this, on the importance of the Union, his genius would have drawn a different illustration from those objects which surround us, and sustain the dome under which we deliberate. What were they originally? Worthless heaps of unconnected sand and pebbles, washed apart by every wave; blown asunder by every wind. What are they now? Bound together by an indissoluble cement of nature: fashioned by the hand of skill, they are changed into lofty columns, the component parts and the support of a noble edifice, symbols of the union and strength on which, alone, our Government can rest; solid within, polished without: standing firm only by the rectitude of their position, they are emblems of what Senators of the United States should be, and teach us that the slightest obliquity of position would prostrate the structure, and draw, with their own fall, that of all they support and protect, in one mighty ruin.

A distrust of the justice and good feeling of one part of the Union by another, is a most dangerous symptom; it ought not to be indulged, even when occasional circumstances justify it. A distrust of the justice of the whole is still more fatal. How can we hope for ready obedience to our laws, if the people are taught to believe in a permanent hostility of one part of the Union towards another; and that every appeal made by reason and argument to their common head is vain? Perseverance will do much; for, even if the illustration which has been made of party obduracy, were just, we should remember that the hardest marble is worn by a succession of drops; much more may we hope that prejudice, however strong, will yield to the claims of justice, frequently enforced by a repetition of sound argument.

Menace is unwise, because it is generally ineffectual; and of all menaces, that which strikes at the existence of the Union is the most irritating. Have those who thus rashly use it, who endeavor to familiarise the people to the idea, have they, themselves, ever done what they recommend? Have they calculated, have they considered, what one, two, or three States would be, disjointed from the rest? Are they sure they would not be disjointed themselves? That parts of any State, which might try the hazardous experiment, might not prefer their allegiance to the whole? Even if civil war should not be the consequence of such disunion—an exemption from which I cannot conceive the possibility—what must be the state of such detached parts of the mighty whole? Dependence on foreign alliances for protection against brothers and friends; degradation in the scale of nations; disposed of by the protocols of allied monarchs to one of their dependents, like the defenceless Greeks. But I will not enlarge on this topic, so fruitful of the most appalling apprehensions. Disunion! the thought itself, the means by which it may be effected, its frightful and degrading consequences, the idea, the very mention of it, ought to be banished from our debates, from our minds. God deliver us from this worst, this greatest evil. All others we can resist and overcome; encroachments upon individual or State rights cannot, under our representative Government, be long or oppressively persevered in. There are legitimate and effectual means to correct any palpable infraction of our constitution. Try them all before recourse is had to the menace of this worst of evils. But when an honest difference of construction exists, surely such extreme means or arguments ought not to be resorted to. Let the cry of unconstitutional oppression be justly raised within these walls, and it will be heard abroad—it will be examined. The people are intelligent; the people are just; and in time these characteristics must have an effect upon their Representatives. But let the cry of danger to the Union be heard, and it will be echoed from the White to the Rocky mountains; every patriotic heart will beat high with indignation; every hand will draw a sword in its defence. Let the partisans on either side of this argument be assured that the people will not submit to consolidation, nor suffer disunion; and that their good sense will detect the fallacy of arguments which lead to either.

Sir, I have done. I have uttered the sincere dictates of my best judgment, on topics closely connected with our dearest interests. I have, because it was my duty, uttered them freely; without reserve, but, I hope, without offence; with the respect that was due to the opinion of others, and with a becoming diffidence of my own. It would be a cause of great regret if I should have misrepresented the tendency of any of the doctrines of which I have spoken. It would have been a greater, if, thinking of them as I do, I had omitted the animadversions which I thought their consequences required.

Gentlemen have spoken, with patriotic enthusiasm, of the consolation they would receive, at their last moments, in seeing the flag of their country display to their dying eyes its emblems of union and glory. The period when mine must be closed in night is too near to refer to it the duration of my country's happiness. But I can anticipate for that beloved country a continuance of freedom and prosperity, long after the distant, I hope the far distant day, when the last of those honorable men shall have finished his useful career. I can apprehend for it the worst of evils before any one of them shall quit the stage. These hopes are founded on the exertions of active and enlightened patriotism to preserve the Union; these fears, on the madness of party that may destroy it.

[From the 16th to the 22nd of March, excepting Saturday and Sunday, the discussion of private bills and Executive matters chiefly consumed the hours of business of the Senate.]

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1830.

MOUNTED INFANTRY BILL.

Mr. BENTON moved that all the bills preceding bill No. 119 should be postponed, for the purpose of taking up and considering that bill. The Senate agreed to the motion, and that bill was then taken up, and read by the Secretary. It consisted of a single section, and proposed to vest the President with authority to mount and equip ten companies of the army of the United States, to be employed as the public service might require, and appropriated the sum of — dollars for the purchase and equipment of the horses. After it was read, Mr. B. proposed to add a second section, to appropriate the sum of — dollars for purchasing forage for the horses for the remainder of the present year; stating that his object was to keep the appropriations for the different branches of the service distinct and separate. The motion to add the second section was agreed to: and, after stating that he should move, at the proper time, to fill the blank in the first section with thirty-three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, and that in the second one with eighteen thousand seven hundred and fifty, he [Mr. B.] entered into a particular examination of the nature of the bill, and advocated its policy and utility. He first remarked upon the terms, or phraseology of the bill, which were to authorize—not to require—the President to cause the ten companies to be mounted; and which gave him a discretion over the number of companies to be mounted, not exceeding the limitation expressed in the bill. Such a discretion was properly vested in the President, who, being charged with the defence of the country, and responsible for the safety of the frontiers, should have some authority to use the species of force which the occasion required; and that the present President preferred mounted men for the kind of service—defence against Indians—which this bill contemplated, was a fact as well known by the events of his military career as by the communication of his sentiments on the particular subject of this bill. The Missouri Legislature, the officers of the army on the Western frontier, and all the citizens of the West, interested in the question; the President, the Secretary at War, and the Quarter Master General, Jesup, have united their voices in favor of the species of force which this bill contemplates; and the granting of it may justly be considered as one of the highest objects of Western hope and desire. One object of the measure is, to give defence and protection to the trading caravans between Missouri and Mexico—caravans which annually bring home large sums of gold and silver, and now experience continued losses, in lives and property, for want of the species of protection which this bill proposes to give. Another object, and a more extensive one, is to provide an adequate and appropriate defence for the Western frontier, and that in its whole extent, from the Sabine to the Falls of St. Anthony, and thence to Green Bay, at the upper end of Lake Michigan. This line of defence is largely upwards of a thousand miles in length, covering the frontiers of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, and the new territory upon the upper Mississippi. To those two objects a third one, also of great importance—the security of the fur trade, now a dangerous pursuit to our own citizens on our own soil—must be added. For all those objects—for the just and necessary defence of the frontiers, the fur trade, and the Mexican trade—a mounted force is indispensable. The Indians who infest the frontiers, and attack the caravans and traders, are all mounted on fleet and durable horses, which live on grass, and are trained to war and hunting. They come, and go, like Arabs—the attack and the flight being instantaneous. Our soldiers are all on foot, and can oppose no appropriate movements to these sudden and flying assaults. They may repulse an attack, but they cannot pursue, cannot chastise, cannot reconnoitre; cannot venture to quit the column when marching, the camp, or the garrison, when stationary, without danger of being cut off; and that in sight of their companions, who for want of horses are unable to get to their relief. The reports of all the officers from the West, and of all the caravans, attest the truth of this distressing fact. The country where these troops are to act is open and champagne. It is a connexion of interminable prairies, destitute of large forests, and covered with grass; it is the native theatre for horsemen, the prairies giving them a clear stage for action, and the grass furnishing subsistence for horses, and attracting and supporting game for the subsistence of men. This is the character of the country upon the whole frontier beyond the Mississippi, and indefinitely to the West. Every where—at every point—from the Sabine round to the Wisconsin, the open prairie country approaches the frontier, and lays open the settlements to the danger of inroads from mounted barbarians. Men, on foot, pursuing a march on such boundless plains, seem to stand still; Indians, mounted on horseback, gallop round them with impunity. They approach the garrisons; kill and scalp men in its view, and gallop off in triumph. A mounted force, on our part, is indispensable. It is the appropriate defence of the Western frontier. The ten companies provided for in the bill will give us that defence. They will make a corps of regular rangers, or land fencibles; such as all Governments have used, and such as we need more than any Government ever did. Every post, and every garrison, from the Gulf of Mexico to the lakes—from Louisiana to Canada—should have its proportion of this mounted corps. When necessary, the companies at different posts may be united, and form an expedition, either to meet and repulse expected incursions of the Indians, or to pursue and chastise marauders, or to visit hostile towns. The service to which the corps can be applied is general and indefinite; it can go wherever the public interest requires. The Western frontier now demands it; but the Southern or Northern frontier may receive its aid when necessary. The horses may form the basis for cavalry, of which the army is now destitute; the men may be learnt the use of the sword and pistol, of which our magazines now contain a useless supply. Some companies of flying artillery may be trained. It will elevate the character of the service, induce better men to enlist, and diminish desertions by giving active and attractive employment. The President may mount the whole corps at once, or less; he has a discretion; he may mount a part now, and the remainder as necessity may seem to require. He may do as he thinks best; but, in my opinion, the whole ten companies will be little enough to guard the extended frontier of the West, and to perform the variety of service for which they are intended. Every year American blood is spilt upon American soil. Every year American citizens are killed and robbed, pursuing a lawful commerce, upon the soil of their country. The road to Mexico is stained with their blood; savage Indians are loaded with their spoils; families are reduced to want. In the region of the fur trade, where the Indians are excited by the British, the destruction of lives and property is horrible. The report of Gen. Clark and Gov. Cass, made at the last session of Congress, estimates the loss of lives, in this trade, at upwards of four hundred; the loss of property at about five hundred thousand dollars. The destruction of lives and property is still going on, and will go on, until the troops of the Federal Government shall make an appearance beyond the Mississippi, calculated to impress respect and fear upon the savage mind. Horses alone will enable them to make that appearance. General Ashley, with his mounted men, traverses the continent in safety; goes to the Buenaventura, and Multnomah, and returns in safety. For want of horses our soldiers are pursued, surrounded, insulted, harassed, and assassinated. Read the report of Major Riley, and see what his detachment suffered for want of horses. The mounted force is indispensable; it is the appropriate, and the only appropriate, defence for the West; it is the true and adequate, and the only true and adequate, protection for the fur trade, the Mexican trade, and the whole line of the Western frontier. It is the security, and the only security, for the tranquillity of the frontiers, the preservation of lives, and the protection of two great branches of Western commerce. This being shown, the great fact of the necessity of this species of force being established; I feel confident that the consideration of the expense that may attend it, which is the next point to be examined, will present but little difficulty to the Senate. The mounted force being necessary, the cost of it, I feel persuaded, will not be an over-ruling consideration, although that cost should be large, when, in point of fact, it will be small, and, in comparison to its object, inconsiderable and insignificant. Five hundred horses will be wanted for ten companies of fifty men each; the price of these horses, and their maximum price, will be fifty dollars each. This will make twenty-five thousand dollars for the purchase of the horses. Their equipment in saddles, bridles, halters, &c. will not exceed seventeen or eighteen dollars each. Seven or eight thousand dollars will defray the expense of equipment; so that the sum proposed for filling the first blank, thirty-three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, will meet the first and greatest expense to be incurred. Subsistence is the next item in expense. The Quartermaster General, (General Jesup) estimates this item at fifty dollars a year for each horse, which is nearly a dollar a week; but I must differ from him in this estimate, and do it without derogating from his high and established character for correctness, because, living in the country where the horses are to be employed, I have a local knowledge on this subject which he could not possess. I reduce the expense of forage to less than one-half of his estimate. I make this reduction upon these data: First. The horses will live upon grass full one-half of the year; and that will reduce the Quartermaster General's estimate one-half. Secondly. The cost of keeping horses, among the farmers in Missouri, is about seventy-five cents a week, including care and attention as well as food; consequently soldiers can keep their own for less than a dollar a week, when forage alone is to be paid for; and of that forage, the hay will cost nothing, for the soldiers cut it in the prairies without expense, and haul it in with the garrison teams. Upon these data the annual subsistence of the horses will be nearer to twenty dollars than to fifty dollars each. I think ten thousand dollars will be enough for their annual forage; but I have proposed to fill the second blank with eighteen thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars for the remainder of the present year, according to the estimate of the Quartermaster, and leave it to time and experience to ascertain the true amount. This will make the total appropriation, for the present year, about fifty thousand dollars. For each subsequent year it will probably be about fifteen thousand dollars, say ten or twelve thousand dollars for forage, and the remainder to supply the waste of horses and equipments. This is nothing compared to the magnitude and variety of the objects which require the expenditure. It is nothing in comparison to the good to be accomplished. It is a grain of sand to a mountain, compared to the annual expenditures for Atlantic objects of defence; compared to the annual expenditures for fortifications for the defence of the sea coast; compared to the annual expenditure for navy yards, light houses, and ships of war, for the safety and accommodation of maritime commerce. But, small and inconsiderable as this expenditure for the mounted force appears, there is still another point of view under which it is to be looked at, and which reduces it still lower, and, in fact, annihilates it as an object of expense, and converts it into a piece of economy. It is this: That, for the want of these horses, large sums are now expended in chartering steamboats for moving troops in the Western country, and for volunteer mounted gun men. The infantry have to be transported; and for this purpose steamboats are chartered. They need horsemen, and for this purpose, mounted volunteers are accepted. Every Indian alarm on the frontiers renews the expense of these boats and volunteers; and the expense is heavy in proportion to the suddenness of the alarm, the magnitude of the apparent danger, and the distance to be traversed. The Illinois volunteers, which went to the Winnebago country three years ago, cost about forty thousand dollars. The Missouri volunteers, for the last summer, when the alarm broke out on the frontier of that State, are not yet paid, but their claims are considerable. On both occasions steamboats were chartered. The movement of Major Riley's detachment last summer must also have involved some expenditure for transportation. I know these various items to be considerable, and that they have been incurred, and must be incurred, just so long as we remain without horses. The exact amount of what has been expended heretofore is unknown to me; the amount that may be expended hereafter, cannot be foreseen. It will depend upon the frequency and magnitude of the alarms on the frontiers—alarms which must arise upon every point of a line, of more than a thousand miles in length, covering the settlements of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, and the new territory upon the Upper Mississippi.

The amount of these casual and unforeseen expenditures may be safely assumed to be equal to the expense of keeping up the ten companies proposed in the bill. I make this assumption advisedly, and would be willing to stake the passage of the bill upon the quartermaster general's opinion of the fact, if the passage of such a bill, in the judgment of any statesman, ought to depend upon such a fact. In this point of view, and I fully believe it to be correct, the annual keeping up of the ten companies of mounted infantry will be no expense at all; there will be as much, or more, saved from steamboat transportation and mounted volunteers, as will balance the expense of these horses. At the same time the mounted horsemen will be infinitely more efficient, and incomparably more satisfactory to the West; so that the whole question of passing the bill reduces itself to the mere problem of good will to the Western country, without expense to the Federal treasury. Mr. B. concluded with expressing his thanks to the Senate for taking up the bill before its turn; stating the necessity for it to pass immediately, as the Santa Fe caravan would set out from Missouri in May; and declaring his readiness to answer any questions which might be put to him for the further information of any Senator.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he saw no objection to the passage of this bill. It read, that the number of men to be mounted was not to exceed ten companies, and of course, the President, at his discretion, would not cause that number to be mounted, if a less number should be found sufficient. This was, indeed, but an experiment, and, if it proved successful, it might become necessary to carry it farther. He had examined into the subject and become fully acquainted with it, and was, therefore, satisfied of the utility and importance of the measure proposed by the bill. The trade to Mexico was very great, and the hazards to which it was exposed were equally great. It demanded protection; and this bill would operate in the same manner and on the same principle as the protection given by the Government to our merchant ships on the high seas.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

[On Wednesday, the 24th, and Thursday, the 25th of March, the Senate was chiefly occupied in the consideration of Executive business.]

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1830.

PURCHASERS OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, the bill for the relief of the purchasers of public lands was taken up; the question being on certain amendments to the amendments made by the House of Representatives, proposed by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MCKINLEY said that although he thought that the amendments, proposed by the Committee of the Senate, rendered the bill somewhat better than it was, as it came from the House of Representatives, yet, as it had been delayed so long, he thought it would do more good to the people for whose relief it was intended, to pass it and reject the amendments, than farther to delay the bill. This was his wish, and he hoped the Committee on Public Lands would consent to it. After some farther remarks from Mr. MCK. the two amendments were rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that, however much he regretted the necessity of retarding the progress of this bill, yet there was one amendment which he felt it his duty to propose. He regretted that the complexion of this bill had been so much changed since it passed the Senate. The whole bill had been stricken out, and the present substituted by way of amendment. The second section of the bill proposed to give a preference, in becoming the purchasers of relinquished lands, to those who had relinquished a pre-emption in favor of the persons in possession. But the conditions of this pre-emption totally destroyed the benefit intended to be conferred. It required the person purchasing under this section of the bill to pay the present minimum price, and in addition thereto the amount paid before relinquishment, subject to thirty-seven and a half per cent on the last mentioned sum, provided that the whole amount shall not in any case exceed three dollars and fifty cents per acre. Now, [said Mr. H.] this is worse than the law as it now stands. As the law now is, the person in possession, it is true, must go into market and compete with others; but nobody will bid against him, and the result will be that the person in possession will get the lands he relinquished, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. This section, however valuable it might be to other portions of the Union, brought no relief to the people he had the honor to represent. The effect of this provision would be to keep the relinquished lands so much longer out of market, for nobody would take the pre-emption given where the lands had originally been purchased at the minimum price, and where they can, after the termination of the prescribed time, be had at the present minimum price. Mr. H. then moved to amend the second section of the bill, by inserting in the 27th line, at the close of the first proviso, the following words: "And that the persons aforesaid, in all cases where the lands relinquished were originally purchased at the minimum price, shall have the right of pre-emption, as aforesaid, on payment of the present minimum price."

Mr. MCKINLEY said that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] had his entire approbation, if the whole bill could be made to conform to it. But if he would examine, he would find this amendment in opposition to the whole policy of the bill. Many attempts had been made in Congress to relieve those who had relinquished their lands, and applied the payments made thereon to other lands retained. Several bills had passed the Senate for that purpose, and the great difficulty had always been in reducing lands which had originally sold at two dollars an acre, under the credit system, to one dollar and twenty-five cents, the minimum price under the cash system. The subject had often been referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he had invariably refused his sanction to any bill which did not give the treasury one dollar and twenty-five cents in addition to the first instalment. The present bill was submitted to him, which makes the minimum price three dollars and fifty cents; but does not relieve those who have purchased at two dollars an acre, from paying one dollar and twenty-five cents in addition to the first instalment. The relief intended by this bill for that class of purchasers is the deduction of thirty-seven and a half per cent. on the remaining instalments, and the additional advantage of taking scrip for the amount paid on all lands which did not cost more than two dollars and fifty cents per acre.

The relinquished lands are placed upon a better footing than those which had reverted, because the first instalment to be paid on those, was subjected to a discount of thirty-seven and a half per cent; which, upon land costing but two dollars, would bring the whole amount to be paid to but one dollar fifty-six and a quarter cents. The bill was not devised by either House. It was framed to suit the views of the Land Office, and calculated for the benefit of the treasury. It would prove altogether useless to those who might derive benefit from it, if impediments were thrown in the way of its passage at this period of the session. He hoped, therefore, that gentlemen would withdraw all amendments, and suffer it to pass in the shape it had been returned from the House, rather than run the risk of losing whatever good would result from it. There were large classes of citizens who would derive benefit from the provisions of the bill as it now stood. The purchasers of public lands, who had not yet fulfilled their engagements, and those whose lands had reverted to the Government for non-payment, would receive benefit from it. He observed, that, if the Senator from Indiana [Mr. H.] would examine the bill a little farther, he would find that the class of purchasers which he wished to protect, would ultimately have to pay only one dollar and fifty-six and a quarter cents per acre, after deducting the discount provided for by the bill. He observed that it was not such a bill as he was desirous of having; but, he believed, from the discussion and the modification it had undergone in the other House, that it could not be got through that House again, if embarrassed with any farther amendments. It was true it did not suit all, but we had to take such an one as we could get; not such as we would desire.

Mr. KING said he very much regretted that his friend from Indiana had thought it necessary to offer this amendment. Our objects are the same, [said Mr. K.] we both wish to extend relief to those who have been compelled, from inability to pay, to relinquish a portion of their lands necessary to their settlement; we both wish to keep the actual cultivators of the soil from the grasp of the speculator; and, sir, I am confident, if the Senator from Indiana had examined this bill with his usual attention, he would agree with me that these objects are fully and fairly attained. What, I would ask, are the provisions of this bill? The first section gives to those whose lands have been forfeited for non-payment of the purchase money the right to purchase them at private sale for the minimum price of the Government, in addition to the amount already paid and forfeited; but in no case shall the sum to be paid exceed three dollars and fifty cents the acre; with this the Senator from Indiana is perfectly satisfied. I will say to the gentleman, that the principle of the first section, of which he approves, is precisely the principle contained in the second, which he proposes to amend. No relinquished lands are to cost the purchaser more than three dollars and fifty cents the acre; this is the maximum. Take the case put by the Senator: lands which cost two dollars the acre, have been relinquished; the payment made was fifty cents; from this sum, thirty-seven and a half per cent. is to be deducted, and the remainder added to the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents, which makes precisely one dollar fifty-six and a quarter cents the acre, the amount to be paid under this bill, for lands of this description. Is not my friend convinced, by this view of the provisions of this section of the bill, that he has labored under an error, when he supposed that the purchasers of two dollar lands would be compelled to pay more than the original cost? Is he not convinced that the section he proposes to amend is in strict conformity with the principle contained in the first section? And will he not, if convinced of the correctness of the view I have taken, consent to withdraw his amendment, which must, if persevered in, and with success, greatly delay the passage of this most important bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS replied that he understood the second condition of the first section of the bill more favorably to the purchasers of reverted lands than the Senator from Alabama. The case was one of sheer calculation. On the subject of reverted lands, to which the first section of the bill solely applied, the legal holder is permitted to obtain his final receipt and patent, by paying the residuary payments according to the present minimum, and on the principle of the land which expired on the 4th of July last. For instance, if there be three payments due, the purchaser gets his patent for a quarter section, on payment of one hundred and fifty dollars, where the land has originally been purchased at the minimum price. The second section applies to relinquished lands, and requires the pre-emption to pay on a quarter section the present minimum two hundred dollars, in addition to the amount paid before relinquishment, with a deduction of thirty-seven and a half per cent. on such original sum. It is manifest, then, that the purchaser of relinquished lands has much harder terms than the person paying out lands reverted. If, on the reverted quarter section, there has been two instalments paid, all that remains to be paid by the bill is one hundred dollars. If, on the relinquished quarter section there has been two instalments paid, the purchaser is required by the bill to pay the whole minimum price, two hundred dollars, and also to pay the two instalments paid before relinquishment, getting thirty-seven and a-half per cent. discount on them, making in all three hundred dollars. The Senators from Alabama [said Mr. H.] admit, that in cases of relinquished lands on which there had been one payment, and where it had been originally purchased at minimum cost, it would, according to this bill, cost the purchaser one dollar and fifty-six and a fourth cents per acre. Now this is exactly that of which I complain, and say it is unreasonable that these lands should cost more than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, because that is their price, if you say nothing about this in the bill; that is the present minimum. The bill will, as before said, have a tendency to keep these lands longer out of market, for nobody will give more than one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre for them. It will [said Mr. H.] be no advantage to the people I represent, unless giving a longer time for purchasers to prepare for the sales be an advantage.

Mr. McKINLEY said that, by referring to the second section of the bill, not a doubt would remain. He would read it, as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all purchasers, their heirs, or assignees, of such of the public lands of the United States as were sold on credit, and which lands have, by such persons, been relinquished under any of the laws passed for the relief of purchasers of public lands, and the amount paid thereon applied in payment of other lands retained by them, and which relinquished lands, or any part thereof, may now be in possession of such persons; or in case the certificate of purchase, and part payment of said lands, has been transferred by the persons now in the possession of said lands, or part thereof, or the persons under whom the present occupants may hold such possession, to some other person not in possession thereof, and the payment made thereon applied by such other person, or his assignee, in payment for land held in his own name: in either case, the persons so in possession shall have the right of pre-emption of the same lands, according to the legal subdivisions of sections, not exceeding the quantity of two quarter sections, [in contiguous tracts] until the fourth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, upon their paying into the proper office the sum per acre therefor, which shall, at the time of payment, be the minimum price per acre of the United States' public lands; and, in addition thereto, the same amount per acre heretofore paid thereon, and applied to other lands, subject to a deduction of thirty-seven and a half per centum on the last mentioned sum: Provided, That the sum to be paid shall not, in any case, exceed three dollars and fifty cents per acre: Provided, also, That such persons only shall be entitled to the benefits of this section who shall apply for the same, and prove their possession to the satisfaction of the Register and Receiver of the district in which the land may lie, in the manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, within nine months from the passage of this act; for which such Register and Receiver shall each be entitled to receive from such applicants the sum of fifty cents, each: And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not extend to any lands that have, in any manner, been disposed of by the United States."

He could not be mistaken, [Mr. McK. remarked] because the second section provided against the difficulty apprehended by the gentleman; the cost, by any calculation, would only be one dollar and fifty-six cents per acre. Would the Senator from Indiana desire to place those who had relinquished their lands on a better footing than those who had retained them? Those who had retained their lands were certainly more meritorious than those who had relinquished, and obtained the benefit of their money in the purchase of other lands. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would see the propriety of passing the bill as it was, and abandon his amendment.

Mr. McLEAN said that, when the amendment was first proposed, he was clearly of opinion that it ought to pass. If the bill was intended to do any good to Illinois and Indiana, the amendment ought to be retained, otherwise it would only benefit the State of Alabama. With us, [said Mr. McL.] land is never worth more than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, because there is much land in the market, and little demand for it. He was satisfied that the bill should pass without the amendment, as it would benefit Alabama, and do no injury to his State, except to postpone, for nine months, the purchase of relinquished lands; though the passage of the bill, with the amendment, would give to the citizens of Illinois an advance of nine months. The delay would occasion no great difficulty in his State, as one neighbor never purchased the land on which another is settled. The amendment would be a convenience to us, [said he] for, as the bill stands, it will be of no earthly benefit to us.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS was rejected.

The amendments of the House were then concurred in.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

The bill "to re-organize the establishment of the Attorney General, and erect it into an Executive Department," was taken up for a second reading.

Mr. ROWAN rose to explain the objects of the bill, which, he said, was of importance to the fiscal concerns of the country, which have occasionally been injured by reason of the incompetency of the United States' District Attorneys. The Treasury would also be benefited by the enactment of the bill. It is provided that, after suit shall have been ordered in any case whatever, no Collector of a District, Clerk of a Circuit or District Court, United States' District Attorney, or any other person than the Marshal of the United States, shall be authorized to receive the money from any such debtor or debtors, but in all cases payment shall be made to the Marshal of the District where the suit has taken place. The duties of the Agent of the Treasury are, by the bill, transferred to, and vested in, the Attorney General. It has been also believed by the Committee that a transfer of the Patent Office to the Department of Law would be an improvement. It has been thought that all the duties connected with the Patent Office, which are now required by law to be performed by the Secretary of State, and all applications which are required to be submitted to him, ought to be performed by, and submitted to, the Attorney General. The Secretary has now to undergo considerable inconvenience and trouble by those duties being imposed upon him, and it has been deemed proper to consign them all, by bill, to the Attorney General. The bill also provides that the publication of the laws of the United States shall be done under the superintendence of the Attorney General—a duty which is now assigned to the Secretary of State. The Clerk who is now charged with this duty in the State Department is to be transferred to the Law Department. This measure has been suggested by the consideration that the Secretary of State may not be, as he is not required to be, a professional man. It is supposed that this duty can be better done by an individual who is still engaged in the profession of the law than by one who is not.

Mr. R. said he did not know whether the bill would be objected to by any gentleman. If agreed to, it would relieve the State Department from those duties which have suggested the project of establishing a Home Department, a measure urged by the former Executive. The Secretary of State will then be left to the conducting of the foreign relations of the country, while the business of the Patent Office, and the superintendence of the collection of debts due the Government, will be confined to the Head of this Department. The Attorney General is to be the Head of the Law Department; he is required to superintend all suits in which the United States is a party; and his practice is confined to the Supreme Court—cases in inferior Courts to be conducted by deputy. All the duties performed by, and all the powers and authority vested in, the Agent of the Treasury, are proposed to be transferred to the Attorney General. We have been told [said Mr. R.] that the Government has sustained serious losses from the improper manner of collecting the revenue, and from the mode of prosecuting defaulters.

Mr. WEBSTER, in a sportive manner, warned Mr. R. not to infringe on the secret session discussions.

Mr. ROWAN said, he was not aware that he was guilty of any violation of the rules in what he said; and he then proceeded to state the evils resulting from the present mode of collecting the revenue, and of instituting suits against delinquents. These evils the bill was intended to remedy. The Attorney General is now a member of the cabinet; and this measure, if carried into effect, will not impose upon him more duties than what, as a member of the cabinet, he is now required to discharge.

[The bill farther provided that an Assistant should be appointed by Congress to the Attorney General, who was also to act as Chief Clerk in the Law Department, at a salary of three thousand dollars per annum, besides Assistant Clerks, Messengers, &c. The salary of the Attorney General was to be placed on a level with that of the other Heads of Departments, namely, six thousand dollars per annum.]

Mr. WEBSTER said, this was a subject which certainly required consideration. He was opposed to the objects of the bill altogether, although he agreed that the evils complained of, which it proposed to remedy, existed. The business of the Departments had outgrown the provision made for their establishment; the business had outgrown what the organization of the Departments contemplated, especially that of the State Department; and so far as the bill proposed to remedy this evil, the objects of it were justifiable. But it proposes to transfer the duties of the Patent Office, with its clerks and officers to the Attorney General—to the Law Department. Mr. W. objected to any measure which would give this anomalous, this ambiguous character to the Attorney General, while he was at the same time shut out from practising in any other than the Supreme Court of the United States. You would thus [said Mr. W.] turn him into a half accountant, a half lawyer, a half clerk—in fine, a half of every thing, and not much of any thing. The true course will be, to have a Home Department, if you choose to call it by that name; a Department, he meant, for the management of the internal affairs of the country. This subject had hitherto undergone discussion, and was referred to a select committee, of which he, in company with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JOHNSON] had the honor to be a member. We recommended the organization of a Home Department, leaving the Attorney General as he is, a lawyer, to attend to the business of the Government in the Supreme Court. Mr. W. said he was also opposed to the provision of the bill transferring the duties and powers of the Agent of the Treasury to the Attorney General. The subordinate collectors of moneys ought to be attached to the Treasury; whoever is concerned in collecting the revenue ought to be under the Treasury Department, the Agent of which is one of the most important and useful officers we have. It requires a professional man—an appropriate character to fill it. The Agent of the Treasury has a jumble of duties to perform: he has to superintend all the light-houses &c. on the coast, and, in addition, is Agent for the Treasury in collecting the public debts. His [Mr. W's] object was to give force and efficiency to that office. He and a gentleman, formerly a member of the other House, who is now abroad, reported at one time a bill to establish an office to be called that of "Commissioner of Customs." Our object was to have appointed a competent man, who understood the laws, and could supervise the collection of the revenue—one who would be qualified to see that these laws received an uniform construction: for this was not, nor is it now, the case. Under the same law, different regulations had, to his own knowledge, been adopted in the custom houses of New York and Boston. The Boston Collector gave it one interpretation; the New York Collector gave it another; and the Treasury gave it a different interpretation from both, or, he believed, no interpretation at all. To tell the truth, the honorable gentleman to whom he alluded and he [Mr. W.] gave up the project, for already, in that stage of it, we had numerous applicants for the office, none of whom were competent to fill it. Every one who had lost a place of any description, who had been removed from a land office, or any other office, all who wanted employment in general or particular, were candidates for the situation of Commissioner of Customs. But our object being to appoint a competent man, we had to abandon the measure. The Attorney General had, in Mr. W's opinion, enough to do in the Supreme Court. He should be engaged in studying his books of law, instead of superintending the Clerks of either a Patent or Treasury office. He had not, he said, when he rose, any intention of occupying the Senate so long; his object was to ask the gentleman who reported the bill to consent to a postponement of the consideration of it, and appoint for it a particular day. It was necessary that some provision should be made to remedy the evils complained of, although he was opposed to the present bill. He would, when the subject was brought before the Senate again, take up the report accompanying the bill, to which he had adverted.

Friday next was then fixed upon for considering the bill.

MONDAY, MARCH 29, 1830.

The Senate was this day principally occupied in the consideration of Executive business.

TUESDAY, MARCH 30, 1830.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. FOOT, and Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, addressed the Senate as follows:

It is no vain ambition of display here, but a deep sense of my public duty, [said Mr. J.] that induces me to trespass on the time and patience of the Senate. I have waited until every gentleman has spoken: the topics are exhausted; the attention wearied; the excitement has passed away; and I have neither the spirit nor talent to revive the interest or give animation to the debate. The novel principles, and, as I think, the dangerous doctrines avowed here, as well as the extraordinary course pursued in the discussion, make it my duty to speak, however irksome the task, and however inadequately that task may be performed.

The attack made here, in behalf of the West, upon the North, is of a character to make it necessary for me to disavow the sentiments, and to disclaim for myself and for my State any participation in the charge. If it was the object of the gentleman of Missouri [Mr. BENTON] to transfuse his own feelings into the bosom of the West; if it was his purpose to excite prejudice there; if it was his design to wound the pride and sensibility of the North, by injurious reproaches and invidious comparisons; to exasperate the passions and alienate the affections of the people, he has been but too successful.

No one at a distance, without the means of explanation, can read that speech, with its formidable array of charges, specifications, and facts—with its commentaries and criminations, and not feel the prejudice they were intended to excite.

It has been said, in the course of the debate, that I am a Western man, and the advocate of Western interests. Sir, I am a Western man. I feel a strong degree of attachment to the West. I will be her faithful Representative. I will guard her interests and defend her rights. I shall be proud of her approbation. I am the advocate of Western interests, not merely because they are Western, but because they are equally a part of the interests of my own State, and a part of the great interests of the whole.

In looking to the interests of my State, after the security of property and liberty under her own laws, I consider the stability of this Union as the greatest and highest concern. I look to the extent of this great country, its natural and political divisions, the objects of the Union, and the constitution established for its Government; and from these I deduce my duties. Under this Union we find a market for our productions, peace, security, and commerce, without which property would have no value, and liberty no enjoyment; and from these considerations I learn to cherish and defend it.

It comports with my own feelings, and with the sentiments of my constituents, to take the most enlarged and liberal views of all our great national interests. While I agree, in general, with the gentleman from Missouri, about the interests of the West, I am compelled to differ from him entirely in the mode of securing them. What is the great interest of the Western States at this moment? To obtain some modification of the land system more favorable to the settlement of the West. And how does he propose to accomplish this object? By assailing the whole North, by charging them with systematic hostility to the West for more than forty years. He has ransacked the archives, collected every fact, arrayed every charge, and presented them under the highest coloring, to prove what can only exist in his imagination—a settled policy, steadily pursued on the part of the North, to stifle the birth and cripple the growth of the West, until he has driven every member, from a sense of pride, into an opposition to every scheme he may recommend. And has he gained the South, or a single vote in that quarter, more than he had before? Will they change their principles? Will the charge against the North, and the comparisons with the South, make any impressions on the South? Are they so easily won, and are they thus to be flattered out of their votes?

Sir, we had gained much in public opinion. The most favorable dispositions were manifested from all quarters. Several propositions had been made, by members of different States, of great liberality. The member from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL] had some time since proposed, for great political considerations, to cede the lands to the States in which they lie. This was founded on the idea of placing the new States on a footing with the old States; to cut off the dependence upon the General Government; to diminish the patronage of office, and the expense of legislation, &c. Another gentleman from New York, now in the cabinet, [Mr. Van Buren] proposed to cede the lands for some reasonable equivalent. We have had the graduating bill several times under discussion; and the object of graduating the price to the quality, and of reducing the price to settlers, the main object of the bill, has been much approved. The objection to it was as to the details—to the mode of obtaining the object. It embraces too large a quantity of land, and runs down the price too low and too rapidly. We have heard from the North and South, during this debate, the most liberal principles on this subject. Without making any specific propositions, both the gentlemen from Massachusetts and South Carolina have the same enlarged, liberal, and statesman-like views. Our opinions began to approximate, and there was every reason to expect a favorable adjustment of this great interest. I regret that the gentleman has thought this a proper time to make this injurious attack upon a large section of country, of whose justice and liberality to the West we had so many proofs.

There appeared to me, besides the votes that have been referred to, a general coincidence of opinion between the North and the West, upon most questions of great public interest: the construction of the constitution, the policy of the Government, and especially upon the tariff, and all subjects of Internal Improvement. I regret this attempt, at this time particularly, to separate these interests. I deprecate the unfortunate influence it may exercise over our legislation.

Sir, I deny the right of the gentleman to speak in the name of the West. I deny his right to speak for me or for my State. I do not choose that any man should make political friendships or enmities for me or my State. And I deny that the charge of hostility to the West has any foundation.

Against whom is this charge levelled? Against the North, including all the States north of the Potomac. And can it be intended to make this sweeping accusation against eleven States of the Union, and to induce the people of the West to believe that they have been, from the commencement of the Government, unfriendly to their interests? Yet all the charges equally affect the five Middle States. It was unfortunate, during the confederation, that the Potomac was considered the line that separated the North and the South, and it no doubt at some times exercised an unfavorable influence upon legislation. There was a general coincidence of opinion in the States north of that line, upon all great questions of that period, and so there was upon all the subjects affecting the Western country, but without the slightest feeling of hostility towards it. In all the great measures taken in reference to the navigation of the Mississippi, the Southern boundary line with Spain, and the defence of the West, they were actuated by their own patriotic views of the great interests of the country, under the peculiar and often pressing circumstances of the times. In the midst of a war of great sacrifice and suffering, in which every nerve was exerted, the whole South overrun, how could they go to the relief of the West? Instead of these reproaches from the West, they ought to receive the homage of our gratitude for the firmness, the fortitude, and constancy, with which they carried us through the trying scenes of the Revolution.

No great measure that was adopted, requiring the consent of nine States, could be carried, without the votes of at least five of these Northern States. Will not New York, and New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, see, that they concurred with the other Northern States in all the measures of hostility imputed to them? That their names are formally arranged, side by side, in high relief, with the States of the North? And will they comprehend how they escape from the charge? Will they see how the exception can exclude them from all the odium, if any, that these measures are calculated to excite in the minds of the people of the West?

But, sir, New England is the real point of attack. No, not even New England, not the republican party of New England, which constituted, at every period for the last twenty years, not less than one-half of the people of that section; and, especially, is excluded the democracy of the North, as they are now called, par excellence, to distinguish some of them from their republican brethren here, who now represent the North. The attack is aimed only at the federal party there. But then that party is mostly extinct. None have joined the ranks since 1801. No politician, coming into life since that time, has found it wise or expedient to try to stem that current. There can be no Federalists now, (except the very few who are so from family pride or real independence of character) under fifty years of age. Besides, many of the veterans have died, or retired from the theatre of public life. Those that remain have suffered the ban of the republic, in the form of proscription, for twenty-eight years. Many of them, during the era of good feeling, in the belief that the contest was injudicious and unavailing, have given in. The few men that remain, advanced in life, seem still to be the objects of bitter and unrelenting persecution. But, sir, the accusation does not go even to this small remnant. It excepts all those who supported the last war. It is aimed, then, it is said, at the Hartford Convention; no, not even those of that class, who have supported the election of the President; they have received absolution; and of them, it has been said, in debate, there are many intelligent and honest men who had no improper designs, and were misled by the few ambitious leaders of the convention. Against whom, then, is the accusation levelled? This bold charge, then, against the North, dwindles down at last to be a mere attack on a few old and retired politicians of the Hartford Convention; and, to sustain the charge, it is necessary to array before the public the votes of all the States of New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, in regard to the defence and settlement of the West, during all the eventful period of the Revolutionary war.

But, sir, what does the charge turn out to be? A system of hostility, pursued for many years, to prevent the settlement of the West. These charges, and the facts adduced to establish them, have been fully examined and explained, by both Senators from Maine, [Messrs. SPRAGUE and HOLMES.] They have done their duty, by vindicating their country. Sir, I take a very different view of the subject. The charge involves a palpable incongruity of conduct. The States demanded the cession of the Western lands as a part of the acquisition of the war, and for the purpose of applying their avails to discharge the debt created in carrying it on. They contended with Spain, during a long and arduous negotiation, for the utmost Southern boundary, and finally established the thirty-first degree of North latitude. They instructed the minister to adhere to this line, and would not even authorize the treaty, without its final ratification by themselves. They afterwards gave Georgia more than a million of dollars, and undertook the extinguishment of the Indian title. They subsequently paid five millions of dollars to settle the Yazoo claim. The country northwest of Ohio was conquered from the Indians, after a conflict of several years, at an expense of five millions of dollars. They have, besides, paid large sums for the extinguishment of Indian titles. They established the ordinance of 1787, for the Government of this territory, and passed laws for the surveying and sale of the lands; and now, it is gravely said that they have pursued a systematic course of hostility to the West; that the sagacious and intelligent men, who have acquired these lands at so much cost, and who pursued this object with so much perseverance, and for so long a time, had no object in view but to stifle the birth, and cripple the growth of the West. The whole charge is utterly inconsistent with itself, and the facts themselves refute it.

After the acquisition of an immense territory, by cessions from the States, and by treaties with foreign nations at a vast expense, and after securing it by conquest or by purchase of the Indians, they adopted a wise and paternal system of administration. The whole has been divided into territories of convenient and compact size; that now form States of the Union. There are six surveyor generals' offices, and more than two hundred millions of acres of land surveyed and ready for market. These lands are divided into squares of six miles, and subdivided down to eighty acres, so as to suit every class of purchasers. There are forty-two land offices in the most convenient situations for the sale of the lands; the price was reduced in 1820 to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; and several pre-emption laws have passed, to secure the rights of settlers, and a general privilege of entering, at the minimum price, any land that has been once offered for sale. There is nothing in all this that seems to indicate a spirit of hostility to the growth of the West. The conduct of the Government has been marked by extreme liberality as well as wisdom; towards the new States. They gave them one twentieth of the proceeds of the sales of the lands for roads. One section in every township for schools, and two townships in every State for colleges, in consideration of exempting these lands from taxation for five years after the sale. Besides this five per cent., they have appropriated more than a million and a half of dollars to the Cumberland road, and its continuation through the Western States, besides the proceeds of the five per cent. They have given more than two millions of acres of land to different Western States for canals; and they released purchasers of public lands to an immense amount. These lands were ceded to the Government, and pledged for the payment of the public debt; they have been disposed of with that view. They have brought into the treasury nearly millions of dollars. The price has been moderate, such as to enable the people to buy, and to prevent the acquisition of large quantities on speculation. And what is the result? More than four millions of industrious and intelligent people, more than the original stock at the Revolution, a country highly improved, and rapidly advancing. If it was the object of the North to prevent the growth of the West, they have been singularly unfortunate. Great and flourishing communities have risen up in the wilderness, in spite of their supposed hostility.

The reduction of the price to one dollar twenty-five cents, in the year 1820, is now brought as a serious charge. It became a matter of prudence and necessity, in consequence of the great and increasing rage for speculation, which had raised the debt from eight millions to twenty-one and a half millions, in less than three years. The Government wisely stopped the credit system, which put an end to purchases on speculation, reduced the price, and then generously gave relief to the people. The continuation of that system would have created an immense debt in the West to the General Government, oppressive to the inhabitants, and ruinous to the country. It is greatly to be regretted that the change had not been made when the debt began to accumulate.

But, sir, let us return to the other charges. The charge of surrendering the navigation of the Mississippi is again renewed, to give color to the idea of hostility to the West. Mr. Madison says, that, soon after the commencement of the war with England, at the period of greatest distress, the Northern and Eastern States refused to relinquish the navigation, even for the substantial aid and succor of Spain, "sensible it might be dangerous to surrender that important right, particularly to the inhabitants of the Western country." And when instructions were afterwards given to our minister to negotiate a treaty, it was expressly enjoined upon him to stipulate for the right of the United States to their territorial bounds, and the free navigation of the Mississippi, from the source to the ocean, as established by treaties with Great Britain, and that he neither conclude nor sign any treaty until he had communicated the same to Congress, and received their approbation. Congress had obtained, from Great Britain, a recognition of a conditional boundary, to extend to the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and the right to navigate the Mississippi. These instructions evince the determination of Congress to maintain their territorial rights to the utmost Southern limit, and with them the concomitant right to the free use of the river. And so jealous were they of these rights and privileges, that the minister, the then Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Jay, a man of great public confidence, was not permitted to conclude a treaty without the approbation of Congress.

The United States, exhausted by the war, destitute of funds, without public credit, with an inefficient Government, were in no situation to go to war with Spain, then connected with France and other Powers of Europe. On the contrary, it was our policy to form a commercial treaty, then proposed to her on the most favorable terms, and to prevent any coalition with England. After the most urgent representations were made by our minister, with regard to the navigation of the river, "the concluding answer, said he, to all my arguments, has steadily been, that the King will never yield that point, nor consent to any compromise about it; for that it always has been, and continues to be, one of their maxims of policy, to exclude all mankind from their American shores."

The Minister of Foreign Affairs, [Mr. Jay] in this situation, reported to Congress that the treaty with Spain was of great political and commercial importance; that, unless this point could be settled, no treaty, however advantageous, could be concluded; that Spain then excluded us from that navigation, and held it with a strong hand against us; that she would not yield it peaceably, and, therefore, we could only acquire it by war; that we were unprepared for war with any Power; that the Mississippi would continue shut, France would tell us our claim was ill founded, the Spanish posts on its banks would be strengthened, and we must either wait in patience for better days, or plunge into an unpopular and dangerous war. In this situation, he submitted to Congress the expediency of yielding our right to Spain for twenty-five years, without waiving our right to resume it, at a time when we should be more competent to maintain it. On one side were presented peace, commerce, and friendship, with a powerful State; on the other, war, with all its evils, in defence of a valuable right, or the waiver of that right for a limited time, with a view to its permanent security. Seven Northern and Eastern States, including New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, were in favor of making this proposition—a sacrifice they felt bound to make under the peculiar and pressing exigencies of the times; "but there was not," said Mr. Lee, in the Virginia Convention, "a gentleman in that Congress, who had an idea of surrendering the navigation of that river." And Mr. Madison said, "they had no idea of absolutely alienating it: the temporary cession, it was supposed, would fix the permanent right in our favor, and prevent a dangerous coalition with England." Whatever opinion may be now formed of the wisdom of this proposition, it must be manifest that no feeling of hostility to the West influenced their judgment. They obtained the greatest possible concession of territory from England; they maintained our right through this whole negotiation, to the thirty-first degree of north latitude; they tried by every means to obtain the navigation of the river from Spain; and it was not until all hope was abandoned that they consented, as the means of peace, and to avoid a war, for which they were unprepared, to forebear the use of it until a more favorable period. But they did not stop here; they instructed the Secretary of Foreign Affairs to propose, and, if possible, to obtain, the right to transport our productions from the thirty-first degree to New Orleans, with a right of deposit at New Orleans, &c. but nothing was done under these instructions, and the whole subject was referred to the new Federal Government. A treaty was eventually made with Spain, which secured to us the thirty-first degree of north latitude, our utmost Southern boundary, and the right to navigate the river, with a deposit at New Orleans, &c. The Government immediately obtained a cession of the lands embraced by this treaty from the State of Georgia, erected two Territorial Governments, extended over them the laws of the Union, extinguished the Yazoo title, adjusted the private claims, and, so far from feeling that the growth of the West was incompatible with the interest of the North, they have done every thing to foster it. The Government having expended more than seven millions of dollars in the acquisition of this country, are now accused of the folly and absurdity of preventing its growth and settlement.

When, at a subsequent period, the right of deposit was violated, these men, who are now aimed at, maintained, with more spirit than prudence, the right of the United States to the free navigation of the river, and proposed to authorize the President to take possession of New Orleans. But Mr. Jefferson entertained more wise and moderate views. He proposed to obtain redress by pacific means, and instituted the embassy which fortunately terminated in the acquisition of Louisiana; and these are his sentiments on the subject:

"The question which divided our Legislature (but not the nation) was, whether we should take it at once, and enter, single handed, into war with the most powerful nation on the earth, or place things on the best footing practicable for the present, and avail ourselves of the first war in Europe (which it was clear was at no great distance) to obtain the country as the price of our neutrality, or as a reprisal for wrongs which we were sure enough to receive. The war happened somewhat sooner than was expected; but our measures were previously taken, and the thing took the best turn for both parties. Those who were honest in their reasons for preferring immediate war, will, in their candor, rejoice that their opinion was not followed. They may, indeed, still believe it was the best opinion, according to probabilities. We, however, believed otherwise, and they, I am sure, will now be glad that we did."

The gentleman from Missouri has accused the Federal Government of entire neglect and abandonment of the West, from 1774 to 1790. He has presented a shocking picture of savage warfare. This is a chord that will vibrate in the West, and is well calculated to excite prejudice in the minds of those who have not the means of correct information. He might, with equal propriety, have given us a description of the distress, and suffering, and sacrifice, of the revolutionary war in the East; during which all our cities were successively occupied by the enemy, and during the three last years of which the whole South was overrun and laid waste. The people knew that, in going to the West, at that period, they went beyond the protection of the Government; that it had neither the means nor the men to give succor or relief. He comes down, however, to the year 1786, to accuse the North of "unrelenting severity" towards the West. No charge was ever more unjustly made. Instead of taking an enlarged and liberal view of the general policy of the Government in regard to the Indians of the West, he has singled out a particular occurrence, in which there was a difference of opinion, not in relation to the object, but in the mode by which both sides sought to obtain it. Both parties in this question were anxious for peace with all the Indians, but entertained views somewhat different as to the mode in which that object was to be obtained. One party desired to give peace and security to the frontiers by amicable treaties with the Indians—the other by military force; but neither, for a moment, thought of abandoning the West. As soon as the definitive treaty was signed, Congress set on foot conventions with all the Indian tribes, and, to expedite the holding of treaties, three hundred and fifty men were held in readiness to protect the commissioners. Treaties were successively made with all the tribes of Indians. In 1785 a treaty was made with the Wyandot, Delaware, Chippewa, and Ottawa tribes; and on the 31st January, 1786, a treaty was concluded at the mouth of the Great Miami, with the Shawnee nation. Seven hundred men, drawn from New England, were placed in the Western country, to defend the frontiers. Congress were pursuing steadily this system, when, in consequence of some depredations, the South conceived the necessity of marching a large armed force into the Indian country, to compel them to make peace. The North considered these as irregular parties, making incursions without the authority of the tribes; and thought that they ought to organize the Indian Department, and adopt such measures as would secure peace to the Indians and safety to the inhabitants of the frontiers.

The resolution to detach four companies had the approbation of but one State, the resolution to detach two, had the negative of but one State. The objection, therefore, was to the number of companies to be moved, and to weakening the other points of defence. The North was opposed to carrying the war among the Indians, but in favor of employing the militia for defence, when necessary. The South desired "an expedition into the Indian territory," and to call out one thousand militia. The North desired to treat with the Indians amicably, to avoid war and expense, and to use the military only for defence. They were unwilling to make war, because they thought the object could be better obtained by peaceful means; they were unwilling to incur the expense, in their exhausted situation, of calling out one thousand militia; they were unwilling to derange the disposition of the regular troops that had been stationed at all the proper points of defence along the line of the Ohio. But they passed a resolution on the 30th June, 1786, to inform the Governor of Virginia that they were desirous to give the most ample protection; and they requested him to give orders to the militia to be in readiness to unite with the regular troops, in such operations as the commanding officer may judge necessary for the protection of the frontiers. On the 20th of October, 1786, Congress resolved, unanimously, to raise one thousand three hundred and forty troops, in addition to the seven hundred, "to form a corps of two thousand and forty," not only "for the support of the frontiers of the States bordering on the Western Territory and the settlements on the Mississippi, but to establish the possession and facilitate the surveying and settling those intermediate lands, which have been so much relied on for the reduction of the debts of the United States." And, on the 21st of July, 1787, Congress resolved to hold treaties with these hostile tribes; to hear their complaints; and inquire into the causes of their quarrels with the settlers, and to make peace. That, for this purpose, the troops should be placed in such positions as to afford the most effectual protection to the frontier inhabitants of Pennsylvania and Virginia, from the incursions and depredations of the Indians; for preventing intrusions on the federal lands, and promoting a favorable issue to the treaty: that the Governor of Virginia be requested, on the application of the commanding officer, to embody a part of the militia, not exceeding one thousand, to co-operate with the troops of the United States, in making such expeditions against the Indians as Congress may direct, &c. These resolutions passed unanimously, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, voting in favor of them.

Now, this insulated case is singled out, disconnected with the whole subject matter, and spread before the Western people, to induce a belief that, in consequence of Northern jealousy and Northern hostility, they utterly and unfeelingly neglected to give any protection to the West against the Indians. The effect of it may be to excite prejudice, to create dissension, and set apart the people of the different sections of the country; but, when examined, it will be found destitute of any foundation.

In pursuance of this system, a treaty was concluded 9th January, 1789, at Fort Harmar, by General St. Clair, with the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pottawatamie, and Sac nations of Indians. But difficulties continued to occur with the Indians, until the Government was obliged to send a military force to conquer them, which was finally accomplished in 1794, and was followed by the treaty of Greenville. Throughout this whole period, from 1786 to 1794, Congress labored with the most patient, persevering, and patriotic exertions, to procure peace for the Indians, and safety to the frontier; and now the gentleman from Missouri says "that Massachusetts and the Northeast abandoned the infant West to the rifle, the hatchet, the knife, and the burning stake of the Indian." But this charge relates equally to all the States north of the Potomac, and to a period anterior to the existence of the republican and federal parties; and it has been seen with what justice it has been made against any portion of that Congress to whose patriotic services and public labors the country owes so deep a debt of gratitude.

We now pass over a period of twelve years, from the formation of the constitution to the acquisition of Louisiana, during which there is no charge of hostility to the settlement of the West. The cession of Louisiana was obtained in 1803, when political parties were very violent; when some feared that an enlargement of our limits might weaken the Union, and others thought, conscientiously, that there was no power in the constitution to acquire territory. Yet, under these circumstances, there were twenty-seven votes in the Senate in favor of the treaty, and half of these North of the Potomac, and four from New England. This shows that there was no unity in the North—no concert, even in the federal party—no hostility to the West.

It is well known that many wise and excellent men believed the acquisition was an extra-constitutional act, and that it would require an amendment to the constitution. Mr. Jefferson entertained this opinion himself. In his letter to Mr. Dunbar, July 17, 1803, he says: "they (Congress) will be obliged to ask from the people an amendment to the constitution, authorizing the receiving the province into the Union, and providing for its government; and the limitations of power which shall be given by that amendment will be unalterable but by the same authority." In his letter to Mr. Breckenridge, 12th August, 1803, he says: "This treaty must, of course, be laid before both Houses, because both have important functions to exercise respecting it. They, I presume, will see their duty to their country in ratifying and paying for it, so as to secure a good which would otherwise probably be never again in their power. But I suppose they must then appeal to the nation for an additional article to the constitution, approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized. The constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive, in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of the country, have done an act against the constitution."

It is well known that Mr. Adams entertained the same opinions, and he thought that the consent of the people should be obtained, by an amendment of the constitution, and the approbation of the people of Louisiana. "It is well known," said he, "that my voice and my opinions were in favor of the acquisition of Louisiana, and of the ratification by which it was acquired." "Entertaining these opinions, I voted for the bill appropriating eleven millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to carry into effect the Louisiana convention; and, in a speech to the Senate on the passage of that bill, I declared at once my approbation of the measure, and my belief, that, to carry the treaty into entire execution, an amendment to the constitution would be necessary;" and he moved the appointment of a committee to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, farther measures were necessary to carry into effect the Louisiana cession treaty; to prepare "for the annexation of the people of Louisiana to the North American Union, and their accession to all the rights, privileges, and prerogatives, of citizens of the United States."

In his speech on this subject, Mr. Adams said: "I am extremely solicitous that every tittle of the engagements on our part in these conventions should be performed with the most scrupulous good faith." "I trust they will be performed, and will cheerfully lend my hand to every act necessary for the purpose: for I consider the object as of the highest advantage to us. And the gentleman from Kentucky himself, who has displayed, with so much eloquence, the immense importance to this Union of the possession of the ceded territory, cannot carry his ideas farther on that subject than I do." "I shall give my vote in its favor."

I have quoted these opinions of Mr. Adams to show, that none of those imputations rest upon him, and that there may be no misapprehension or doubt left even by implication.

"It was," he says, "upon the same principle, a conscientious belief that Congress had not, by the constitution, the power to exercise the authorities, (without an amendment of the constitution) that I voted against the other acts relating to Louisiana." "There remains in the country a power competent to adopt and sanction every part of our engagements, and to carry them entirely into execution. For, notwithstanding the objections and apprehensions of many wise, able, and excellent men in various parts of the Union, yet, such is the public favor attending the transaction, which commenced by the negotiation of this treaty, and which, I hope, will terminate in a full, undisturbed, and undisputed possession of the ceded territory, that I firmly believe, if an amendment to the constitution, amply sufficient for the accomplishment of every thing for which we have contracted shall be proposed, as I think it ought, it will be adopted by the Legislature of every State in the Union."

Mr. Adams gave a signal instance of his freedom from all party influence, of the independence of his mind, and the elevation of his views over all ordinary, local, and political calculation, in approving the acquisition of Louisiana.

When, some years afterwards, the attack was made on the Chesapeake by a British ship of war, Mr. Adams was among the first to take side with the country, and to pledge himself to aid and assist the constituted authorities with all his personal influence and exertions to support them in such measures as they might adopt. He attended the meetings of the people in Boston to express their sentiments, and they are worthy of the place and the occasion. He was on the committee that proposed the resolutions for the first meeting, of which Mr. Gerry was moderator, and chairman of the committee which reported the resolutions at the second meeting.

"BOSTON, 10th July, 1807.

"MR. GERRY, Moderator—GEORGE BLAKE, Secretary.

"Resolved, unanimously, That the late aggression committed by a British ship of war on a frigate of the United States, for the avowed purpose of taking from her, by force, a part of her crew, was a wanton outrage upon the persons and lives of our citizens, and a direct attack upon our national sovereignty and independence: That the spirited conduct of our fellow-citizens at Norfolk, on this occasion, before the orders of Government could be obtained, was highly honorable to themselves and to the nation.

"Resolved, unanimously, That the firm, dignified, and temperate policy adopted by our Executive, at this momentous crisis, is entitled to our most cordial approbation and support.

sident of the United States, in every particular, into full and effectual execution."

"Meeting, Faneuil Hall, 16th July, 1807.

"Mr. ADAMS, Chairman of the committee.

"Resolved, That we consider the unprovoked attack made on the United States' armed ship Chesapeake, by the British ship of war Leopard, a wanton outrage upon the lives of our fellow-citizens, a direct violation of our national honor, and an infringement of our national rights and sovereignty.

"Resolved, That we most sincerely approve the proclamation and the firm and dispassionate course of policy pursued by the President of the United States, and we will cordially unite with our fellow-citizens in affording effectual support to such measures as our Government may farther adopt in the present crisis of our affairs."

This was an insult to our flag, and an outrage on our sovereignty; it was an affair between our country and a foreign nation; they sacrificed all party considerations. When Mr. Adams came to Congress, this affair not atoned for, he made good his promise; he determined to support the administration in any course they might adopt to vindicate the honor of the country. The President recommended the embargo, and Mr. Adams gave it his unqualified support, because he believed it a wise and prudent measure of precaution, and because he was unwilling to thwart the views of the administration for party purposes, and because he had solemnly pledged himself to give effect to such measures as the Government should adopt upon its responsibility.

The measure, no doubt injurious to the Northern interests, became unpopular, and Mr. Adams, in obedience to his principles, resigned the trust into the hands of his constituents and retired, but continued, in private life, to give his advice and opinions to the friends of the administration, when required, upon the difficult questions that arose in that crisis of our affairs.

The embargo locked up the navigation, and destroyed for the time the commerce, of the North. It produced great private distress, and ruined thousands. It is not, therefore, extraordinary, that a measure so severely felt should have been opposed. They believed an embargo, without limitation of time, that destroyed commerce, to be a violation of the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce. They submitted the case to the courts—it was decided against them, and they acquiesced. But the opposition to the embargo grew out of their sense of their own interests, and not from mere political hostility. The embargo was repealed, and the non-intercourse substituted, in March, 1809, which led immediately to the arrangement with Erskine, upon which all parties expressed the highest satisfaction. Mr. Randolph moved, in the House of Representatives, "that the promptitude and frankness with which the President of the United States has met the overtures of the Government of Great Britain towards a restoration of harmony and free commercial intercourse between the two nations, meet the approbation of this House."

The federal members now expressed their hearty approbation of the President, and thanked him cordially, for the country. They said: "The promptitude and frankness with which the President has met the overtures of Great Britain, while they receive the applause and gratitude of the nation, call not less imperiously for an unequivocal expression of them by the House."

The Governor of Massachusetts said to the Legislature—"We have great reason to indulge the hope of realizing those views (arising from a revival of commerce) from the prompt and a micable disposition with which it is understood the present Federal administration have met the conciliatory overtures of Great Britain—a disposition which is entitled to, and will certainly receive, the hearty approbation of every one who sincerely loves the peace and prosperity of the nation." The Senate and House of Representatives replied, that "the prompt acceptance of the overtures of Great Britain meets the approbation, and will ensure the support, of this Commonwealth." These sentiments seem to indicate that the opposition heretofore had been founded in principle, and not in political hostility to the Executive. The arrangement was disavowed by the Government of Great Britain, and the non-intercourse restored. Mr. Adams left the country on a foreign mission, under the appointment of Mr. Madison. He was absent during the war, and officiated as one of the American ministers in negotiating the treaty of peace. He returned in 1817, and was appointed, by Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State.

It is farther charged that the Legislature of Massachusetts, in 1813, resolved, that the admission into the Union, of States created in countries not comprehended within the original limits of the United States, is not authorized by the letter or spirit of the constitution; and that it was the interest and duty of the State to oppose the admission of such State into the Union, as a measure tending to a dissolution of the Union. And it is said I adhere to a party opposed to the admission of Louisiana into the Union. Sir, is that in any sense true? What have I to do, or any existing party, or Mr. Adams, with the persons who opposed the acquisition of Louisiana, twenty-seven years ago? They are all gone from the theatre of public affairs. Mr. Adams was not united with them, and they have ceased to exist as a party. It is seventeen years since the passage of this resolution. Mr. Adams was not in the country. The interests and passions and excitements of that day have passed away; new men and new parties have arisen, with different principles and other views. New England was revolutionized and republicanized, as you may see by her delegation here, many of whom have been personally alluded to on the floor. Massachusetts did not declare it a palpable violation of the constitution, and that she had a right to put forth her veto, and annul the act. And, sir, what is there to connect me in any party with this resolution, that does not equally attach the gentleman himself to the anti-tariff resolutions of South Carolina, and make him responsible for them?

He, [Mr. Adams] has been charged with sacrificing the interests of the country, in establishing the western boundary, in the treaty with Spain. This charge has been reiterated through the papers of the West, where it has been greatly misrepresented or misunderstood. That negotiation was conducted with great ability, and our title to the River Grande fully sustained. But it was the object of the Spanish Government, in ceding Florida, to save the province of Texas. Her minister proposed the Mississippi as the boundary, and adhered to that proposition; he seemed determined not to yield any thing beyond that line. The great importance of securing Florida induced our minister to propose the Colorado, which was rejected promptly. At this point, the negotiation came to a pause, and its entire failure was anticipated. The subject was reconsidered by the cabinet, and a compromise was proposed, and at length accepted, which fixed the boundary at the Sabine River. This was done to secure the Floridas, and after every means had been tried in vain to obtain a greater extension of our limits. It was done by the whole of the cabinet of Mr. Monroe, upon full consideration of all the great interests it involved, and was finally approved by the Senate.

Sir, I have aimed to set the character of Mr. Adams fairly before the Senate, and to vindicate him from the imputations cast upon the North. He has filled the highest stations at home and abroad, at the most critical junctures, with the greatest ability; possessing a mind so firm and so balanced as to preserve its independence and its principles free from all political influence; he has advocated the best interests of his country, and avoided the errors of parties. He supported the two great leading measures of Mr. Jefferson's administration. He represented this country abroad during Mr. Madison's term, and participated in the treaty of peace. He was eight years in the Department of State, and negotiated the Florida treaty; he has been four years at the head of this Government: a man of great learning and experience—of uncommon grasp of mind—of indefatigable labor. And now, sir, it is said, "the Senator of Louisiana adheres with a generous devotion (I call it generous, for it survives the downfall of its object) to that party that passed this resolution."

It may well excite the surprise of the gentleman, that, with the examples before him, and with the temptations before me, I have not also deserted the party, after the downfall of its object. I have the weakness, no doubt, of other men, and all the motives of interest and ambition that govern them. My support of that party was founded in principle, and was disinterested. They who supported this cause from motives of interest or ambition, may desert it without any violation of their principles: for it will be their principle to desert any cause, as soon as it ceases to be their interest.

If it is meant that I have not deserted the object of the party, in consequence of his defeat, it is correct. I did not ride into favor on his popularity, and then desert him: I did not watch the ebb of his fortune to throw myself adroitly into the current, and swim with the tide. Sir, I want the moral courage to desert a cause, or betray a party. I could not encounter the averted eye, the cold disdain, or the indignant scorn, of my friends: I could not bear my own self reproach, or the odium of the public, from which no man can escape—he can never be forgotten for his desertion, nor forgiven for his treachery. I am less surprised, when I see all the offices, emoluments, and honors, of the Government distributed among the victors, at the facility with which pledges were violated and the cause betrayed, than the gentleman can be at my adherence. It was no want of sagacity in me. I can calculate chances and balance probabilities as well as those who know better how to avail themselves of their talents: and if I could not, I had as much intelligence as the Dutch Governor of New York, who could always tell which way the wind blew by the weathercock.

When the Presidential election terminated, leaving one party free, every one saw it threw the balance of power into their hands; and those who understand the springs of human action know the invariable law by which minorities combine. When it was known that one party had ninety-eight votes, and that thirty-three would turn the scale, it required no mathematician to calculate the chances; and when I heard a voice, saying, "the combinations are nearly complete!" I was at no loss in making my calculations. It required no magician to work out the results: it was as plain as that two sides of a triangle are longer than the third side.

When things stood thus, in January, 1826, we were not surprised that those who knew the signs of the times should desert us. We knew there was a tide in the affairs of men, which must be taken at the flood. We knew they would desert us, exactly as the chances increased, and we are not disappointed at the great accession in a certain quarter, since the event is no longer doubtful. When the rats began to leave the ship, I was warned of the danger, and if I did not avail myself of it, to seek safety in time, it was my own fault.

But, sir, that contest is over. My principles have undergone no change. I shall vote for all public measures, and take the same interest in them, and act with the same zeal, I have always done. I have kept my mind free from the spirit of party, and above the influence of political feeling. I trust my principles, and my political opinions, and my views of the great interests of the country, will never suffer the slightest change, whoever may be called to preside over it.

The present party in power is a mere personal party; it is composed of men of all parties, who never agreed in any measures of administration before. Nay, it is composed of men of opposite principles, and of the most heterogeneous elements—men who may combine, but can never adhere. It was formed for good reasons, no doubt; but it was, at best, a mere personal preference of one man to another. Now to change sides requires no change of political principles, and may greatly advance a man's fortune; besides, it is a stale, unprofitable thing, to be struggling against power and numbers, in a hopeless minority, and working in that barren field where there is neither Executive favor, nor popular applause, nor public honor.

If the condition of adhering to the Executive is to sacrifice principles to sustain his measures, then it is a dangerous connexion, and will produce the most fatal effect. It is to make one overruling power in the Government—a power capable of drawing after it every other power, even the power of the people. And if the President, armed with the extraordinary power now claimed, over all the offices, emoluments, and honors, of the Government, does not draw after it the Representatives of the people, and the aid of the press, it is because they are above the influence. And if adherence to a party produces no effect, and lays us under no obligations or restraints, and we preserve our independence, and vote as we please, I can perceive no great use in changing sides, or changing names, so far as the country is concerned: those who have objects beyond that may no doubt obtain them in that mode.

The gentleman has said we were once together, and intimates a wish that we may meet again. Sir, it is not at all improbable. Those who travel in opposite directions on the political circle, are sure to meet. The changes of public opinion and the combination of parties are so rapid, that no one can foretell where or with whom he may be found. When I look around, and see who are together, and how we have been separated, and remember where you have all been, I cannot be surprised at any thing that may occur. When I see the republicans, and federalists, radicals, and liberals; when I remember how you stood in 1821–2, and how in 1824, and see how easily you came together, I do not despair of again meeting many of my old friends. When I remember the open hostility and secret plots, the charges and criminations, the violence and abuse, and now witness the reconciliation, the harmony and union, I am ready to acknowledge the wonderful and magical effect of the spirit of party, which can soothe the irritation and heal the wounds it makes. It is a panacea perfectly infallible, no matter how furious the struggle, or how violent the conflict.

I intended to have spoken upon several subjects of great public interest in relation to the lands, but I find I have not time. It was my purpose to have taken this occasion to show the power of Congress over the public lands. That the lands were "ceded to the States to be disposed of for the common benefit," before the adoption of the constitution, and are held only under this obligation to dispose of them, and not subject to any restrictions and limitations of the constitution. What the common benefit is, must depend on the determination of Congress. Under this construction, Congress have made contracts with the new States, and have given land for schools, colleges, (when they could not give money under the constitution) for roads and canals, and other objects for the public benefit. I shall take another occasion to present my views on that subject, to show to what various and useful purposes they may be applied.

I proposed, also, to have said something about the changes proper to be made in the land system, after the payment of the public debt. I will merely say, that the present price ought to be retained for the sales, so as to prevent the purchase of large quantities of land in States, by individuals, on speculation. That the actual settler ought to have it for half price; that as soon as practicable the lands ought to be classed, and the price graduated to the quality; that each of the new States, especially Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, ought to receive the same quantity of land as the other new States for internal improvement, &c.

I will take leave to say, before I conclude, that no law or regulation will hasten the sales of the lands, unless they are sold on speculation. There are a certain number of persons, who annually arrive at manhood, who require about a million of acres of land, and beyond that there is no demand. They must be supplied or they must settle on the public lands, and the easier the terms on which they are supplied, the better for the people and for the country.

Sir, it has been said that this resolution is the last act in that system of hostility to the West, which has made so great a figure in this debate. The honorable gentleman from Connecticut, who performs his duty with great industry and zeal, perceived what had almost escaped me, that we had more than two hundred millions of acres of land surveyed and ready for market; that we only sell about a million a year; and that we should not, at that rate, sell, in one hundred and fifty years, the land already surveyed, and therefore very naturally proposed to inquire into the expediency of stopping the surveys, &c. Sir, it is true we have more land surveyed than necessary; there have been, heretofore, though not latterly, great impositions and frauds practised upon the Government, and there are large quantities of poor land, of pine woods and prairies, that will never sell. This department has been, within a few years, better managed. I think I may venture to say, for the honorable mover, that the idea of retarding the growth or preventing the sales of the land in the West, never entered his mind.

Mr JOHNSTON here gave way to a motion to adjourn.

[Considerable business was transacted on the 31st of March and the first day of April; there was also some debate—principally on the last named day, on a bill to extinguish the Indian title in the State of Indiana.]

FRIDAY, APRIL 2, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. FOOT, and Mr. JOHNSTON addressed the Senate, in continuation of his remarks, commenced on the 30th March, until four o'clock.

Mr. J. said he saw rising in this country a new party, under a new organization, and under high auspices, that, whatever may be its aim or its object, tended inevitably to weaken the bonds of the Union—a party founding themselves upon State rights in contradistinction to the rights of the General Government. Under this banner was seen a systematic and combined attack upon this Government, that would destroy the confidence and undermine the affections of the people.

All the objections urged to this constitution before its adoption [said Mr. J.] are revived, to create prejudice and excite alarm. We are told there are no checks; "that it is an uncontrolled majority, and an uncontrolled majority is a despotism." It is said to be a foreign Government, and that the States are foreign to each other. It is said to claim unlimited powers; to aim at encroachment upon the proper powers of the States; that it tends to a great consolidation, that will annihilate the States and destroy the liberty of the people; and, that the only means of protection, for the people and the States, against this overweening despotism, is the power to negative her laws.

The people are told that the laws are unequal and oppressive; that they are palpable, dangerous, and deliberate violations of the constitution. There is a general tendency to bring the Government into contempt, and render it odious. We hear of the abuses of the power of Congress and of the administration. We hear of extravagant expenditure; of bargain, and intrigue, and corruption; of the rigorous conduct of the Government in relation to the lands; of the unequal distribution of money; of wild and profligate schemes of improvement; and we see attempts to excite sectional hostilities. The press groans under whatever can prey upon the minds, and provoke the resentment, of the people.

Sir, this is not all, nor, I fear, the worst. There is a deliberate attempt to undermine the power and destroy the confidence of the country in the Supreme Court: that great tribunal, upon which this Union rests, is an object of combined attack. This court, created by the constitution for the decision of all cases arising under it, as a common arbiter between the Government and the members that compose it, "this more than Amphictyonic council," it is said, is the creature of the Government, and not the umpire of the States; that it tends, by the course of its decisions, to extend its jurisdiction, and to a consolidation, not of the Union, but of the Government; that there is no security for the States against its encroachments.

It is said that, "after the Book of Judges, comes the Book of Kings;" and high authority is quoted to show that "they are the sappers and miners of the constitution." Examples of tyranny, drawn from the worst times of judicial history, are presented, and the victims, carried from the dungeon to the scaffold, are exhibited, to excite prejudice and disgust. It is said they are always the tools of power; that they have never been independent; that they are a "subtle corps," "working under ground to undermine the foundation of our confederated fabric;" "that they have been, with constancy and silence, like the approaches of death, sliding onwards to consolidation, giving a diseased enlargement to the powers of the General Government, and throwing chains over State rights;" "that they will lay all things at their feet."

Sir, this is not all. The gentleman from New Hampshire has boldly charged the court with prostrating the rights of the States, and has enumerated the cases. And how have they prostrated the rights of the States? By assuming a jurisdiction? By improper construction? By erroneous opinions? Neither are pretended; but, because this court, in protecting the rights of the people of other States; in guarding the Union against the exercise of the inhibited powers by the States; in maintaining the constitution and the laws of the Union; and preventing the violation of the obligation of contracts—the very object of its institution—decide against the claims and rights of the States, it is said the States are prostrated; that the court is "putting chains on the States," and "laying all things at their feet."

Sir, if these judgments were erroneous, they would be impeached; if the authority was assumed, it would be challenged. It is a power expressly confided to them; and how could this Government move a day without a supreme tribunal to decide all controversies of this kind? And yet it remains to be seen whether this court, created by the constitution, without power or patronage, depending upon its virtue and talents to sustain itself in public opinion, and which is essential and indispensable to the existence of this Union, can stand against these numerous, combined, and powerful assaults; or, whether public confidence will be destroyed, the authority of the court impaired, the constitution become a dead letter, and the Union dissolved by its own weakness.

The people have an habitual and cordial love and veneration for the State institutions, under which their property, their liberty, and their happiness, are secured; there is no feeling of jealousy or hostility to them; there is no meditated attack upon their rights or privileges. We are all their guardians. But this General Government, which is designed to protect the States; to guard them from danger from abroad; to secure them domestic tranquillity at home; to give them peace and commerce; is not so ardently cherished. There is less attachment; more jealousy of its power and encroachments; more centrifugal tendencies. The tie that binds the Union is more feeble; many causes are operating to weaken it; and, openly assailed from every quarter, it remains to be seen whether the people will defend it, or whether it has energy to preserve itself.

It becomes the duty of every enlightened statesman and patriot to "support the State Governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and to preserve the General Government in the whole of its constitutional vigor, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home, and safety abroad," and to give to the court as much confidence as will sustain it firm and unmoved, and unawed, in the legal administration of our affairs.

The right of a State in this Union to annul an act of Congress [said Mr. J.] presents a grave question to our consideration. It is a question of the first impression, and deepest import; which ought not to be discussed under the excitement of party spirit, the influence of passion, or the peculiar circumstances in which any of us may find ourselves. It should be approached under a deep sense of the momentous consequences to the people, to the Union, and to the country it involves.

I shall speak on this question, not as a lawyer and a statesman—that has been done already, in an able and masterly manner—I shall speak of it as a man and a citizen, whose hopes and happiness are embarked with those of his constituents in this great experiment, "the world's last hope."

It is now said that the individual States have a veto on the laws, and, thereby, a power to suspend their operation, by which this Government is made to depend upon the will of each and every State. The right of States to annul the laws and suspend the operations of the Government is not derived from the constitution, but is a high and transcendental power, above the constitution and above all law; it is an abstraction from the idea of sovereign power, and a refinement on the theory of Government. The people of the States have not delegated this veto to the Legislatures; it is a judicial, and not a legislative power; if it pertains to the sovereign power of the State, it must be a reserved power to the people, to be exercised by them in their sovereign capacity. But, whether a State, or the people of a State, have the right to a negative on the laws, is a question to be determined, by whom? By the State? That is to be the judge in its own cause. Or, to be submitted to the majority of the people of all the States? or, to the Supreme Court? It is a "controversy in which the United States are a party."

Admitting the power of the State, and the right to decide for herself, then each and every State in the Union has a constitutional veto on the laws of the United States; then the General Government must, or perhaps each of the States must, have a similar power to suspend the laws of any other State, when it exercises any sovereign power that is inhibited to the States, or that comes in collision with the General Government; and this also, the Government and each State must decide for itself. What a scene of confusion!

Again: each State, then, and the smallest State, with the smallest majority in the State, may suspend the laws within her jurisdiction. Then the action of the Government must depend on the concurrent will of each and all the States. Then the laws made by a majority of the people, and of the States, may be controlled and counteracted by a small, nay, the smallest minority. The Government, if it could be so called, would be absurd in theory, and impracticable in principle.

By the constitution, checks and balances were provided; majorities required; a veto conferred on the President; and a Supreme Court, to decide all questions under the constitution. All which were ridiculous precautions, if each State could exercise the veto, decide all questions for herself, and annul the expressed will of the majority. And what then becomes of the great political maxim, "that absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority—the vital principle in republics—from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and the immediate parent of despotism!"

If this veto is the legitimate right of a State, she ought not to be controlled, resisted, or coerced. She may therefore peaceably withdraw from the Union, and must virtually dissolve the Union, because the laws must cease to operate, (the tariff for example) unless they operate throughout; and besides, could the Union continue, separated by an intervening State? This Union can then only exist as long as twenty-four States concur in opinion. If this principle is true, it ought to have been inserted in the constitution. But it was not. And if the principle is acknowledged, then this constitution was not only imperfect in its organization, but is a political monster, born incapable of living, and containing a principle of self destruction.

The Union must dissolve peaceably, whenever the caprice, the passion, or the ambition, of a few aspiring men of a State may will it, or it must be maintained by force. It is either disunion, or civil war; or, in the language of the times, disunion and blood.

It is time to calculate, not the value, but the duration of the Government.

But we are told no such consequences will ensue. That it is a safe remedy—a necessary check—a salutary restraint upon this uncontrolled majority—a new balance in the constitution, that will regulate all its motions. As soon as this new State power is acknowledged, there will be no more unconstitutional laws, no further encroachment on the rights of the States. "The injured and oppressed States will assume her highest political attitude." She exercises her negative preventive power, she declares the law void—"the necessary consequence," says the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY] "is, it must cease to operate in the State, and Congress must acquiesce, by abandoning the power, or obtain an express grant from the great source from which all power is drawn. The General Government would have no right to use force." "This will at all times prove adequate to save this glorious system of ours from disorder and anarchy." The parties claiming to exercise the power must call a convention of the States, and unless three-fourths of the States will consent to amend the constitution, and confer the power, it must cease to exercise it. Thus a law passed in the usual form, with majorities in both Houses, approved by the President, may be annulled, by the veto of any State, and every power taken from Congress, unless three-fourths of the States are now willing to grant it. Let us see how this will operate. Suppose the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act annulled, the jurisdiction of the court over all cases provided for by it must cease. Again, the tariff has been declared a palpable violation of the constitution; it must, therefore, cease to operate; then the Supreme Court must not take any cognizance of any case arising under it, and Congress must not employ force; it is therefore unnecessary to resist the laws, and there will be no rebellion or treason. But then there will be no revenue. Congress has a right to lay duties for revenue. How much of this tariff is for revenue? for so much it is constitutional, as well as duties on articles not made in the country, and therefore not for the protection of domestic industry. What must be done in such a dilemma?

Every power which has been at any time denied to Congress would have ceased. The Bank, after it had gone into operation, would have been compelled to shut its doors, and close the concern. All crimes not enumerated in the constitution would be stricken from the statute book; the embargo would have been declared inoperative; the 25th section of the Judiciary Act would have been rendered void; the Cumberland road, and subscriptions to canals, grants of land, and all Internal Improvement, would have been suspended on the veto of a single State. The Judiciary law could not have been repealed, and Louisiana and Florida could not have been acquired.

Such is the vis inertia, that it is extremely difficult to get more than a bare majority for any measure. Some do not like its principle or its policy; some are indisposed to change: some do not like the time or the mode of proposing it. There are always reasons enough for opposing any proposition. Most great questions in deliberative bodies are carried by small majorities. The embargo—the war—the bank—the tariff, are striking instances. The constitution of the United States was adopted in Virginia, 89 to 79. Her late constitution was passed by a majority of only 15. It cannot, therefore, be reasonably expected that three-fourths of the States will ever concur in granting any power to Congress that may be previously declared unconstitutional. The powers of the Government will be constantly frittered away, until it has no power to do good—no means to protect—no energy to act—no principle of union.

But is the theory true, that, when the majority has pronounced, and the presumptuous are all in favor of the law, and it is suspended at the instance of a single State, that Congress are to be presumed in error, and must obtain the sanction of three-fourths of the States? Is it not rather more compatible with the theory and principles of the Government, that the complaining party, the resisting State, should call the convention and make the appeal, and assure herself that she is right? A majority can repeal the law, and save further trouble.

This negative is supposed to be necessary to the security of the States, and the protection of the minority; but its real operation will be to destroy the force and energy of the administration. "What may, at first sight, appear a remedy, is, in reality, a poison: to give the minority a negative upon the majority, which is always the case when more than a majority is requisite to a decision, is, in its tendency, to subject the sense of the greater number to that of the lesser. Congress, (under the confederation) from the non-attendance of a few States, have been frequently in the situation of the Polish Diet, when a single veto has been sufficient to put a stop to all their movements. The sixtieth part of the Union has several times been able to oppose an entire bar to its operations. This is one of those refinements which, in practice, has, in effect, the reverse of what is expected from it in theory."—[Federalist.]

The wise men who framed this constitution knew, from the defects and infirmities of the confederation, what was necessary to remedy the errors and correct the evils of that system. They knew that it had been, in its operation upon States only, totally inadequate to the object of its institution; that this Government must look beyond the States, and operate directly through the agency of the people, and upon the people. They knew the necessity of a high court, to decide all questions arising under it; the want of a judiciary power crowned the defects of the confederation. "Laws are a dead letter, without courts to expound and define their true meaning and operation." "This is more necessary, when the frame of the Government is so compounded that the laws of the whole are in danger of being contravened by the laws of the parts."—[Federalist.]

They knew it was necessary to have a power to decide on all cases that contravened the authority of the Union, and to prevent the exercise of the inhibited powers by the States, and all other questions which it was foreseen might arise under the new Government. This presented a question of exceeding great difficulty; two plans were proposed, one to give power to the General Government to revise the laws of the States, and the other, the right to use force. Mr. Pinckney proposed, "to render these prohibitions effectual, the Legislature of the United States shall have power to revise the laws of the several States that may be supposed to infringe the powers exclusively delegated by this constitution to Congress, and to negative and annul such as do."

Mr. Randolph proposed—"The Legislature to negative all laws passed by the several States, contravening, in the opinion of the National Legislature, the articles of union, or any treaty, and to call forth the force of the Union against any member of the Union failing to fulfil its duty under the articles thereof."

Upon more mature consideration, however, it was determined to extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to all cases that could arise under the constitution, or the laws, or treaties. It was essential to make the judiciary power co-extensive with the legislative power.

The constitution, therefore, provided that the judicial power should extend—

1. To all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution.
2. To all cases under the laws of the United States.
3. To all cases under treaties made by them.
4. To all cases affecting ambassadors, ministers, and consuls.
5. To all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.
6. Controversies wherein the United States are a party.
7. Controversies between two or more States.
8. Controversies between a State and citizens of another State.
9. Controversies between citizens of different States.
10. Controversies between citizens of the State claiming lands under grants of different States.
11. Controversies between a State or citizen, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

Here is power granted to try all imaginable cases that can be described; all cases in law and equity, admiralty, or maritime jurisdiction; all that arise under the laws and constitution, and treaties, and then it extends to all controversies in which the United States may be a party, and especially those that arise under the constitution and in execution of the laws. Cases, in general, must operate upon individuals and corporations, and not upon sovereign States. Thus, for example, under the tariff, if goods are introduced and not entered, they will be seized under the revenue laws—then it is a question in law arising under the laws of the United States: if they resist the seizure, it is opposition to the laws; the courts will proceed to judgment, and the President is authorized to call on the Executives of the States for the militia to execute the laws. If they refuse the militia, on the call of the President, then it is the Massachusetts case; if they oppose the laws by force, how will they escape the crime of treason, and how will that differ from the Western insurrection? And all these are controversies to which the United States are a party; if they enter the goods, and suit is instituted on the bond, the court will hear any defence, but they must decide, although the constitution, the power of the United States, or the sovereign power of a State, may be incidentally drawn in: when judgment is obtained and execution issued, notwithstanding a sovereign State may be interested, by her agents, it must be executed as in the Pennsylvania case, to which I shall presently advert.

It is a suit arising under the laws, and a controversy in which the United States are a party, and therefore within the judicial power of the courts, expressly delegated by the constitution. The courts will proceed in the execution of the laws, and in the regular administration of justice. Every law, so far as it acts on individuals, must be enforced by the courts, and no State law can stop them. All controversies, in which the United States are a party, gives jurisdiction of all cases where her sovereign power is called in question; and all questions of inhibited powers to the States arise directly under the constitution.

The laws, in general, operate on the rights of individuals claiming under the sovereign power of the United States. Thus, the sovereignty of the United States made a bank; the sovereignty of Maryland undertook to tax it; the United States denied the right; the court decided this act of sovereignty, on the part of Maryland, to tax it, void. Here, the corporation claim rights under the constitution and law of the United States; it is under the constitution, and the law of the United States it will often happen that questions will arise between individuals claiming rights and powers under the two Governments. The wise heads that framed the Judiciary Act saw this, and made the necessary provision of the 25th section. This presents an admirable system, perfect in all its parts, harmonious in all its operations, which establishes justice, cures domestic tranquillity, and preserves the Union.

In the other alternative, I see nothing but confusion and disorder, and, in the end, disunion and anarchy. In pursuance of this organization of the court, one hundred and seven points or principles have been decided, under the constitution, each of which involved some disputed question with regard to the power of the General Government, or of the States, or of the courts. It has fulfilled the design of its institution; it has settled most of the doubtful points that necessarily arose in putting this great machinery in operation. It has given form and consistency to the constitution, and uniformity to the laws. It has preserved its own high character, in the midst of political conflicts, and, by its purity, elevation, dignity, and learning, maintained the confidence of the people; and it will hold this place as long as its members pursue the even and quiet tenor of their way, high above the hopes of office, or the reachings of ambition. But, if they enter the political arena, and become aspirants there, they will catch the passions of the people, and the spirit of parties, and they will perform their duties under their influence. They will either conform their opinions to the party they attempt to propitiate, and thus vary them from time to time, or degrade the court with shameful disagreements, until it becomes a cabal instead of a court; they will lose, as they will deserve to lose, the confidence of the country.

The following list will exhibit the nature and number of the causes decided. The same case is sometimes counted under different heads:

1. Declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional, 2 cases.
2. Declaring acts of Congress constitutional, 6
3. Declaring State laws constitutional, 9
4. Declaring State laws unconstitutional, 26
5. Affirming judgments of State courts, 14
6. Annulling judgments of do. 14
7. Assenting to appeal of jurisdiction, 7
8. Acquiescing in do. 21
9. States parties really and nominally, 6
10. States parties incidentally, 4
11. Opinions against the President, 2
12. Opinions in favor of the President, 2
13. Opinions against the Secretary of State, 2

It may be remarked that each of these cases involves some principle of sovereign power. The right of the court to decide, then, between individuals, has not been denied. No State has interposed. The opinions are generally approved by professional men throughout the country. They prove the necessity, and demonstrate the independence of the tribunal. They have decided twenty-six State laws to be unconstitutional; that is, interfering with the rights of the General Government; which, considering these as twenty-four States, are not equal to the number of decisions against the acts of Congress.

Now, upon the principle assumed in debate, of the right of a sovereign to decide these questions of sovereignty for itself, the General Government ought to have declared, through Congress, that these acts were void. Each sovereign State, having an interest in the case, would have a right to interpose, her veto, and then the State must cease to act under it. But is not this judicial mode much easier and safer? Suppose the State executes prohibited laws, and there is no tribunal to decide. The two authorities would come directly in conflict. The court has annulled the judgments of State courts in fourteen cases, which drew in question the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, but has affirmed as many, which shows that they have no bearing against the rights of States; and which, if it had no other effect, has preserved the uniformity so essential to the administration of justice under them. It shows, also, the indispensable necessity of the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act; it exhibits the fact that, while only eight questions have arisen on the constitutionality of acts of Congress, thirty-five have occurred on that of State laws. In all these cases the line has been distinctly drawn between the two powers, and the two jurisdictions; all parties acquiesce, and the whole system moves with the greatest harmony.

But it is said they are the creatures of the Government. How? They are members of the States, created by the people and by the States, to decide for all the people, and for all the States. They decide principles that act every where, and upon every class and interest, and must operate in all time. They must sustain the jurisdiction you have conferred upon them, and no more. Their character, talents, and fame, are the best security, and the highest guarantee, for the faithful performance of their duty. They are selected for their signal qualifications, and will probably be of the dominant party when appointed; they are independent in their office; they decide before the whole country, and under the scrutiny of a learned and watchful profession, and subject to the jealous care of the State tribunals. The court is permanent, whilst the executive and legislative branches are continually changing. Opinions, parties, and men, are undergoing constant revolution, while the principles of the Government, the construction of the constitution, and the interpretation of the laws, remain fixed. The Judiciary is the only principle of stability in the Government.

It was undoubtedly the intention of the convention to constitute a Supreme Court to decide all questions of law or sovereignty, and the words are as general and as ample as the language admits. But, in addition to this, it is the duty of the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and Congress have power to provide, and they have provided, that the President may call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. Besides, the Congress have power to suspend the habeas corpus in cases of rebellion and invasion. This superintending power of the Government was understood perfectly by the framers of it. To secure the citizens of the respective States from being punishable as traitors to the United States, when acting expressly in obedience to the authority of their own State, it was proposed, in the convention, to add: "Provided that no act or acts done by one or more of the States against the United States, or by any citizen of any one of the United States, under the authority of one or more, shall be deemed treason, or punished as such; but, in case of war being levied by one or more of the States, against the United States, the conduct of each party towards the other and their adherents, respectively, shall be regulated by the laws of war and of nations"—which was not adopted; which sufficiently explains the views of the convention. But, after the adoption of the constitution, the State of North Carolina proposed, as an amendment, that no State should be declared in rebellion but by the consent of two-thirds of the States present—which was also not adopted.

If this is the true interpretation of the meaning of the constitution, they will take upon themselves a heavy responsibility who undertake, upon a mere abstract theory of right, to resist or to interfere with the regular and legal operations and functions of the different branches of the Government, at the will and pleasure of the States. Having entered into civil society, and distributed the power into different hands, they contract the obligation of obedience; they are bound by the constitution which they have sworn to support.

This question is reduced to a narrow compass. The right to resist an usurpation, or a tyranny, is not denied; the right to use all the peaceful modes of redress, not doubted. It has been admitted that the Supreme Court may decide all cases between individuals. But it is said the States now claim the right to decide when the General Government exceed their authority, because that is a sovereign power. I have endeavored to show that the power to decide all questions under the constitution has been conferred on the Supreme Court; and, if so, the question is concluded, whatever may be the form of the Government.

If this is a pure and simple confederation of States, they are bound by the constitution, by all they have stipulated, and they are obliged by their duty and by their oath to submit to the court all matters of which they have jurisdiction; that is, every case arising under the constitution and laws; and every controversy to which the United States are a party; and they are, moreover, bound to show that, to decide on the unconstitutionality of a law is an exception, and not included in this grant; they are bound to show that, in such a union of States, for certain great objects, each State has a right to decide, definitively, for herself, when the power is exceeded. The convention intended to provide for all cases that could occur; if they have failed to remedy the evil that was foreseen, they have made a Government which, instead of being a splendid fabric of human invention, is utterly impracticable, and which must exist only by the forbearance of the States.

This was the defect of the confederation; it had not the sanction of the people; it was ratified only by the State Legislatures; and, therefore, reasoning from these theories of Government, it was said each Legislature had a right to repeal the law, and thereby annul the confederation. It is said, in reply to this, in the Federalist:

"However gross a heresy it may be to maintain that a party to a compact has a right to revoke that compact, the doctrine itself has had respectable advocates. The possibility of a question of this nature proves the necessity of laying the foundations of the National Government deeper than in the mere sanction of delegated authority. But the fabric of American Empire ought to rest on the solid basis of the consent of the people. The streams of national power ought to flow immediately from the pure original fountain of all legitimate authority."

The right of a State to annul a law of Congress must moreover depend on their showing that this is a mere confederation of States; which has not been done, and cannot be said to be true, although it should not appear to be absolutely a Government of the people. It is by no means necessary to push the argument, as to the character of the Government, to its utmost limit; the ground has been taken, and maintained with great force of reasoning, that this Government is the agent of the supreme power, the people. It is sufficient for the argument that this is not a compact of States; it may be assumed that it is neither strictly a confederation nor a National Government: it is compounded of both—it is an anomaly in the political world—an experiment growing out of our peculiar circumstances—a compromise of principles and opinions—it is partly federal, partly national.

"The proposed constitution is, in strictness, neither national nor federal; it is a composition of both; in its foundation, it is federal, not national; in the sources from which the ordinary powers of the Government are drawn, it is partly federal, partly national; in the operation of these powers, it is national, not federal; in the mode of amendment, it is neither wholly federal nor wholly national."—[Federalist.]

This was the great question solved by the convention: whether this Government should be a confederation, founded on an equality of States, or a Union, upon the principle of population. The large States contended for representation of the people, the small States for equality of States. The parties were nearly balanced, and upon this ground the great struggle was conducted. A majority of the people could not consent to be governed by a minority in the great concerns of this Government; while the small States thought their safety consisted in maintaining their equal share of the power. A majority of the convention was in favor of the popular principle; the House of Representatives was formed upon a representation of the people; the States were equally divided in the formation of the Senate, which led to a compromise, by which that branch was formed on the principle of equality of States, and the election of President was rendered, in the first instance, popular, but upon a compound principle, growing out of the compromise. The confederation was abandoned, as too defective to remedy; the federative principle was retained, so far as to protect the rights of the small States, while it preserved those of the people of the large States, by the division and organization of the Legislative department, by which no law or treaty can be made without the concurrence of a majority of the people and of the States. The rights of both were farther protected by the veto of the Executive. The States are a part of the machinery of the Government, and constitute one great whole, and "a more perfect Union," under the style of "We the people of the United States." This Government, thus constituted for certain purposes, acts for the people collectively, and directly upon the people of the Union, without any reference to the States. It does not act by States, or upon the States. It levies taxes, imposts, and duties, upon the people; it administers justice in the States, upon individuals; it commands the militia, &c. Now, having entered into this Government, by whatever name it may be known, so checked and balanced, with so many guards and precautions, what is the principle upon which it is founded? Certainly, that a majority of the people and of the States should pass all laws, and that these should be the supreme laws of the land, and that every question of power under the constitution and laws should be decided by the Supreme Court.

This, I think, has been shown by the substitution of the Supreme Court in the place of the other modes recommended, to give Congress the control of the State laws: by giving, in express terms, jurisdiction of all controversies in which the United States are a party; by the contemporaneous construction of the constitution in the Judiciary Act; by declaring the laws supreme; by giving the President power to call out the militia, and making it his duty to execute the laws. The court has uniformly exercised jurisdiction, which has been approved, on an open appeal to the States. The President has carried the judgments, by force, into effect. The State tribunals have acknowledged the authority, and such is now the opinion of three-fourths of the people and of the States of this Union.

It was believed, by those who framed the constitution, that the laws would be supreme, and would be enforced by the National Judiciary. Mr. Monroe, in his message, in December, 1824, says, the Supreme Court "decides, in the last resort, on all great questions which arise under our constitution, involving those between the United States, individually, between the States and the United States." Chief Justice Spence, 19 Johnson 164, says, "I consider that court as paramount, when deciding on an article of the constitution, and an act of Congress passed under its express injunction."

In the case of Cohens vs. Virginia, "It (the counsel) maintains that, admitting the constitution and laws to have been violated by the judgment, it is not in the power of the Government to apply a corrective. They maintain that the nation does not possess a department capable of restraining, peaceably, and by authority of law, any attempts which may be made, by a part, against the legitimate powers of the whole; and that the Government is reduced to the alternative of submitting to such attempts, or of resisting them by force; they maintain that the constitution of the United States has provided no tribunal for the final construction of itself, or of the laws or treaties of the nation, but that this power may be exercised, in the last resort, by the courts of every State in the Union." The court, however, decided in favor of the power of the court.

It has been objected by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH] that a bare majority of the Supreme Court may decide the most important questions of State rights. The answer is, that no provision was made in the constitution; none was thought necessary. It is in the power of Congress at all times to change it, and to require a large majority. This has been tried, and always resisted.

It is objected, that, when the court is composed of seven, there may be three on each side, and one may decide; but this is favorable to the States: for if they affirm the constitutionality of a law, they only sanction what has been previously declared by all the other branches of the Government. If a majority of one member decides against the law, his opinion countervails the weight of all the majority by which the law was passed; so that, when the constitutionality of a law is doubted, a single member, when there is a disagreement, may decide against the power of the Government. If more than a majority are required to declare a State law unconstitutional, by parity of reason more than a majority must be required to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional.

Having examined the question upon principle, let us see if there is any precedent or authority for it. I believe there are but two gentlemen who have avowed the opinion. The gentleman from New Hampshire marched boldly up to the very boundary of the question, and stopped short; he refused to vouch for the nullifying power, by which I infer it is not, in his opinion, the true democratic doctrine.

There is no precedent except the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions; they are merely declaratory that the States are parties to the compact, and that, in case of a palpable, dangerous, and deliberate violation of the constitution, the State has a right to interpose. But how? By annulling the law? No; but by declaring the act of Congress unconstitutional, and referring the question to the other States. It is a protest on the part of the State, and an appeal from Congress to the State authorities, who are also parties. The last Virginia resolution is in these words, after expressing the most sincere affection for their brethren of the other States: "The General Assembly doth solemnly appeal to the like dispositions of the other States, in confidence that they will confer with this Commonwealth in declaring, as it does hereby declare, that the acts aforesaid are unconstitutional, and that the necessary and proper measures will be taken by each, for co-operating with this State in maintaining, unimpaired, the authorities, rights, and liberties, reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people;" and for this purpose they were transmitted to the several States.

In the debate, Mr. Mercer said: "The State believed that some of its rights had been invaded by the late acts of the General Government, and proposed a remedy, whereby to obtain a repeal of them. The plan contained in the resolutions appeared the most advisable; force was not thought of by any one." "Nothing seemed more likely to produce a temper in Congress for a repeal, than a declaration similar to the one before the committee, made by a majority of States, or by several of them." "We do not wish," [said Mr. M.] "to be the arm of the people's discontent, but to use their voice." "They (the States) can readily communicate with each other in the different States, and unite their common forces for the protection of their common liberty." Mr. Barbour said: "The gentleman from Prince George had remarked, that these resolutions invited the people to insurrection and to arms; but, if he could conceive that the consequences foretold would grow out of the measure, he would become its bitterest enemy;" "but it would appear by reference to the leading feature in the resolutions, which was their being addressed, not to the people, but to the sister States, praying, in a pacific way, their co-operation in arresting the tendency and effect of unconstitutional laws."

General Lee said: "If the law was unconstitutional, he admitted the right of interposition; nay, it was their duty; every good citizen was bound to uphold them in fair and friendly exertions to correct an injury so serious and pernicious."

But the object of these resolutions is more clearly and explicitly set forth by Mr. John Taylor, who introduced the resolutions. In his reply to the apprehensions of civil commotion, to which the resolutions were said to have a tendency, he said: "Are the republicans possessed of fleets and armies? if not, to what could they appeal for defence and support? To nothing but public opinion; if that should be against them, they must yield. They had uttered what they conceived to be truth, in firm, yet decent language; and they had pursued a system which was only an appeal to public opinion."

He maintained that the fifth article of the constitution had provided a remedy against encroachments, by Congress on the States, and upon the rights of each other. By the article, "two-thirds of Congress may call upon the States for an explanation of any such controversy as the present, by way of amendment to the constitution, and thus correct an erroneous construction of its own acts, by a minority of the States, while two-thirds of the States are also allowed to compel Congress to call a convention, in case so many should think an amendment necessary for the purpose of checking the unconstitutional acts of that body." He said "the will of the people and the will of the States were made the constitutional referee in the case under consideration. The State was pursuing the only possible and ordinary mode of ascertaining the opinion of two-thirds of the States, by declaring its own, and asking theirs. He hoped these reprobated laws would be sacrificed to quiet the apprehensions even of a single State, without the necessity of a convention, or a mandate from three-fourths of the States. He said, "firmness and moderation could only produce a desirable coincidence between the States." "Timidity would be as dishonorable as the violent measures, which gentlemen on the other side recommended in cases of constitutional infractions, would be immoral and unconstitutional."

Thus it appears that there is nothing in these resolutions that looks to the right of the State of Virginia herself to annul an act of Congress; on the contrary, it is the very reverse. It is a declaration that the law, in their opinion, violates the constitution; that the State has a right, as a party to the compact, to interpose, by referring it to the consideration of the other parties to the compact: the language is too plain, and too explicit, to require comment.

Two very important amendments were introduced, which evinced still farther that it was not their intention to annul the laws, or to claim the right to interpose in that way. The first was: they declared, in the first of the resolutions, that the alien and sedition laws were unconstitutional, and not law, but utterly null and void, and of no force or effect. These nullifying expressions were stricken out, upon the motion of Mr. Taylor himself. They were, no doubt, originally inserted merely to express the opinion that the necessary effect of their being unconstitutional was that they were not law, and null and void; but it is evident it was not in the contemplation of the Legislature or of the author of them, that the Legislature, who was merely submitting the subject by way of appeal to the other States, could make the laws void by their declaration. Mr. Taylor said the plan proposed might eventuate in a convention. He did not admit or contemplate that a convention might be called; he only said that, if Congress, upon being addressed to have the laws repealed, should persist, they might, by a concurrence of three-fourths of the States, be compelled to call a convention. The second amendment was in the third clause: "The compact in which the States alone are parties." The word alone, stricken out on the motion of Mr. Giles. It had been said that the people only were the parties to the compact, and the resolution declared that States alone were parties. Mr. Giles said, "the General Government was partly of each kind," and, therefore, moved to strike out alone.

The opinion of Mr. Jefferson, which has been quoted in this debate, relative to calling a convention, the proper arbiter in questions of sovereignty, correspond with those of the Legislature. In his letter to W. C. Nicholas, in September, 1799, then about to proceed to Kentucky, directing what was necessary to avoid the inference of acquiescence, and to procure a concert in the general plan of action, he recommended resolutions, first, answering the committee of Congress and the States that replied: second, making protestation against the precedent and principle, and reserving the right of making this palpable violation of the Federal compact the ground of doing in future whatever we might now rightfully do, should repetitions of these and other violations of the compact render it expedient: third, expressing, in affectionate and conciliatory language, our warm attachment to the union with our sister States, and to the instrument and principles by which we are united." He says, "Mr. Madison does not concur in the reservation proposed above, and from this I recede readily, not only in deference to his judgment, but because, as we should never think of separation, but for repeated and enormous violation, so these, when they occur, will be cause enough of themselves."

I hold in my hand a letter from George Nicholas, of Kentucky, in November, 1798. He was a conspicuous member of the Virginia convention—an able lawyer and statesman—a distinguished republican, and a leading and influential man, in the day of the Kentucky resolutions. I read from this letter to show the views entertained then of the remedy against unconstitutional laws. "If you had been better acquainted with the citizens of Kentucky, you would have known that there was no just cause to apprehend an improper opposition to the laws from them. The laws we complain of may be divided into two classes, those which we admit to be constitutional, but consider as impolitic, and those which we believe to be unconstitutional, and therefore, do not trouble ourselves to inquire as to their policy, because we consider them as absolute nullities. The first class of laws having received the sanction of a majority of the Representatives of the people of the States, we consider as binding on us, however we differ in opinion from those who passed them as to their policy; and although we will exercise our undoubted right of remonstrating against such laws, and demanding their repeal as far as our numbers will justify us in making such a demand, we will obey them with promptitude, and to the extreme of our abilities, so long as they continue in force. As to the second class of the unconstitutional laws, although we consider them as dead letters, and, therefore, that we might legally use force in opposition to any attempts to execute them; yet, we contemplate no means of opposition, even to those unconstitutional acts, but an appeal to the real laws of our country. As long as our excellent constitution shall be considered as sacred, by any department of our Government, the liberties of our country are safe, and every attempt to violate them may be defeated by means of law, without force or tumult of any kind." He quotes the following to Hamilton: "The complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential in a limited constitution: by a limited constitution I understand one which contains specific exceptions to the legislative authority, such, for instance, as that it shall pass no bill of attainder, no ex post facto law, and the like; limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice no other way than through the medium of the courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the constitution void. Without this, all reservations of particular rights or privileges amount to nothing." "It is more rational to suppose that the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the Legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority. The interpretation of the law is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges as, a fundamental law. It therefore belongs to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the Legislative body. If there should happen to be any irreconcilable variance between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents. As long, therefore, as the Federal courts retain their honesty and independence, our constitution and our liberties are safe;" "but resistance ought not to be appealed to, except in cases of extreme danger and necessity: let all good men unite their efforts to prevent the United States from being brought to that crisis."

On the 14th November, 1799, four days after this letter, the Kentucky Legislature entered its solemn protest against the laws which had been declared unconstitutional. The States of Maryland and Ohio had questions about the Bank of the United States, which were submitted to the Supreme Court. The constitutionality of the embargo, which involved an immense amount, was settled by the Supreme Court. In fine, every question that has arisen in forty years, under the constitution, has been satisfactorily settled; and they have established many great and difficult principles, which have now become the settled rule of construction and the law of the land; and they will go on in the execution of this high duty, until they are stopped by the want of power in the Executive to execute the judgments of the court, the power of a State to annul the laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

But, happily for us, this question of the power of the court, and the necessity and expediency of establishing another tribunal to decide on cases involving the sovereign power of the two Governments, has been formally submitted to the States, in a strong case, by a large State, and under the most imposing forms; and was as solemnly rejected. The State of Pennsylvania, in 1809, complained of an infringement of her State rights, by an unconstitutional exercise of power in the United States' courts: that no provision had been made in the constitution for determining disputes between the General and State Governments, by an impartial tribunal, when such cases occur. The Legislature "Resolved, That, from the construction which the United States' courts give to their powers, the harmony of the States, if they resist encroachments on their rights, will frequently be interrupted; and if, to prevent this evil, they should, on all occasions, yield to stretches of power, the reserved rights of the States will depend on the arbitrary power of the courts."

"To prevent the balance between the General and State Governments from being destroyed, and the harmony of the States from being interrupted, Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence to procure an amendment to the constitution of the United States, that an impartial tribunal may be established to determine disputes between the General and State Governments."

These resolutions were submitted to all the States. I hold in my hand the answers of nine States, refusing the proposition, to wit: Virginia, North Carolina, Maryland, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, New Jersey, Vermont, and New Hampshire, without one affirmative State.

Mr. J. then read the answer of the State of Virginia, which was agreed to unanimously, as follows:

"THURSDAY, January 11, 1810.

"Mr. Peyton, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the Governor's communication which relates to the amendment proposed by the State of Pennsylvania to the constitution of the United States, made the following report:

"The committee, to whom was referred the communication of the Governor of Pennsylvania, covering certain resolutions of the Legislature of that State, proposing an amendment of the constitution of the United States, by the appointment of an impartial tribunal to decide disputes between the States and Federal Judiciary, have had the same under their consideration, and are of opinion that a tribunal is already provided by the constitution of the United States, to wit. the Supreme Court: more eminently qualified, from their habits and duties, from the mode of their selection, and from the tenure of their offices, to decide the disputes aforesaid, in an enlightened and impartial manner, than any other tribunal which could be created.

"The members of the Supreme Court are selected from those in the United States who are most celebrated for virtue and legal learning, not at the will of a single individual, but by the concurrent wishes of the President and Senate of the United States: they will, therefore, have no local prejudices and partialities. The duties they have to perform lead them, necessarily, to the most enlarged and accurate acquaintance with the jurisdiction of the Federal and State courts together, and with the admirable symmetry of our Government. The tenure of their offices enables them to pronounce the sound and correct opinions they may have formed, without fear, favor, or partiality.

"The amendment to the constitution, proposed by Pennsylvania, seems to be founded upon the idea that the Federal Judiciary will, from a lust of power, enlarge their jurisdiction, to the total annihilation of the jurisdiction of the State courts—that they will exercise their will, instead of the law and the constitution.

"This argument, if it proves any thing, would operate more strongly against the tribunal proposed to be created, which promised so little, than against the Supreme Court, which, for reasons given before, have every thing connected with their appointment calculated to ensure confidence. What security have we, were the proposed amendment adopted, that this tribunal would not substitute their will and their pleasure in place of the law? The Judiciary are the weakest of the three departments of Government, and least dangerous to the political rights of the constitution; they hold neither the purse nor the sword; and, even to enforce their own judgments and decisions, must ultimately depend upon the Executive arm. Should the Federal Judiciary, however, unmindful of their weakness, unmindful of the duty which they owe to themselves and their country, become corrupt, and transcend the limits of their jurisdiction, would the proposed amendment oppose even a probable barrier in such an improbable state of things?

"The creation of a tribunal, such as is proposed by Pennsylvania, so far as we are able to form an idea of it from the description given in the resolutions of the Legislature of that State, would, in the opinion of your committee, tend rather to invite, than to prevent, collision between the Federal and State courts. It might also become, in process of time, a serious and dangerous embarrassment to the operation of the General Government.

"Resolved, therefore, That the Legislature of this State do disapprove of the amendment to the constitution of the United States proposed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania."

The Governor of Pennsylvania, by direction of the Legislature, transmitted the proceedings to the President of the United States. He said he was "consoled with the pleasing idea that the Chief Magistracy of the Union is confided to a man who is so intimately acquainted with the principles of the Federal constitution, and who is no less disposed to protect the sovereignty and independence of the several States, as guarantied to them, than to defend the rights and legitimate powers of the General Government; who will justly discriminate between opposition to the constitution and laws of the United States, and that of resisting a decree of a judge, founded, as it is conceived, in an usurpation of power and jurisdiction not delegated to him by either; and who is equally solicitous, with himself, to preserve the union of the States, and to adjust the present unhappy collision of the two Governments, in such a manner as will be equally honorable to them both."

To which Mr. Madison replied: "Considering our respective relations to the subject of these communications, it would be unnecessary, if not improper, to enter into any examination of some of the questions connected with it; it is sufficient, in the actual posture of the case, to remark that the Executive of the United States is not only unauthorized to prevent the execution of a decree, sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States, but is expressly enjoined, by statute, to carry into effect any such decree, where opposition may be made to it." He adds, that no legal discretion lies with the Executive to decline steps which might lead to a very painful issue.

The proceedings were transmitted to Congress, who made no report thereon. The Governor of Pennsylvania determined to resist; the marshal proceeded to execute the judgment; the troops were drawn out; but the Governor finally withdrew, and the marshal performed his duty. These are all the authorities I have met with. I have seen nothing that justifies the idea of the power of a State to annul the acts of Congress. They all look to an appeal to the other States—to conventions of the people, or to decisions of the courts. It is to be regretted that this idea has been suggested: some, in moments of passion, may seek this violent remedy for partial and temporary evils. If the power was undoubted, it is one which might be kept from the people. It is the only secret I would keep from them; the power by which a small majority of a State may produce anarchy, confusion, and civil war. Let us rather teach them how well they are, and how happy they ought to be; how free and how prosperous; show them their relative condition in the scale of human existence and political society; show them the miserable state of the mass of the people in every other country; show them the wretched state of pauperism, and what we have recently read of the condition of a portion of the people in the freest government of Europe: let us teach them to enjoy the good they have.

It has been said, the people have the power to break down the Government. That is a question of force. The majority can no doubt destroy a government, as easily as make it. A majority of the numbers are presumed to have a majority of the force, and therefore the minority submit to be governed by them, to avoid an appeal to force. But a minority can no more destroy the Government than they can make one; much less can a single State in a confederacy claim the right to control and counteract all the other States, unless that power has been conceded to each of the members of the Union by the compact, which is not pretended in this case.

This Government was formed with all the checks and balances that were deemed necessary to protect the minority, whether of the people or of the States. This disposition to the exercise of power in the head, and the tendency to resistance in the members, was well understood. Propositions were made to protect the minority by additional guards; by requiring the concurrence of two-thirds. This was rejected in all cases, except in the ratification of treaties, and in amendments to the constitution.

The principle of requiring more than a majority had been tried under the confederation. It was found to paralyze the arm of Government; to take from it all energy, all ability to exert its own power, and to render it weak and inefficient. It is now said that "constitutional government and a government of a majority are utterly incompatible; it being the sole purpose of a constitution to impose limitations and checks upon the majority. An uncontrolled majority is a despotism; and government is free, and will be permanent, in proportion to the number, complexity, and efficiency, of the checks, by which its powers are controlled." Without entering into any discussion upon this abstract theory of government, which has puzzled the wisest heads and confounded the clearest understandings, it is enough to say, that this is an objection to all governments, and to the principles of the constitution, which is not more perfect than any other human invention, but is, perhaps, quite as free from error and difficulty as any other system that could be devised, and more perfect than any one which the States would now adopt: for no majority will consent to be controlled in the exercise of their powers by a complicated system of checks. But the objection to the power of a majority is as good against all oppressive laws as against unconstitutional laws.

Whatever defects may appear in the theory, in the abstract it must be confessed, it has preserved, so far, domestic tranquillity, provided for the common defence; it has regulated commerce, carried on war, made peace, established justice, and formed a more perfect union. In fine, it has overcome every difficulty, and surmounted every obstacle; it has proved itself adequate to all the purposes of a great empire in peace or war.

Beyond this Union I do not venture to look; beyond that, all is darkness.

I have thus endeavored to show [said Mr. J.] that there exists no cause of sectional jealousy or prejudice, but every motive of interest and patriotism, to cherish the most friendly feelings and amicable sentiments among the people of this Union.

I have endeavored to show that this Government was instituted by the people of the several States for great national purposes; that over these they are sovereign.

That the States are not alone parties to the compact, and consequently have not the right to annul the laws; and if they had, the Government would be impracticable.

That the Supreme Court was instituted to decide all controversies in which the United States are parties.

That there is no authority for this nullifying doctrine; on the contrary, the most distinguished names are expressly against it.

That there is no precedent to justify it: the resolutions of Virginia and Kentucky being intended only as appeals to the other States to repeal the obnoxious laws.

I conclude that, from the will of the majority, constitutionally expressed, there is no appeal but to the ultima ratio populi.

I saw, or I thought I saw, rising in this country, a party, under a new and popular appellation of democratic republicans—a sort of ultra republicans, more pure and more wise than the great republican party that has administered this Government for near thirty years; which, under the specious name of State rights, is waging a war upon the Union—upon the constitution—upon the Supreme Court, and upon the different sections and interests of the country; which denies to the General Government power to protect domestic industry, to make internal improvements, to charter a bank, and even power to protect itself—a party which, by connecting itself with the dominant party, is aiming, through that influence, to obtain the ascendancy, and establish its principles.

Sir, we are told that this is to become the true republican doctrine, which consists in a restricted construction of the constitution, and denying to the General Government every essential power, and every beneficial use of it. This party is composed of the fragments of all parties: the democracy of the North, as it is ostentatiously called by way of pre-eminence, with federalists, and radicals, and liberals, of the South; and the real republican party, by whom all these great measures of the country have been carried, are to be pushed out of place. Indeed, sir, we are told that we are in favor of unlimited powers, and overstrained constructions of the constitution. In fine, there is a new set of republicans, with a new creed, and higher tests, that will leave us, and all those with whom we have acted, the old republican party, far behind. What is to become of the democracy of New York, Pennsylvania, and all the West, that have advocated these doctrines? What becomes of your several republican administrations, under which these laws passed? Where was the republican party then?

The tariff was passed among the first acts of this Government, bearing on its title protection to domestic industry; no objection was taken then, although many members had just taken part in the convention. This was a coterminous construction of the constitution. When the celebrated report of General Hamilton was written, he was certainly not aware that the power of the Government to encourage, by duties, the system of manufactures he recommended, could be doubted.

This system of protection has been recommended successively by each of the Presidents. The tariff of 1816 was laid with a view to revenue as well as to sustain the manufactures which had arisen during the war.

The double war duties, and the difficulty of procuring supplies, and the consequent high prices, had encouraged extensive establishments of manufactures, which, upon a return to peace, and to regular commerce and ordinary duties, would have been overwhelmed by foreign competition. Besides this, all saw that the real independence of the country required that the principal necessities of life, of which we had the raw material, should be produced at home, and it was upon these grounds the tariff of 1816 was recommended to the American people. It was argued that the protection of manufactures was necessary to security; that without them industry would be without the means of production; that manufactures, agriculture, and commerce, combined, were indispensable to a flourishing state of the currency and the finances; that a system of Internal Improvements should be added; that liberty and union were inseparable; that disunion comprehended almost the sum of our political dangers. I refer to the speeches in Congress at that session. These considerations dictated the letter of Mr. Jefferson to Austin. [Extracts of some of which are subjoined.] I have only time to allude to this subject, and to say the tariff has been several times before Congress, under different administrations, and has received the support of the main body of the republican party, and to refer to the decisive opinion of Mr. Madison.

Sir, the system of Internal Improvements has now become more an object of resistance than any other power of the Government. Yet, all acknowledge that it produces beneficial effects; that the General Government has exclusively all the means afforded by commerce for all the national works necessary to facilitate the intercourse, social and commercial, among the States; that their power and means are inadequate; that, while you have exclusive authority to form harbors, deepen channels, erect light-houses, and do every thing external which is necessary or useful to aid the foreign commerce of the country, you have no power to make a road or a canal, or any thing internally useful to benefit the commerce among the States, although the latter is an hundred fold more extensive and more valuable than the former. Sir, it is not my purpose to speak of its constitutionality, or of its utility; but to show that this system has been devised and brought into activity by the republican party.

Among the first things that strike us was the early attention of General Washington and Mr. Jefferson to the necessity and practicability of connecting the Atlantic with the West, either by the Potomac or the Hudson; and among the first acts of Congress were resolutions for a mail road through the States to the Southern extremity. A compact was entered into with the Northwestern States to appropriate a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to making a road leading towards those States, under which the Cumberland road has been made, and will be continued to Missouri, commencing under Mr. Jefferson, and receiving appropriations under each republican administration since.

In looking into the Record, I perceive that,

"At the session of 1817-18, a Committee of the House of Representatives submitted a report, in which this power is expressly claimed under the constitution; and on the 14th March, 1818, the sense of the House, after a discussion of many days, was taken upon the following naked resolution:

"Resolved, That Congress has power, under the constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military and other roads, canals, and for the improvement of water courses."

The resolution having been adopted, Yeas 90, Nays 75—the Record proceeds:

"Mr. Lowndes then remarked that, after the decision of this House this day, there could be no doubt that a large majority of the House entertained the conviction of the power of Congress to appropriate money for the purpose of constructing roads and canals. The sense of the House being thus ascertained, and the obstruction removed to any proposition embracing that object, he moved that the report lie upon the table.

"The motion having been agreed to—

"Mr. Tucker, of Virginia, reported a bill making further appropriations for the Cumberland road.

"Of the seven Representatives from South Carolina, who voted on this question, four, viz: Messrs. Lowndes, Middleton, Ervin, and Simkins, voted for the resolution—against it, Messrs. Bellinger, Earle, and Tucker.

"Of the Georgia delegation, two-thirds were in its favor—Yeas, Messrs. Forsyth, Abbot, J. Crawford, and Terrill—Nays, Messrs. Cobb, and Cook."

Appropriations have been annually made since, for various objects of this kind, and advocated by the leading men of the republican party.

The Bank of the United States is also another dangerous and unconstitutional exercise of power; and yet, in 1792, at the commencement of the Government, before parties had time to assume a very decided form, the charter was passed, thirty-nine to nineteen, nearly two to one, although it was an implied power against which there was great jealousy, and the necessity of the bank not so pressing as it has since become to the operations of the Government, and to the greatly extended commerce and exchange of the country.

This charter was renewed in 1816. It was carried by the leaders of the republican party, upon full debate. It has been since that time in successful operation. It has received and disbursed more than three hundred millions of the public money. It has performed all the financial operations of the Government. It has distributed a large real capital into different sections of the country. It has restored a sound and uniform currency, and a medium of exchange safe and economical. Sir, at the conclusion of the war the statesmen of this country turned their minds inward upon the internal policy of administration. Taught by the experience of the wants and sufferings of the people during the war, they saw the necessity of changing the laws and adopting a wiser system of policy. This system consisted of protection to domestic industry; in opening communications between the different sections of the country; encouraging internal as well as external commerce; the payment, by gradual contributions, of the public debt; the restoration of a uniform, sound currency, and a medium of commerce and exchange. This system was devised and carried into effect by the leading members of the republican party, who had carried us through the war. Sir, I hold in my hand extracts of several speeches at that period, that fully illustrate what I have said, but I have not time to read them now.

But, after this system has been adopted and carried into effect by all branches of the Government, while they have, at every session since, received the approbation of Congress, and the uniform sanction of a majority of republican States, it is said the General Government, "by its democratic agents, has been, in the main, adhering to one construction, a strict and rigid construction;" and we are gravely asked, if our judicial agents have not been, with constancy and silence, adhering to a different construction, and sliding onward to consolidation. The court can do no more than sanction the constitutionality of acts of Congress; they cannot create power; they can only exercise the power conferred on them; they cannot create laws; they can only approve. There has been at no time a majority in either branch of the Legislature in favor of a construction so strict as to deny the Government the power to protect domestic industry, to make appropriations for national improvements, or to charter a Bank of the United States; nor were these ever considered as the test of the republican party.

There has been, at all times, since the independence of the country, a party founded in principle, intelligent, honest, and patriotic; who had doubts and fears of this Government. They opposed its adoption; they have steadily resisted it in the exercise of its powers; they have been always embodied, always firm and consistent; but they never constituted a majority of the republican party. These measures have become the settled policy of the country, and no matter by what popular names you may address yourself to the people, they will look to the great interests involved in the principles of these parties. It is not the momentary success of a political chief, or the triumph of the leaders of a party, or the distribution of the honors and favors of the Government among the active, restless, and violent partisans, that will reconcile the body of the people to the sacrifice of their great and essential interests; they will be no longer amused by names; they will look to principles, to things, to realities, to the effect of the Government upon their prosperity and happiness.

But, in claiming these powers, they do not claim the right to exercise them injuriously or oppressively on any portion of the Union. They must be exercised with great wisdom and moderation. The Government must be felt in its beneficial effect upon the country.

The public debt will be paid. We shall remove seven or eight millions of duties on articles, mostly of prime necessity, not made in the country. This will so far relieve the people, and remove a portion of the tax upon labor; many manufactures will, by that time, have obtained a decided ascendancy; errors will be discovered in the tariff; and a general and beneficial modification may take place, under a prudent and moderate spirit of conciliation. Such, I trust, will be the happy issue of this contest. Under any modification, however, there must be a surplus, a portion of which may go to great national improvements: the sum annually required for these objects will be comparatively small.

The Bank of the United States is not dangerous or injurious; on the contrary, it has exercised a most salutary influence upon the financial and commercial affairs of the country. But do those gentlemen who see danger in the bank, see none in a great National Bank, founded on the revenues and credit of the Government, in the hands of a dominant party, with immense capital and unlimited powers? They see no danger of this political machine, by which the distribution and management of fifty millions of dollars will be placed in the hands, not of statesmen, but of a divan at the capital, with five hundred agents, selected for their wealth and influence, stationed at the great commercial points, with power over the fortunes of the whole community—a controlling power capable of wielding every other power! They see no danger in this augmentation of Executive patronage, now exercised with such dreaded effect: no danger from this fatal instrument of political corruption: no danger from this potent engine of political vengeance! They see, without alarm, this tremendous power sweeping over the States, touching every man; controlling every interest; regulating commerce; subsidizing the press; seducing public men; subduing public opinion, and corrupting the principles of Government; not only wielded by the actual administration, but a prize to be fought for by the parties that already disturb and distract the country, and menace the Union.

Sir, [said Mr. J.] we have heard much of the history of parties and their principles. Sir, I desire to set that right before the Senate. At the formation of the constitution, there were many statesmen and patriots, who were in favor of the confederation, and of preserving the power and equality of the States: but they have seen so clearly the evils and defects, as well as the total inefficiency of that Government, that a majority were in favor of establishing another, to exercise powers necessary to the protection of all the States. There may have been a few who preferred a stronger Government: some perhaps a monarchy. This constitution, which was known to be an experiment, the operation of which could not be foreseen, was the result of a compromise of all those opinions. This Government was a new creation in the political world; it was naturally and necessarily an object of fear, and jealousy, and distrust, by the people of the States.

Sir, I hold in my hand extracts from the speech of Patrick Henry, in the Virginia convention for the adoption of the constitution. The most zealous and eloquent opponent of it.

"We, sir, want no such project as a grand seat of government for thirteen States, and perhaps for one hundred States hereafter."

Page 140. "Far better would it be for us, to continue as we are, than to go under that tight energetic Government. I am persuaded of what the honorable gentleman says, that separate confederacies will ruin us: in my judgment they are evils never to be thought of, till a people are to be driven by necessity. When he asks my opinion of consolidation of one power, to reign over America with a strong hand, I will tell him, I am persuaded of the rectitude of my honorable friend's opinion, [Mr. Mason] that one Government cannot reign over so extensive a country as this, without absolute despotism. Compared to such consolidation, small confederacies are little evils, though they ought to be resorted to but in case of necessity."

142. "I call for an example of a great extent of country, governed by one Government, or Congress; call it what you will. To me it appears there is no check in that Government: the President, Senators, and Representatives, all immediately or mediately are the choice of the people. Tell me not of checks on paper.

"Without real checks it will not suffice that some of them are good. A good President, or Senator, or Representative, will have a natural weakness, virtue will slumber, the wicked will be continually watching, and consequently you will be undone. Where are your checks?"

"Nobility would not be so dangerous as the perilous cession of powers contained in this paper. When you give power, you know not what you give."

"We ought to be extremely cautious, in giving up this life, this soul of money, this power of taxation, to Congress. What powerful check is there here, to prevent the most extravagant and profligate squandering of the public money? What security have you in money matters?"

144. Objects to the Federal Judiciary operating over the whole country, and on the people. "Are we not told that it shall be treason to levy war against the United States, and a man may be dragged many hundred miles, to be tried as a criminal."

"There are to be a number of places fitted out, for arsenals and dock yards, in different States; it results that you are to give into their hands all such places as are fit for strong holds—fortifications, and garrisons, and magazines, and depositories of arms."

145. "Arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia."

145. "Congress, by the power of taxation, by that of raising an army, and by the control over the militia, have the sword in one hand, and the purse in the other; let him candidly tell me, where and when did freedom exist, when the sword and the purse were given up from the people? Unless a miracle in human affairs interposed, no nation ever retained its liberty after the loss of the sword and the purse."

146. "We are told that this Government, collectively taken, is without an example; that it is National in this part, and Federal in that part. The Senators are voted for by the State Legislatures—so far it is Federal. Individuals choose the members of the first branch—here it is National. It is Federal in conferring general powers, but National in retaining them."

"It is not to be supported by the States—the pockets of individuals are to be searched, for its maintenance. What signifies it to me that you have the most curious anatomical description of it, in its creation. To all common purposes of legislation it is a grand consolidation of Government. Under this system, he says, there were no powers left to the States, but to take care of the poor, and mend the highways," &c.

147. "I beg gentlemen to consider: Is this a Federal Government? Is it not a consolidated Government for all purposes almost? Is the Government of Virginia a State Government after this Government is adopted?"

"The Congress can both declare war and carry it on, and levy your money as long as you have a shilling to pay."

149. "Congress has a discretionary control over the time, place, and manner, of elections."

Consolidation was applied by the opposers of the constitution to that instrument. These quotations from Patrick Henry show his understanding of it. General Washington used the word in the same sense—consolidation of the Union.

But, sir, this constitution was ably defended, in the conventions, in the public papers, and by the most eminent men of the time, and was finally adopted and put in operation.

APRIL 2, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

In the execution of the powers of the Government, it was natural that those who had opposed the delegation of power to the General Government should rally as a party, to resist or restrain the exercise of them; while others although friendly to the new Government, were willing to guard the States against the possible danger of encroachment. These two classes constituted the body of the opposition to the two first administrations.

This early period of the Government was marked by two extreme ultra opposite parties, both equally zealous and patriotic, but both equally wide of the true understanding of the constitution, which reason and common sense has since set right, and both have disappeared.

Among those friendly to the administration, who, no doubt, contributed much to prejudice the public mind against the Government, were a few who believed in the necessity of a stronger Government, and who maintained that the words "general welfare" were a substantive grant of power. There was, on the other hand, a party, but few in number, who maintained that the power was limited by the express grant; that it could not be enlarged by construction, or increased by implication. But neither of the two parties who divided the country are chargeable with the extravagance of these opinions. They both knew that the Government, instituted for great purposes, must have commensurate powers; that it must have the right to make all the laws necessary and proper to carry the Government into effect. The one was disposed, perhaps, to enlarge the construction, the other to limit it. This difference of principle was more distinctly illustrated at a subsequent period, when the republican party itself separated; a portion of them became radicals, and the other liberals; both running into extremes, and both pushing each other into extremes. They waged a war of some violence against each other: both aimed, under their respective leaders, at the power of the Government. The main body of the republican party occupied the safe ground between them. They both failed, because they pushed their doctrines to an unreasonable and impracticable extent; these will divide the politicians, and form a line of separation, until the principles are settled by repeated decisions, and confirmed by time. I will quote some of the declarations of public men in the first Congress:

Mr. Madison objected to this amendment, "because it was impossible to confine a Government to the exercise of express powers; there must necessarily be admitted powers by implication, unless the constitution descended to recount every minutia." He remembered the word "expressly" had been moved in the Convention of Virginia, by the opponents of the ratification of the constitution, and, after full and fair discussion, was given up by them, and the system allowed to retain its present form."

Mr. Sherman coincided, "observing that corporate bodies are supposed to possess all powers incident to a corporate capacity, without being absolutely expressed."

Mr. Tucker thought every power to be expressly given that could be clearly comprehended within any accurate definition of the general power.—Page 234, vol. 2, Lloyd's Debates.

There is great delicacy, and acknowledged difficulty, in fixing the precise limits of granted and incidental power, of construction and implication. But this should teach us great caution and moderation upon all doubtful points—to bear and forbear. When a power, however, has been claimed, as necessary to carry the greater powers into effect, after it has been fully discussed and repeatedly settled, and especially at different and distant periods, it becomes a duty to submit to the will of a majority, or to change the constitution in the prescribed mode.

I concur with what my colleague has so well said, of the spirit of party, of its reckless and violent course, of its unhappy influence and fatal tendency. Parties are the natural and necessary result of that independence of thinking and freedom of action which belongs to our institutions. There are two parties in every free country, which, by whatever name they may be known, or whatever principles they may profess, contend for the power of the Government. It is a contest between those who govern and those who are governed; between those who are in and those who are out; the King's ministers and the people; the court and the country; the administration and the opposition; sometimes contending for principle, but always for power, patronage, and place; those who are in, generally claiming power; while those who are out, as steadily resist its pretensions and its encroachments. It has become an established maxim, that whigs in power became tories, and tories in opposition became ultra whigs, until, in the course of sixty years, the tories disappeared or became blended with the whigs—as the federal name will become in time extinct, or blended with new parties as they arise. The whigs, when left free, when the opposition was withdrawn, divided (as all parties will) into different parties, under the popular titles of reformers and radicals, emanations of the whigs, always claiming to be the real friends of liberty and of the people; as we have seen the radicals and liberals springing out of the republican party here; and in twenty years after the triumph of that party, we see them arrayed against each other, under five or six different leaders, as we see the opposition benches in England now composed. The same thing has occurred in France. The exclusion of the liberals left the royalists in possession of power and without opposition; having no common enemy to hold them together, they immediately divided; and, at length, the two extremes of ultra royalists and liberals being thrown together in the opposition, united in favor of liberal principles, just as we have seen the two extremes of radicals and liberals unite for a common object, and become extreme radicals.

The republican party have had the Government in their hands for thirty years, while the federal party had it but twelve. Let us enter into a comparison of the measures of the two parties.

The bill incorporating the Bank of the United States passed in 1792, by a great majority; of thirty-nine votes, eleven were republican. In 1811, the bill was rejected; in 1816, a great change had been made in public opinion, and it became a law, and its constitutionality was determined by the Supreme Court. In 1829, the President makes the following communication:

"The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy in a measure involving such important principles, and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberate consideration of the Legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens; and it must be admitted by all, that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency.

"Under these circumstances, if such an institution is deemed essential to the fiscal operations of the Government, I submit to the wisdom of the Legislature whether a national one, founded upon the credit of the Government and its revenues, might not be devised, which would avoid all constitutional difficulties, and, at the same time, secure all the advantages to the Government and country that were expected to result from the present bank." Yet, sir, at the same time, the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, and the Committee of Finance in the Senate, both report that it is both constitutional and expedient; that it has established a uniform and sound currency; that it has equalized exchange to every necessary and practicable extent, and that a national bank would be dangerous, inexpedient, and unnecessary.

The tariff passed under the first administration as a protecting measure. It was not questioned. In 1816 the leading republicans supported it, as they did in 1824 and 1828. It has been recommended to Congress by the several Presidents.

The 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, which gives the Supreme Court power over certain causes decided by the State tribunals, was considered as extending the powers of the court and of the General Government over the State authority and State courts, to an extent not contemplated by the constitution. It declares that a final judgment in the highest court of a State, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity, or where is drawn in question the validity of, or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity, or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the constitution, or of a treaty or statute of, or commission held under, the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption, specially set up or claimed by either party, under such clause of the said constitution, treaty, statute, or commission, may be re-examined, and reversed, or affirmed, in the Supreme Court of the United States; and yet, in 1815, a law was passed, which greatly extended this power, and gave authority to the court to try, in the Circuit Courts, any action or prosecution before any State court, for any thing done or omitted to be done by an inspector or other officer of the customs, after a decision in such court; and to either party within six months of the rendition of the judgment to remove the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States, and to try and determine the facts and the law in such action de novo, as if the same had been originally commenced there, notwithstanding judgment in the State court. Yet this last act, which extends the judicial power much beyond the 25th section, was passed under a republican administration, and has never been complained of.

The proclamation of neutrality, a wise and prudent measure, was considered a stretch of power; yet, a few years afterwards it became the duty of the Executive to revive, by his own authority, the non-intercourse law, which he had suspended.

The appointment of a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to a foreign mission was strongly disapproved; and so, afterwards, was the appointment of a Secretary of the Treasury to the same place.

An act to punish frauds on the Bank of the United States was, in the Kentucky resolutions, declared to be a palpable violation of the constitution, it being a crime not enumerated in that instrument. But, under Mr. Jefferson's administration, an act passed to punish counterfeiting checks on the United States Bank, which has not attracted the slightest notice since.

Each of the Presidents of the United States have recommended the subject of education to Congress. Mr. Jefferson recommended an exploring party, with a view to obtain commercial and geographical knowledge.

Mr. Madison, on the Executive authority, accepted the mediation of Russia, and appointed three ministers to treat of peace, which was generally approved. Yet Mr. Adams did not venture to assume the responsibility of accepting the invitation to the assembly at Panama, and referred the subject, with due deference, to the Senate. But the incidental remark that "although the Executive was competent to send a minister," made without motive and without object, became a subject of severe censure upon him and his administration.

Under Mr. Jefferson's administration, the republican party found it necessary, to preserve their party, to institute a sort of central power, at the capital, called a caucus, to regulate the nomination of President, to enforce party discipline, and to control the popular will—a self-created body, dictating to the people, directing public opinion, and perpetuating their own power. Yet, under Mr. Monroe's administration, it became unpopular, and was put down and utterly abandoned.

Under Mr. Jefferson's administration, the compacts were formed with the Western States, by which the Cumberland Road was commenced, and has been since carried on, through those States; which was the foundation of that system of improvement, and which exerted every power that has since been the subject of so much discussion and so much hostility, real or feigned, to the administration of Mr. Adams.

It has happened in this country, as it has in every free country, that the party in power have rather a tendency to exert, if not to increase their power, while those who are out have a tendency to deny and to resist the power claimed or exerted. The republican party questioned all the acts of the federal administration; but, as soon as they changed places, the federal party became the liberal party; they took the side of the people and the States, and undertook the defence of the constitution, and to set bounds to power. The repeal of a law relating to the Judiciary was called a flagrant violation of the constitution; the acquisition of Louisiana was declared to be without authority, and dangerous to the Union; and the embargo was declared a violation of the compact, and destructive of commerce.

The same thing has occurred, but in a more striking manner, with regard to the power of arbitrary removal. It has been violently opposed and indignantly resisted.

The constitution has conferred no power expressly on the President to remove from office. It was either accidentally omitted, or with a view to fix the tenure and duration of office by law.

On the organization of the Government, the question arose in Congress. A portion of that body believed that no such power appertained to the Executive, and that that power could only be conferred by law. A majority, however, believed that he possessed the power by implication, but derived it from different sources: one party holding that the power was incidental to the appointing power, and therefore held concurrently with the Senate; the other party deriving it as incidental to the Executive power; the two concurring that he had the power, although differing essentially in the manner in which it was to be exercised. All parties saw the necessity of placing this power in confidential hands, to be exerted when urgent circumstances demanded it. As the President was charged with the faithful execution of the laws, he seemed to be the most proper depository of this power, to be used only when necessary to the faithful and prompt execution of the laws.

The incumbent was appointed to office without any limitation, except such as the Legislature might prescribe. He was to hold it, while he was competent to its duties, and worthy the trust. This was the known and universal tenure by which all office was held. When there is no period fixed by law, the President has no right to assume that legislative function, and none being fixed, it presupposes that none was intended. When the duration has been established by law, it presupposes that no shorter period can be contemplated; and the President has no power to defeat the legislative intention. If rotation is a wise principle, that must be declared by the Legislature, not by the Executive. If men have only a temporary and qualified property in office, that tenure, however imperfect, must depend on the law, and the President cannot interpose his power to deprive a citizen of his rights, without a gross abuse, and the most unwarranted assumption of power.

When the officer becomes incapacitated by disease, or disqualified by crime, so as to be unfit for the place, it becomes the duty of the President to remove him, and fill the vacancy with a single eye to the faithful execution of the laws.

The power was not given to swell his patronage, to enable him to establish a political test and a cruel proscription—to reward friends and punish enemies. It was conferred on him to be exerted wisely and humanely for just cause, and in cases of necessity, and for the public good. It was confided to his sound legal discretion, so that the members of Congress, who acknowledged the right, did not think it liable to abuse, or capable of being misunderstood; but Mr. Madison said, if the power is abused, the President will be responsible by impeachment.

Sir, the dangerous nature of this patronage, its tendency to corrupt all branches of Government, its liability to abuse, and the inadequacy of the correction by impeachment, were strong objections to the constitution itself; for proof of which I read from a communication made by Luther Martin to the House of Delegates.

The elevated and patriotic sentiments of President Washington, in regard to the exercise of this power, are contained in a letter to a soldier and officer of the Revolution, an aid-de-camp and devoted friend. They are so characteristic, so suitable to the dignity of his character, and so worthy of him, that I will take leave to read it:

"To you, sir, and others who know me, I believe it is unnecessary for me to say, that when I accepted the important trust committed to my charge by my country, I gave up every idea of personal gratification that I did not think was compatible with the public good. Under this impression, I plainly foresaw that part of my duty, which obliged me to nominate persons to offices, would, in many instances, be the most irksome and displeasing: for, however strong my personal attachment to one might be—however desirous I might be of giving him a proof of my friendship, and whatever might be his expectations, grounded on the amity which had subsisted between us—I was fully determined to keep myself free from every engagement that could embarrass me in discharging this part of my administration. I have, therefore, uniformly declined giving any decisive answer to the numerous applications which have been made to me, being resolved that, whenever I shall be called upon to nominate persons for those offices which may be created, I will do it with a sole view to the public good, and will bring forward those who, upon every consideration, and from the best information I can obtain, will, in my judgment, be most likely to answer that great end. * * * The desire which I have that those persons, whose good opinion I value, should know the principles on which I mean to act in this business, has led me to this full declaration; and I trust that the truly worthy and respectable characters in this country will do justice to the motives by which I am actuated in all my public transactions."

A charge was made against Mr. Adams, the elder, though as far as appears without cause, that he had removed men from office for political purposes: it became the ground of the severest reproaches, and of general animadversion.

Mr. W. C. Nicholas, a member of the convention, and a leading republican, while speaking on the Virginia resolutions, expressed his opinion, which I will also take the liberty to read:

"The conduct of the Executive in bestowing offices, more in the style of rewards for the support of particular measures, than from any regard to the general merits of the citizens called to fill them, and upon the same ground removing from office every man who ventures to hazard an opinion in opposition to any of the measures that have been pursued, necessarily created alarm. He mentioned the removal from office of Mr. Tenche Cox and Mr. Gardiner, in support of what he had said, and expressed a fear that, by these means, that numerous and influential class of citizens, who ought to consider themselves as the public servants, might be made the creatures of Executive power; and if, said Mr. Nicholas, the day should ever come that the office of President should devolve upon an ambitious man, public offices might be made the most powerful instruments to promote his views. The influence would operate upon all those who expect or want public employment."

I refer also to the opinion of Matthew Lyon, as a republican partisan of that day. It is an extract from the publication upon which I believe he was prosecuted:

"As to the Executive, when I shall see the efforts of that power bent on the promotion of the comfort, the happiness, and the accommodation of the people, that Executive shall have my zealous and uniform support; but when I shall, on the part of the Executive, see every consideration of public welfare swallowed up in a continual grasp for power; when I shall behold men of real merit daily turned out of office, for no other cause but independency of sentiment; when I shall see men of firmness, merit, years, abilities, and experience, discarded in their applications for office for fear they possess that independence, and men of meanness preferred, for the ease with which they take up and advocate opinions, I shall not be their humble advocate."

Mr. George Nicholas, in the letter to which I have before referred, expresses his views of the administration. He says:

"As long as the speaker or writer approves their measures, he may not only proceed with safety, but he will be thanked and paid for it. If he praises handsomely, he will be taken into favor. If he deifies the object of his flattery, he will confess he has melted his heart. It is said a pleasant song has been paid for by an office, and that many have been given for addresses, and that more than one has been taken from those who refused to be addressers."

Mr. Cooper was the editor of a newspaper, and on retiring from the paper he published his views of public affairs; from which I read the following:

"I can best illustrate my meaning by supposing a case. Let me place myself, therefore, in the President's chair, at the head of a party in this country, aiming to extend the influence of the Government, to increase the authority and prerogative of the Executive, and reduce to a mere name the influence of the people. How should I set about it? What system should I pursue?"

"The more completely to enlist the ambitious, the needy, and the fashionable, under my banners, I would take care it should be known that no place, no job, no countenance, might be expected by any but those whose opinions and language were implicitly and actively coincident with my own—a principle that I would strictly carry through every appointment in my immediate gift, and under my control."

"With the same view, I would encourage a naval (or I suppose any other) establishment. These measures would leave a vast sum of money to expend in rewarding and gaining over adherents by offices, posts, and contracts."

"Such," said he, "appear to me the obvious measures for a man to adopt, placed in a situation to aim at power, independent of the people."—Mr. Cooper's Address, 1799. See preface.

Sir, there is much more of this in the writings of that time; and when we recur to the intemperance of the language, and the exasperation of the party feelings which it indicates, does it not excite our surprise that only eleven were removed by General Washington, and eleven by Mr. Adams? They never claimed the right to remove without cause; these were all removed for causes deemed, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to be proper.

Yet these few cases, arising under such circumstances, gave serious alarm to the republicans of that day. They saw in it the assumption of power, a dangerous increase of patronage, and its tendency to abuse. The language I have quoted shows the public sentiment.

The claim of doubtful power is always unpopular, the abuse of it odious. The very names, of proscription and persecution, [with their historical associations, were disgusting and revolting. The slightest pretence was seized on, either to guard against an incipient abuse, by arresting it at the threshold, or for political effect, knowing the sensitiveness of the public mind, and the honest prejudices of the people against any unjust exercise of power in their rulers.

At that time the removal of an individual was a matter of such serious importance, and of such rare occurrence, that it became a subject of public discussion and general notoriety. It was very difficult, when strong suspicions existed of a political motive, to satisfy the people that the cause of removal was sufficient, and that it was not done in the wantonness of power to remove an opponent, to reward a friend and favorite, to increase patronage, to silence opposition, and to restrain the freedom of opinion. The Executive was compelled, in his own defence, to give the reasons, and to justify himself before the country.

It was in this state of the public feeling on this question, that Mr. Jefferson came into office; and his first declaration was a pledge of his principles: "And let us reflect," said he, "that having banished from our land that religious intolerance under which mankind so long bled and suffered, we have gained little if we countenance a political intolerance as despotic, as wicked, and capable of as bitter and bloody persecutions." These are noble and elevated sentiments, worthy a citizen and patriot called upon to undertake the duties of the first Executive office of his country.

Three days after this declaration, he says: "I believe, with others, that deprivations of office, if made on the ground of political principles alone, would revolt our new converts, and give a body to leaders who now stand alone. Some I know must be made; they must be few as possible; done gradually, and bottomed on some malversation or inherent disqualification."

Again he says: "I lament sincerely that unessential differences of opinion should ever have been deemed sufficient to interdict half the society from the rights and the blessings of self-government; to proscribe them as unworthy of every trust."

He complained that, by a system of exclusion, one party had monopolized all the offices; that it was his duty to correct the procedure; that he "would proceed with deliberation and inquiry, that it may effect the purposes of justice and public utility with the least private distress, that it may be thrown as much as possible on delinquency, or oppression, or intolerance, or anti-revolutionary adherence to our enemies." "A few examples of justice on officers who have perverted their functions to the oppression of their fellow-citizens, must, in justice to those citizens, be made. But opinion, and the just maintenance of it, shall never be a crime in my view, nor bring injury on the individual. Those whose misconduct in office ought to have produced their removal, even by my predecessor, must not be protected by the delicacy due only to honest men."

He says: "Mr. Adams's last appointments I set aside as far as depends on me. Officers who have been guilty of gross abuse of office, such as marshals packing juries, &c. I shall remove, as my predecessor ought to have done; the instances will be few, and governed by strict rule, and not party passion. The right of opinion shall suffer no invasion from me; those who have acted well will have nothing to fear, however they may have differed from me in opinion; those who have done ill, however, have nothing to hope." Mr. Jefferson went into office avowing as a principle, "equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever sect or persuasion, religious or political."

Notwithstanding the circumstances in which he was placed, and after all this note of preparation, the instances seem to be few, and governed by principle. He knew that this Government depended on the right of suffrage, and the freedom of opinion, and the liberty of action; that the people would not tolerate any invasion of this right. Even his popularity could not have withstood the force of public opinion, if he had boldly assumed and openly abused the power of removal.

Mr. Jefferson removed no man connected with either of the Executive Departments. That is a striking fact. He required their talents, their experience, and their services. He established no political test; he instituted no inquiry into private opinions. No auditor, comptroller, register, treasurer, or clerk, was removed, although they had been in general opposed to his election. No foreign minister was recalled. No collector or postmaster of any of the large cities was removed. There was scarcely an office of any value made vacant.

After being in office ten months, he nominated to the Senate ninety persons, of which, twenty-one were vacancies left by his predecessor, nineteen were vacancies by death, promotion, resignation, or expiration of commission, six restorations of persons who had been removed, twenty-one of persons appointed in the last days or hours of his predecessor, fourteen removals for misconduct, four of officers of courts of justice; the particular reasons for the others unknown.

We see that, during an administration of eight years, he removed only thirty-six persons, holding offices in the customs, marshals, district attorneys, consuls, &c. They were inferior offices, and we can yet, after a lapse of so many years, account for most of these.

This exercise of power, however mild and moderate, did not come with a good grace from that party which had so recently denounced the practice in such severe and bitter terms, as anti-republican, arbitrary, oppressive, and cruel; and Mr. Bayard, a distinguished member of Delaware, in a speech delivered in the House of Representatives in 1802, not knowing the cause of the removals, and supposing them entirely arbitrary, and for political reasons, said:

"No innocence, no merit, no truth, no services, can save the unhappy sectary who does not believe in the creed of those in power." Again: "It is in this path we see the real victims of stern, uncharitable, unrelenting power." And again: "And when I see the will of a President precipitating from office men of probity, knowledge, and talents, against whom the community has no complaint, I consider it a wanton and dangerous abuse of power. And when I see men who have been the victims of this abuse of power, I view them as the proper objects of national sympathy and commiseration."

This was the language used against Mr. Jefferson, by a distinguished leader of the party opposed to him, in debate upon this question.

Sir, this power, whenever exercised by any administration, has produced the same expression of feeling. The power over the opinions, over the happiness, and the fortunes of so many persons, is a power that must be in its nature a tyranny, and, therefore, revolting.

No great minister in England or France at the present day would think of touching the officers and clerks in the departments. They must look beyond all this low and vulgar strife for place; they must build their fame upon great principles, masterly ability, and pre-eminent services.

It is very questionable whether the King has the prerogative of removing without control; it is very certain, a minister who should attempt it would be himself responsible to Parliament, as well as the people. It has not been tried in sixty years, and perhaps never will again; no minister dare to stoop to that desperate expedient.

APRIL 2, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

"You set out," says the author of Junius, in a letter to the Earl of Hillsborough, signed Lucius, and dated on the 10th of September, 1768, "with asserting, that the crown has an indisputable power of dismissing its officers, without assigning a cause. Not quite indisputable, my Lord; for I have heard of addresses from Parliament, to know who advised the dismissal of particular officers. I have heard of impeachments attending a wanton exercise of the prerogative, and you, perhaps, may live to hear of them likewise. Such an exercise of the prerogative appears to have been attempted during the unfortunate administration of Lord Bute. On this occasion, the Marquis of Buckingham, a conspicuous friend of America in her colonial controversies with England, and universally respected, as well for his understanding as for his mild but determined integrity, is described to have mentioned in severe terms, 'the general sweep through every branch and department of the administration; the removes not merely confined to the higher employments, but carried down, with the minutest cruelty, to the lowest offices of the State, and numberless innocent families, which had subsisted on salaries from fifty to two hundred pounds a year, turned out to misery and ruin, with as little regard to the rules of justice as the common feelings of compassion.' The Marquis said that this and similar conduct had thrown the whole country into a flame."

But the officers of the Executive departments reside in the District of Columbia; they have no vote; they are almost disfranchised. It is an extraordinary incident in the history of the country, that no man was ever dismissed from either of them, without necessity, from the establishment of the Government, and that no removal has been made, without cause, since the year 1803, until the present administration.

The President, on coming into office, has boldly assumed the right to remove all officers, at his will, and he has made a full sweep. He has dismissed, without reason or apology, many of the oldest and most experienced officers and clerks; he has removed almost all the numerous officers of the customs, from the highest to the lowest; he has displaced many of the ablest officers of the courts and of the land offices; he has superseded near five hundred postmasters; he has recalled the public ministers without necessity, and at great expense.

They are, in general, men of fair character, and of great experience in office, who, in many instances, received them as the reward of faithful services to the country in other civil and military trusts; among them many who served during the revolutionary war. They have been rudely thrust out, without the slightest acknowledgment of their services: nay, in many cases, under dark imputations; their families thrown upon the world, doomed to penury and want; and themselves left, in the winter of their years, living instances of the ingratitude of their country.

Sir, it is not my purpose to speak of the private distress, with the history of which we have sickened, of the dismay that spread over the land; of the anxiety that preyed upon the minds of so many, who have since suffered all they feared.

I look, sir, far beyond all this: to the power exerted, not to the victim of it; to that power which will subdue the constitution—a power that destroys all the balances of the constitution, and draws after it all the other powers of the Government.

The President claims, all the patronage of the Government, the entire disposition of eight thousand offices, and all the honors and emoluments. He holds in his hands all that can tempt the avarice, or excite the interest, or animate the ambition of man—a power capable of embodying the talent, organizing the press, and drawing after it a band of political adventurers—a power that will concentrate a force which will move, by a single impulse, with a momentum that will overrule the constitution, and bear down the people themselves.

The President had power enough. It was already too great an object of ambition. He exercised an absolute veto on the laws: he executes them, and thereby, to a certain extent, claims to decide on them: he presides over all the departments of the Government, commander-in-chief of the army and navy, with power to call out the militia, and, as such, all the power that belongs to that rank, by the usages of war; and now is to be added a power over eight thousand office-holders, with a host of contractors and jobbers, with the hundreds of thousands of expectants.

It is not merely that you consolidate all power in the hands of the Executive, but you convert this Government into a great electioneering machine, in which not only that high office, but all the offices, and honors, and emoluments, become the prize to be fought for by contending parties. The people will be kept in a constant state of excitement and agitation; they will be arrayed under distinct leaders, seeking only their personal advancement; they will be bribed with their own money; the field of jobbing, speculating, plundering, office-building, and office hunting, thus enlarged, will present a scene of disgusting intrigue and gross corruption.

The great principles of the Government, and the predominant interests of the States, will be lost in the absorbing contests for power and place. The press, destined to be the organ of truth, the friend of the people, and the palladium of liberty, will become venal and mercenary; it will become violent and virulent; it will minister to the passions, descend to gross personal abuse, and vile detraction and falsehood; it will lose its power and its dignity. It must be pure to preserve its influence; it must be free to preserve our liberty.

As more numerous objects of political interest and ambition are presented, partisans will increase, not only in numbers, but in activity and violence; parties will become more malignant and rancorous. The elections will not depend on the personal claims of candidates, but upon the successful combinations of political leaders, who will form cabals at the capital, divide the country into factions, perpetuate their own power, and take from the people the choice of their rulers. Sir, I see, in the exercise of this power, that which will destroy this Government.

During the late contest, we were told that this power would be freely exercised. It had the effect to alarm those in office, and it either silenced them, or drove them to the necessity of openly espousing the cause; and to this influence may be ascribed the uncommon heat and excitement that pervaded the country. It was the hopes of office acting upon the whole body of the people, that aroused a band of adventurers and aspirants, and set in motion the worst passions of the human heart.

When the triumph came, it was publicly announced that the "President would punish his enemies and reward his friends." It has been but too faithfully executed. The power of removal in all cases, at the will of the Executive, has been assumed and exercised; and a general proscription, without limitation of time, and without regard to talent or public service, has been proclaimed. The country is treated as a conquered province, and the offices distributed among the victors, as the spoils of the war. He has bestowed the highest offices upon the members of Congress; he has selected the leaders of the dominant parties of the large States; he has rewarded the leading editors of newspapers with lucrative offices, and other places have been conferred on the most active of the elite.

Sir, I make no personal objection to this, but I see here such a combination of interests, and such a concentration of power, that the people themselves will not be able to resist it. This influence over Congress, this control of the press, this union of interests and discipline of party, will create a governmental power in the centre, that will direct the public will. The whole patronage will be employed to corrupt the people; every thing will be venal; and a system will be gradually introduced that will be fatal to the constitution. I see in it the workings of that spirit that has destroyed every free Government.

There is no difference of opinion here, [said Mr. L.] with one or two exceptions, upon the proper exercise of this power. The power of removal, in cases of inability, incompetency, or crime, or when the public interest and the faithful execution of the laws required it, was necessary, we all agree, to be vested in the President, to be wisely and discreetly exercised in cases calling for it. But to assume the power for other purposes, and especially to remove faithful public servants, for political reasons only, to replace them with new and untried men, to augment his own patronage, and reward his adherents, is as generally disapproved. The doctrine is totally disavowed and repudiated here.

It is a sacred trust, committed to his charge by his country, upon his sound and honest discretion; to pervert it to other purposes is a usurpation and an abuse of the power. He is no doubt a judge of the disqualifications, and so are we of the motives which govern his judgment.

Patronage, created by the President himself, merely to provide for his friends and augment his power, is dangerous and odious. It assumes what was not intended by the constitution; it gives him an ascendancy that disturbs, if it does not destroy, all the balances of the Government; which makes all public men the creatures of his will; gives him an undue influence over the minds of the people, by the hopes of favor it creates. It makes him the source of all power, and the centre of a system around which all the other powers must revolve.

Sir, I regret that this great question should arise at a period of political excitement so inauspicious to the decision of it; but I am happy to see the general agreement with regard to the limitation of the power. Locke ranks it among the breaches of trust in the Executive Magistrate, which amount to a dissolution of the Government, if he employs the force, the treasure, or the offices of society, to pre-engage the elections, or to corrupt the Representatives: "What is it but to poison the very fountain of public security?"

This question of Executive power is the great principle that lies at the bottom of every contest in every free country—a contest for power between those in power, and those who, on the part of the people, resist it. That was the struggle between the whigs and the tories; the tories were the advocates of power; the whigs, after a long and eventful conflict, obtained the ascendancy, and set bounds to prerogative. That is the contest now going on in France between the King's ministers and the Liberal party. It is a contest, however, (in whatever country it may occur) in which the people will prevail.

But it is said, how is it known that removals are made without cause? I answer, because it has been so announced in the official papers; because the removals are general; because no causes are assigned; because, in many instances, the letters of dismissal state that there is no personal objection; because the fact is not denied, and cannot be denied. It being apparent, then, that the President has power only to remove for valid cause, and having exceeded his authority, by removing many persons enjoying the confidence, and having high claims upon the country, and about which there seems to exist but little difference of opinion, the question occurs, Where is the remedy? All concur that he is amenable to the people, and that he must answer upon his responsibility; but this is a slow remedy, and does not put an end to the abuse, or restore the injured citizen. The constitution is violated, the rights of the citizen trampled on, a dangerous prerogative, never before acknowledged, exercised; and we are told that impeachment is the only proper remedy. How! impeach a President coming into power at the head of a party, with a majority in both Houses? That is ridiculous; and how shall the Senate find him guilty, when they advise and consent to the appointment of the successor? When they co-operate in the illegal deprivation? Whatever may be thought of the right to remove, none can doubt that, when the Senate have consented to fill the vacancy, that completes the removal, and operates a destitution of office.

The only question about which there is a serious difference of opinion, is, whether the Senate have a right to inquire into the propriety and legality of the removal; or, whether they must act upon the nomination as in a regular vacancy, and leave the President to his accountability to the people, or to the House of Representatives. Let us examine this question.

If the power of removal is incident to the appointing power, then the Senate, being a part of that power, would participate in that removal, and would therefore have a right to be informed of the reasons and causes of it. There are eleven different classes of officers that are appointed for four years, but removable by the President. The intention of the Legislature then, manifestly is to fix the duration of office, unless special causes make the removal necessary. This numerous class, constituting an immense body of patronage, expires, and leaves vacancies to be filled under each administration. Is not this power enough to gratify the ambition of any man? Yet, in many cases, after a recent confirmation by the Senate, they have been removed, without any assignable cause. Thus the President defeats the law: and must the Senate stand by and see the infraction of the law: the injury of the citizen, and the usurpation of power, and then lend it the sanction of their name, to perfect the work? Does it not appear more consonant with their high character to look into the causes which have deprived a citizen of his legal rights?

The President, it is said, has no right to institute a new mission; yet, if he assumes the power during the recess, and then sends the nomination, according to this new doctrine the Senate would have no right to question the act of the President. For that, it is said, he is responsible; but not to us. They could only inquire into the character of the minister, and approve the nomination of a minister to a mission which they disapproved. But the Senate have always exercised their judgment with regard to the propriety of a mission.

In the reduction of the army, the President misconstrued the law; nominated certain officers to places to which they were not in the opinion of the Senate entitled, and deprived other officers of their rights by dismission. Yet the Senate refused to confirm the nominations. They did look beyond the character of the nominees, and rejected the nominations. They did not sanction the error by approving it, and leave the President to his responsibility.

It is urged, here, that the removal has taken place; the injury is done, and the rejection of the nomination will not restore the removed officer to his place. The Senate did not think so. In the military cases to which I have alluded, even where there was an honest difference of opinion, they rejected the nomination, and thus, as far as possible, repaired the injury. That is the precedent to follow now. Reject the nomination, pass a resolution declaring the sense of the Senate; if necessary, hold a conference, and compare opinions. I cannot believe that the President will exercise a doubtful power, against the general sense of the Senate. He will explain the causes of removal, and acquiesce in their judgment; or, otherwise, the Senate will be a mere register of Executive edicts. But the Senate has adopted a different opinion. They disapprove of the establishment of a political test, and the whole system of proscription and removals. They believe he has no power to remove without cause; that this power has been improperly exercised; but that they have no right to interfere with his duties, or to exercise any check or control over him; that they must quietly permit the constitution and the rights of the citizen to be violated. Thus the nominations are approved, while the removals are declared illegal. And thus it appears to the people that the Senate approves the whole system; and thereby breaks the force of public opinion, and destroys responsibility. The Senate cannot escape the conclusion, that, knowing a removal to be illegal, they have ratified the nomination to fill the vacancy thus created. What power may not the President exercise, and, under this construction, what may we not be compelled, on our own principles, to sanction? Certainly, every assumption of power; and what importance will be a third power in the Government, that imposes no checks, and becomes the passive instrument of the other departments, but to protect every usurpation?

Sir, when these numerous vacancies have been created, and no cause assigned, I take it for granted there is no cause; and I see no necessity of making the inquiry why the removal is made. The President asks my advice and consent: he must give the information, or I will withhold it. This has been the practice of the Senate. They must construe the constitution for themselves; they must withhold their assent to what they believe to be illegal. This would lead to satisfactory explanation, and the evil would be arrested.

One objection to the right to inquire into causes of removals, and reject nominations founded on the abuse of power, is, that thereby we prejudice a matter which may come before us by impeachment. To which, I answer, first, that this is as strong, when we confirm, and thereby tacitly approve. How could we find him guilty, when we have sanctioned the act? Secondly, we propose to reject all nominations, whether the error has arisen from mistake or other cause; whether the removal was made by the President with the intention to do wrong or not. We merely determine the fact that wrong has been done. Third, we prevent the necessity of impeachment, by putting the President right. Fourth, this objection would lie equally against every attempt to investigate any possible abuse of power.

It is not denied [said Mr. J.] that the President has the power of removal; nay, it is acknowledged to be his duty, whenever the case demands it; a right that ought to be exercised freely and justly; and when the cause is announced, the Senate will not strictly inquire into it. But, in the question now pending, it is known that the power of removal, in all cases, without cause and without control, is claimed. The President disdains any evasion. It is not denied, although it is too much to avow, that the President has removed officers for the double purpose of removing men for their political opinions, and conferring offices on those who have supported his election. There are things which it is worse to avow than to do, and the question is, whether the President has this power over the fortunes of so many persons, and the happiness of so many families? Whether it is a dangerous power that is liable to great abuse? Whether it does not place in the hands of the Executive a power that will bring every other department, and every individual, within its influence? Whether it is possible to preserve this Government?

The Senate does not concur with the President, but he is permitted to proceed, because they believe they have not the right to interfere; that he must be left to the ineffectual remedy of appeal to the people, or to impeachment.

[Mr. JOHNSTON was asked if he would give way for a motion to adjourn. He said he would not detain the Senate at this late hour; he would at some convenient time conclude the remarks, if the Senate should be disposed to hear them. He asked their indulgence, however, for a few moments longer.]

We can feel no solicitude for this power of removal, [said Mr. J.] except what results from the effect it will have upon the country. The constitution will be what it is determined to be, and you are to fix the construction. The President exercises the power that will become an example and a precedent; the Senate refuses to interfere, and that sanctions the usurpation. The next President will do the same. You have a practical construction to the constitution.

Looking to it as a power, it is no longer yours; your patronage is exhausted; you have nothing more to give; and the applicants are as numerous and importunate as they were at the beginning. You have nothing to give but promises, and they nothing to expect but disappointment. Upon the principles you have established, these offices will be for those who succeed to you; they are already armed in anticipation, with the whole of this immense patronage; and it will exercise an influence as adverse to you as it was favorable in the last contest.

My colleague has misapprehended the views I presented to the Senate some time since, with regard to the policy of this administration. It was not my intention in those remarks to censure Congress with extravagance. I stated it was a part of a system, during the last administration, to represent it as a very extravagant administration; to accuse them of enormous abuses, and to promise great reformations; that, after waiting a year, with majorities in both Houses, I had seen nothing to redeem the pledges given to the people. All the appropriations have passed under my eye; the estimates on which they were founded were copied from those of the last year. The great expenditures of the Government are fixed by laws which you have not attempted to change, and must therefore remain the same. The recall of our foreign ministers had created an unnecessary increase of fifty thousand dollars to the diplomatic expenses. I did not complain of the money, if the public interest required the change of ministers, but of the motive and the necessity of that change. Whether the public good demanded it; whether it was a wanton exercise of power; whether it was a part of the sweeping proscription; and whether the money was not uselessly thrown away, the people would judge. I did not complain of the mode in which the money was obtained, although there were no appropriations for this object, and they were specifically made for other purposes. If the new missions were necessary, the money was a matter of little consequence. Sir, I read parts of the famous retrenchment report, with a view to show the expenses and abuses of the Government, which had been pointed out to the people, and the promises of economy and reform. This report, of which ten thousand copies had been printed, had filled the public mind with the extravagance and waste of the last administration. The people were deceived and abused, and they will now know the truth. I considered that report, with several others, as mere party engines, a mere electioneering manoeuvre: it had its day, it produced its effect, and it will pass away with the delusion it created, like the other delusions of the times. I referred to the abuses pointed out, but which I did not so characterize, and asked if they were abuses still, and where was the remedy. These abuses are abuses no longer; they are permitted to sleep; no economy has been introduced; no retrenchment. You have, by way of commentary on your professions, appropriated thirty thousand dollars for printing, this session, more than the last long session. You propose to increase the pay of the foreign ministers; of which I approve. You propose to increase the pay in the navy; which I think is proper and necessary. You ask for more departments and more clerks, and more assistants. These I have no doubt the public service requires; but they are a strange commentary upon the report of the committee, and your promises to the people.

But, sir, you propose to effect this economical reform, how? By cutting down the institutions of the country, and by suspending all internal improvements; by changing the policy of the Government.

You propose to dismiss, without ceremony, a large number of officers of the navy, who have devoted their lives to your service; and this is the economy. And do you believe the people will justify this violation of the rights of your officers? Sir, I agree to increase their rank and pay, and to reduce the establishment by accidental vacancies, but never to confer the power of removal, and then give, as proposed, power to the President to increase the number.

Sir, my colleague has stated at full length all the reforms which have been introduced; on his own statement they amount to very little. The money has been drawn from the treasury for forty years, in a mode regulated by law and custom; no loss has been sustained; none apprehended; and now it is said, and with some pride, that another check has been found out to guard against what has never happened.

Sir, I made no charge of extravagance; I passed no censure except upon the report, which I felt it my duty to expose, because I know such desperate expedients, even if they have momentary success in deceiving the people, will always recoil upon their authors. I think no statesman should descend into that arena. The great distinctive difference between parties and those who administer the Government, are principles, and the character and talents of those who personate the principles and represent the parties in the administration of the affairs of the country. It is to this issue every contest between honorable men should be brought. We should address the understanding of the wise and the good, not the passions or the prejudices of the weak or the ignorant.

I have advocated every scheme for the better organization of the Executive departments, every bill for improving the operations of the Government. I will go into every expenditure; introduce economy where it can be done; retrenchment where it is necessary; but, let the merit be in the reformations, not in vain protestations and empty promises; not in making reform the jest and the scorn of the people.

Mr. JOHNSTON here gave way, and the Senate adjourned over to Monday.

MONDAY, APRIL 5, 1830.

DONATIONS TO DEAF & DUMB INSTITUTIONS.

On motion of Mr. MARKS, the bill making an appropriation of a township of land for the support of the New York Institution for the education of the Deaf and Dumb, was taken up for consideration.

The question being on the amendment heretofore proposed by Mr. MARKS, to embrace within the provisions of the bill the institutions in the States of Pennsylvania and North Carolina,

Mr. BURNET suggested the propriety of including the State of Ohio, which had petitioned for a similar appropriation to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum of that State.

Mr. MARKS accepted the proposition as a part of his amendment.

Mr. DICKERSON expressed a hope that his State (New Jersey) would be added to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BURNET said he would not offer any objections to this proposition. He remarked, that, to avoid the trouble of introducing separate bills in relation to each particular State, it would be well to embrace all which had institutions of this nature, already chartered, and now in full operation.

Mr. KING inquired of Mr. DICKERSON, whether a Deaf and Dumb Institution had been chartered by the Legislature of New Jersey, as this bill was intended for institutions already incorporated. If we make an appropriation for one State, why not, he asked, extend the provisions of the bill to all the States where these institutions are incorporated?

Mr. DICKERSON replied in the affirmative.

Mr. MARKS stated, that, in Pennsylvania, the institution was incorporated by the Legislature many years ago, and possesses an annuity of eight thousand dollars. There were seventy-five pupils now maintained and educated in it, some of whom were from New Jersey and Maryland. By the last census it appeared there were five hundred of this unfortunate class of persons for whom this institution was designed, in the State of Pennsylvania alone.

Mr. KING said he would move to recommit the bill, with instructions to embrace in its provisions all the States which are now omitted. He could not see why Congress should be called upon to legislate, session after session, for individual States. If it be the intention to continue such appropriations, why confine them to particular States? He moved to recommit the bill, to include all the States which now are in, and which may hereafter be admitted into, the Union.

Mr. SANFORD said the bill would be lost for this session, if now recommitted, as proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, and he hoped, although he was favorable to its objects, that he [Mr. KING] would not press his motion. If the bill be reported agreeably to the instructions, it may come before us too late to be acted upon. He therefore hoped the gentleman would consent to let it pass as it is.

Mr. BARTON moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a substitute embracing all the States not already provided for by such grants.

Mr. KING said the amendment offered by Mr. BARTON perfectly answered the objects he had in view, and he would therefore withdraw his motion.

Mr. BARNARD agreed to the propriety of the proposition of Mr. BARTON, but thought the better course to pursue would be, to give these donations of lands to the States which have already incorporated institutions of this character, and to defer providing for other States until they shall have also chartered institutions. Although he was favorable to the objects of the amendment, yet, as its only tendency now would be to embarrass the bill, he hoped it would be rejected.

Mr. MCKINLEY said that, so far from the amendment embarrassing the bill, it would relieve it from all embarrassment, as the disposition of it would tend to establish one of two principles in relation to the bill itself; that is, whether the principle of it should be adopted as a general principle, or rejected altogether. This ought to be done; and if it is right to appropriate thus for one State, it is right for all; and if it is not right for all, it is not right for one. It would be incorrect to legislate in favor of any one State, as it is certain that in all the States there are some deaf and dumb people in proportion to the population of each. Let the principle be tested, he said: he would vote for the amendment, as it would have that effect.

Mr. LIVINGSTON considered it his duty to express his sentiments on this bill. By it, it is intended to make an appropriation of the public lands for the support of institutions of private charity in individual States. That was the object of the bill, and nothing else; and looking to that constitution which all are so anxious to preserve, I would ask [said Mr. L.] from what part of the constitution this authority is derived, which the bill proposes to exercise. These are public lands, to be sure; but our obligations in the disposition of them, are the same as in the appropriation of the funds of the country. The constitution says we shall dispose of the public funds for the general welfare. Of this, there are two constructions: one is, that these appropriations shall be made under certain expressed powers in the constitution, which [Mr. L. said] was his construction; and the other was the liberal doctrine—that Congress has the power to appropriate for purposes not inimical to the constitution. The public lands are intended for the benefit of all—for the common benefit. Where, he asked, was the difference between the objects for which the public lands and the public funds were intended? The common benefit and the general welfare appeared to him to be synonymous. What, then, are the objects of this bill? One gentleman proposes to give a township of the public lands to one State—next it is proposed to include three other States; and lastly, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. KING] proposes to extend the provisions of the bill to all the States of the Union, and to those which may in future be admitted into it. Where, he asked, was the authority for this, but in those general words in the constitution, “the common benefit?” We cannot [said Mr. L.] make this appropriation under such a power; and if we can do it, my ideas of the constitution have been hitherto grossly erroneous. My idea is, that such subjects ought to be left to the care of the States themselves; that the public lands are entrusted to us to be disposed, not for the purpose of relieving poverty and distress, but for general, and not for particular purposes. In one State, suppose there are a certain number of destitute people, and in another State a certain number of deaf and dumb; are we to provide for each of these classes? And if for only one class, I would be glad to know what part of the constitution points out the distinction. If this bill is to be adopted, then shall we become the superintendents of the domestic concerns of the States. I would be glad to know [continued Mr. L.] why we should make an appropriation for the support of a deaf and dumb institution in New Jersey, and not of a marine hospital in any seaport town in the United States.

Mr. L. stated the course he had always pursued in reference to the disposition of the public lands, although it was possible he may have had, in some instances, unknown to himself, varied from it. With respect to the new States, he considered it was a duty Congress had to perform—which it was obliged to perform by the terms of the donations of these public lands—to appropriate what was necessary to carry on the operations of these States. Next he considered it necessary to give them public lands for the maintenance of their public institutions, because we possess those lands, and have consequently stopped the sources whence they would draw taxes to enable them to support these institutions. Therefore [Mr. L. said] he always gave his vote in favor of appropriations for any reasonable purpose, when required by the States in which the lands lie. He also would vote, and had voted, for any measure which, in his judgment, would have the effect of improving the value of the public lands. The more facilities which were afforded for the improvement of these lands, by canals, roads, &c. the more he thought the public treasure would be increased. Mr. L. concluded by saying he could not, in his conscience, vote for the bill, or for any of the modifications proposed, however laudable and just he admitted the objects of them to be.

Mr. MCKINLEY said his object was to test the sense of the Senate on the principle of the bill. He proceeded to reply to the arguments of Mr. LIVINGSTON, and contended that on Congress devolved the power of giving a construction to the constitution. He argued that the power of Congress, as to the appropriation of the public lands, was, that the lands should be disposed of for the common benefit of all the States, including the State making the grant of these lands to the United States. He asked if the gentleman from Louisiana believed the proper construction of the words “common benefit,” in the constitution, was that appropriations of the public lands should be made to the United States only. These lands were given to the United States by the States to aid in paying off the debt of the revolutionary war. When that debt shall be paid, and a surplus shall be found remaining, he asked what was to be done with that surplus? Are not the lands which the States of Georgia and Virginia ceded to the United States, to be then appropriated for the common benefit of all, including the States themselves? In addition to the Virginia and Georgia grants, the United States purchased lands from foreign Governments. All these are to be appropriated for the use and benefit of all. When a surplus shall be left, after the public debt is paid, how is it to be disposed of? The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] is in favor of appropriating the public lands for purposes of internal improvement when applied to national objects. There will be more difficulty in deriving from the constitution the power to effect these objects—to determine on the objects which will answer the description of national ones, than the power which he now denies to Congress. Mr. McK. then briefly recapitulated his arguments.

Mr. BARTON said that the power proposed to be exercised here was the same as that under which the 16th section of each township of public land was granted for seminaries of public learning. Some call this a compact, and others an exercise of the legislation of Congress. But suppose [said Mr. B.] it is a compact, we receive an equivalent: for we can ask no higher compensation for these donations than the education of the deaf and dumb. Education he conceived to be the highest order of national compensation, and a compensation of a great and noble character, considering the unfortunate but interesting objects for whose education the appropriation is intended. Mr. B. said, he did not think it necessary to go into the constitutional argument, but he was not aware that any greater constitutional objections could be urged against this bill than the bill making an appropriation of public lands for the carrying on of public works in Alabama was liable to, which had just passed the Senate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said his arguments had not been answered by the gentleman from Alabama; and having repeated them, he proceeded to notice what had fallen from that gentleman. He admitted, with him, that the States have declared that the public lands should be applied for the common benefit of all, including that of each State, and that each State, in relinquishing its lands to the United States, had an ulterior motive—after the public debt should have been paid, after the debt of the Revolution should have been discharged—namely, its own peculiar advantage. But he [Mr. MCKINLEY] had asked what disposition ought to be made of the surplus, after the debt is paid. To this question, Mr. L. said he would answer, first, to relieve the people of all their taxes, if the revenue derived from the public lands would be sufficient for the support of Government. We have now two hundred millions of acres of public lands, which, at the rate of two dollars, would yield us four hundred millions of dollars; the interest of which would be sufficient to carry on the operations of Government. This would be a new era in Government; a people living without paying, and a Government existing without the support of taxes. Here [said Mr. L.] is a proposition to appropriate for a poorhouse in one State, and another proposition for the same in all the States; and these objects are said to be for the common benefit. If this system is persevered in, we shall have no limits to the exercise of this power but our own good will and pleasure. Mr. L. denied the analogy contended for by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BARTON] between this case and that making appropriations for public seminaries in the new States. He said he would vote against the bill. He saw the length to which Congress would be obliged to go if the principle were adopted. Establish the principle of it, and hereafter it will be quoted as a precedent for measures which will require a more extensive construction of the powers of Congress than even now is advocated. No answer can then be given to such an argument; but all will be swept away by the doctrines of general construction. Then the powers of the State Governments will all be consolidated here, and the next step will be to a monarchy: for consolidation and monarchy are inseparable.

Mr. MARKS said that this bill introduced no new principle. There were many precedents for it. He instanced the appropriation, made in 1818, for the support of the Connecticut Asylum for the deaf and dumb, and that made in 1826 to a similar institution in Kentucky. That was the time, he said, to have raised an opposition to the principle, and not now. He instanced also the appropriation of ten thousand dollars to the sufferers of Alexandria by the fire which some years ago took place there. There was no difference, he thought, between appropriating the proceeds of the public lands directly, and the lands themselves, as in this case is proposed. That appropriation of the public money was made unanimously. He viewed this case as the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BARTON] that we should adopt this bill on the same principle that we make appropriations of public lands for the support of schools in the new States. We have [said Mr. M.] passed a bill appropriating three hundred thousand dollars for the benefit of Alabama, to aid her in making internal improvements, on the ground that it is also for the benefit of the United States. Would any one venture to say that the object of this bill is not more national and more for the common benefit than improvements in Alabama? He said he would vote for the bill, as it established no new principle.

Mr. MCKINLEY and Mr. LIVINGSTON again addressed the Senate, severally stating and explaining their views in relation to the bill.

Mr. BARTON said he rose to answer one part of the argument of the gentleman from Louisiana; he referred to what he [Mr. L.] said, in case this bill should pass: that precedent would be followed by precedent, until our Government would become a consolidation of the powers of the States; that the republic would be overthrown, and a monarchy substituted, and finally perhaps it would end in a despotism or in anarchy. That is not the process, [said Mr. B.] that is not the route which the Government will take in removing from republicanism to despotism. He would here remark, that, if Congress stepped beyond the powers granted by the constitution; we have the Judiciary branch to correct us, and confine us within our constitutional limits. But the gentleman from Louisiana did not state the proper process by which this Government may arrive at monarchy or despotism. Permit me to suggest [said Mr. B.] what I conceive to be the certain order of effecting this change. It is to render the Executive unrestrained and uncontrolled in his prerogatives. He was not going to argue now the removing power of the President, nor was he going to move to take up the resolutions he offered a few days ago on that question, but he was proceeding to suggest what he deemed a more likely way to arrive at despotism than Mr. L. had done. It is what General Washington called a "combination," that would rally round a military leader, dazzling the population by his achievements. The next step would be to have a Senate, (or some body having the name by which that body in France corresponding to a Senate is called) that could be driven from its post, and say that the President cannot be held responsible, till the end of his term, for any unconstitutional exercise of his power; that then is the proper time to call him to an account. As if the people did not know that the whole mischief was done during the exertion of his power—as if the people did not know that this was but a new version of the old story—"shutting the stable door after the horse was stolen," or like the administering of medicine to a dead person. This, too, to be told, by way of enabling the people—

[The VICE PRESIDENT said the question before the Senate was not the exercise of the Executive powers.]

Mr. B. said that he would then suggest an idea which he hoped would be in order, and applicable to the argument of the gentleman from Louisiana. Jupiter and Juno (and when he mentioned Homer he did not mean to quote him, although, if he happened to misquote, it would be more excusable than the misquotation of Shakespeare in relation to Banquo's ghost)—Jupiter and Juno, he repeated, are always, when introduced by Homer on any important occasion, concealed in impenetrable darkness, that they cannot be recognized by those against whom the celestial arms are raised. This is the mode to adopt, to enable the President to establish a monarchy. Now, with great deference, [said Mr. B.] I consider that illustration as pat to my purpose. As to the constitution, that is a res adjudicata—it is settled; and if we have trespassed beyond its limits, there is a restraining power in the Judiciary.

Mr. HAYNE said, whenever he heard the constitution mentioned on the floor, he knew at once what its fate would be—that it would be voted down. He remembered that a venerable Senator from North Carolina formerly said that the constitution was dead and buried. He pronounced its funeral discourse, and it would be now as impossible for human talent to revive it, as it is for man to raise the dead. The gentleman from Louisiana need not expect to succeed. He [Mr. H.] did not rise to discuss the question, but to remark what will be the natural consequences of this decision. He was glad that the gentleman from Alabama moved to carry out the principle of the bill to its legitimate consequences. He proposed, if an appropriation is to be made to one State, that it be extended to all. That was just, fair, and honorable. He would be glad the provisions of the bill had been extended farther, so as to embrace every charity in the country, and to give each a township. This is the true question—the length, depth, and breadth of the principle. What difference should be made between a community and a State? It is said, nothing can be more elevated in a national point of view than to extend the blessings of education; but why not also make appropriations for lunatic asylums? why not provide for the aged and poor? He did not allude, of course, to the army and navy, (that was a different question) but to the aged and destitute of the United States. Could any thing be more god-like than to relieve them? Why not include, also, alms-houses, and go on through all the circles of public and private calamities?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARKS] said we had given donations to people who suffered by fire in Alexandria, and asked, should any difference be made in appropriations of land and money. And are we thus [asked Mr. H.] to provide for persons who have suffered from the elements, by land or sea—for all who have met with misfortune—are all to be provided for? What will this end in? The United States will then have jurisdiction of all charities in the country, and next be called upon to make appropriations for them. He said he did not mean to go into the constitutional question, but to state the principle which we must act upon hereafter, if this bill is passed. Precedents have been quoted to support the bill, which in turn will become precedent for another exercise of a greater power. He wished to explain the responsibility which gentlemen would have to act under in supporting the bill, and on the third reading of it he would call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FOOT asked a division of the amendment. He wished to separate the appropriations for institutions already chartered from those intended for future institutions.

The question on the several amendments was put, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MCKINLEY moved an amendment going to make it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to select from among the lands subject to entry at private sale the township of land granted to any State within which such lands may lie; which was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON then moved to add to the bill "and the institutions hereafter incorporated shall sell said townships within five years after their incorporation;" which was also agreed to.

Mr. NOBLE, with a view to afford the Senate further time for reflection on the amendments, moved that they should be printed, and, with the bill, laid on the table; which was agreed to—ayes 25.

THE INDIANS.

On motion by Mr. WHITE, the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi, was considered in Committee of the Whole; and

Mr. WHITE, who reported the bill, explained its object, and, anticipating objections, he discussed at large the rights of the Indians, the rights of the States, and the power of the General Government, in reference to the right of the former to self-government within the limits of a sovereign State, against the will of such State, &c.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN then rose, and said that he desired to make some remarks on the subject of the bill, but, as he was much indisposed, and it was now late, he would move an adjournment.

At the request of Mr. McKINLEY, Mr. F. withdrew his motion, and Mr. McK. moved to add to the 4th section these words:

"And, upon the payment of such valuation, the improvements so valued and paid for shall pass to the United States, and possession shall not afterwards be permitted to any of the same tribe."

After some conversation between Messrs. FORSYTH, SPRAGUE, and McKINLEY, on the effect intended by the amendment, and before the question on the amendment was taken, an adjournment took place.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 7, 1830.

PAY OF PURSERS IN THE NAVY.

The bill "regulating the duties and providing for the compensation of pursers in the navy" being taken up for a second reading,

Mr. HAYNE, in explanation of the bill, stated the practice, which now prevails, of furnishing supplies to the officers and crews of the public armed vessels of the United States. The present mode of making the usual supplies is, said he, from the stores of the pursers, who distribute and make the necessary purchases on their own account. This practice tends to profuseness, as the purser is induced to pass off as much as he possibly can, no matter at how high a price he may lay his stores up. There were many other abuses, which, taken altogether, render a change necessary, and it is to remedy these evils in the system that the bill is recommended. It is proposed that the supplies usually furnished by pursers, shall be in future laid in by Government, under the direction of the Navy Department, and shall be committed to the care of the purser of the ship, who is to furnish them to the officers and crew, according to the accustomed mode of requisition, and at an advance of ten per cent. upon the prime cost of such supplies. Pursers are required to account, and are held responsible for all supplies confided to their care; and they are also bound to give such security as will be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Navy for the faithful performance of their duties. The bill proposes to change the compensation of pursers to a fixed annual salary, which is to be graduated according to the rank of the vessel in the line. A distinction is also proposed to be made between their pay while at sea, or on land service. Those regulations have been made on just and moderate principles. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to make such other regulations as he may consider necessary to give full effect to the provisions of the bill. These views which he had expressed, Mr. H. said, were concurred in by the Commissioners of the Navy, and it was believed, if acted upon, would promote the comfort of the crews of our armed vessels; would prevent abuses, and save money to the country.

Mr. HOLMES inquired why the supplies should not be distributed to the officers and crews at the invoice prices of them, since it was proposed by the bill to give a per annum compensation to the pursers, and why ten per cent. was fixed upon as an advance upon them?

Mr. HAYNE replied, that the committee experienced some difficulty in settling this matter, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine. He considered the per centum fixed upon as just and necessary: for, suppose [said Mr. H.] the United States ought not to make any thing in furnishing the supplies, was it not known that many articles of sea stores were perishable? The committee doubted whether ten per cent. would be sufficient to meet contingent losses. Some thought that fifteen or twenty per cent. would be little enough.

Mr. FOOT remarked, that the compensation to pursers, as specified in the fourth section of the bill, was different. It is proposed to give a purser on board of a ship of the line at the rate of two thousand five hundred dollars a year; on board of a frigate, two thousand dollars; on board of a sloop of war, one thousand six hundred dollars; and on board of any other vessel, one thousand three hundred dollars. Mr. F. said he knew no reason why a purser of a ship of the line, who has the best accommodations, who undergoes no more risk than, and is liable only to the same penalty as, the purser of a frigate, should have a larger compensation; nor, on the same principle, could he see why the purser of a sloop of war should have a smaller compensation than the purser of a frigate.

In small vessels, in vessels less than half the size, and less than half the crew of a ship of the line, the penalty and risk were the same. If the object is to pay for services, they are all entitled to the same sum.

Mr. HAYNE said that the compensation was intended to be graduated on the responsibility and trust of the pursers. Is it not manifest that, in a large ship, the trouble and responsibility will be double that of a small vessel? It was this consideration which suggested the discrimination in their salaries. Whenever pursers are on shore in the discharge of their duty at a navy yard or station, the bill provides that they shall receive the same pay as pursers on board a frigate; and, while absent on leave, or waiting orders, or absent on furlough, they shall receive the same allowances made to lieutenants under the same circumstances. These were the views of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and were recommended by the Navy Commissioners as judicious regulations.

Mr. FOOT observed, in reference to that part of the fourth section which provides that each purser shall receive the same pay as when on board of his ship, while settling his accounts at the seat of government, that, as the expenses were equal, the compensation ought to be the same.

Mr. HAYNE said it was intended to suppose the continuance of the cruise, at the end of the cruise; to consider the purser, with respect to his compensation, still on a cruise, as his labor and responsibility were the same. If the first principle (graduating the pay of pursers) was a correct one, then this followed as a legitimate consequence.

Mr. HOLMES said he was not satisfied with these reasons. If the purser of a large ship was longer settling his accounts than the purser of a small vessel, then there ought to be no discrimination.

Mr. HAYNE, in reply, referred the gentleman to the proviso in the fourth section of the bill, which limits the time of remaining at the seat of government to one month.

Mr. DICKERSON said the bill proposed to allow pursers absent on leave, waiting orders, or on a furlough, the same pay and allowances made to lieutenants under the same circumstances. He wished to know what lieutenants did receive.

Mr. HAYNE replied that they received half pay.

Mr. DICKERSON said that abuses in this respect prevailed. He considered the allowance proposed to be given to pursers while in the navy yard, was too great. He submitted that such compensation to pursers, while not on actual service, was too great.

Mr. HAYNE said, motives of economy suggested this provision. The moment they come on shore they are attached to the navy yard, and, while absent on furlough, they are to receive the same as lieutenants, who receive but five hundred dollars while absent, &c. It was indispensable to allow them something while not at sea, in order to keep up their connexion with the navy. This, [said Mr. H.] is doing nothing more than we ought to do. The abuses referred to by Mr. D. would be corrected under the bill, as the Secretary of the Navy was thus empowered.

Mr. DICKERSON did not believe it was necessary to pay them so much for the purpose of keeping up their connexion with the navy. They will willingly remain in the ranks without it, and he thought it was improper to pay them while off duty. That a whole corps should be paid at all times when out of service he could not agree, and would therefore vote against the provision.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend that part of the bill fixing the compensation for pursers, while settling their accounts at the seat of government, so that each purser should, in that case, have the pay of a purser of a sloop of war. Here there was no difference in the responsibility of any, and he thought the compensation of all should be the same.

Mr. HAYNE said he would not object to this amendment. The argument was strong that the compensation of all should be as their troubles are, the same. The rate of a sloop of war was a fair medium between a ship and a schooner.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT said there was great inequality, if not injustice, in graduating the pay of pursers as proposed in the fourth section of the bill. If a purser of a frigate is to have two thousand dollars, why should so wide a distinction be made between the purser of a ship of the line, who is to receive two thousand five hundred dollars, and of a sloop of war, who is to receive only one thousand six hundred dollars? I presume, [said Mr. F.] a purser on board of a sloop of war, on the West India station, would have great reason to complain, for although there is more responsibility as to the issuing of the supplies, yet on the bond there is the same responsibility.

Pursers ought not to be reduced in rank; but there may be pursers who have been long in the service in small vessels, and he therefore thought so great a distinction as this ought not to be kept up.

Mr. F. moved to amend the bill, so that, instead of giving, as it now proposes, one thousand six hundred dollars to the purser of a sloop of war, "and one thousand three hundred dollars to the purser of any other vessel," it should read, and "to the purser on board of a sloop of war" or "of any other vessel, one thousand five hundred dollars per annum."

Mr. HAYNE opposed this amendment. The committee had fixed upon the graduation of the pay proposed in the bill as recommended by the Navy Commissioners. He considered the rates were reasonable, and showed they were proportioned as nearly as could be to the trouble and responsibility incurred by the respective officers.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend the same section so as to reduce the salary of a purser of a ship of the line from two thousand five hundred dollars to two thousand dollars, being the salary proposed for a purser of a frigate.

Mr. HAYNE opposed this amendment. He said there could be no better reason for reducing the salary of a purser of a ship of the line to that of the purser of a frigate, than there is for reducing the latter to that of a sloop of war. He dwelt again on the necessity of giving an excess of compensation equivalent to the greater degree of trouble and responsibility attached to the office of purser of a large vessel. The greater number of the crew of large vessels he adduced as an additional reason why regard should be had to the consequent labor that must be undergone.

Mr. FOOT considered that the pay of pursers ought not to be greater than that of the commanding officers of the navy.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said there was no principle whatever in the amendment. Take the case of collectors in New York and Baltimore; in the former place the collector has double the responsibility, and double the salary.

After a few observations from Mr. FOOT in reply,

The question on the amendment was decided in the negative.

Mr. DICKERSON said he was opposed to the difference of compensation proposed in the bill when pursers are at sea and on shore. The bill proposes to give them, when discharging their duties at the navy yard, the same pay as pursers of frigates. He considered this too much, the difference of the service did not justify such a compensation. He moved to reduce the sum to the pay of pursers of sloops of war.

Mr. WOODBURY, admitting the responsibility to be less in such cases, did not object to the reduction, on the part of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to strike out the words "and while absent on leave, or waiting orders, or absent on furlough, they (pursers) shall receive the same pay and allowances made to lieutenants under the same circumstances." He thought that paying them while not in service was too much like pensioning. He moved the amendment to try the sense of the Senate on it, although he was aware of the necessity of keeping them connected with the navy.

Mr. SILSBEE expressed a hope that the amendment would not prevail, unless it was the intention of gentlemen to drive them out of the service at once. They ought [said Mr. S.] to be kept in connexion with the navy, and if you agree to this proposition, the consequence will be, they must quit the service. He trusted the Senate would not adopt it: for, if we do, we may as well say to them at once, "go—leave the service." He did not consider their proposed pay as more than reasonable and just.

Mr. DICKERSON said he would withdraw his amendment, though he did not think it required so large a sum to keep the pursers in the service.

Mr. HAYNE said, if it had been agreed to, the only effect of it would be to double the expense of the Government in this respect: for they would all, of necessity, be attached to some navy yard or station, instead of being allowed leave of absence, as heretofore. The whole bill has been suggested by considerations of reform in the department of the Government.

The Indians.—Pursers in the Navy.

[SENATE.]

Mr. FOOT said he might have misapprehended the bill, but he was of opinion that it was neither calculated to reform nor to decrease our expenses. The first section of the bill proposes that all articles be provided by Government, under the direction of the Navy Department. Now, any one who is at all acquainted with our foreign stations knows that it is often necessary to make purchases at foreign ports. Each ship must then have an agent, or a new department must be created—a purchasing department, Mr. F. supposed.

Mr. WOODBURY said the second section of the bill provides that, where there is no navy agent to make the necessary purchases, the purser shall be permitted to purchase any articles for the use of the crew, and then only in an emergency, and on the authority of the commanding officer; for which purchase vouchers will be required. Mr. W. stated that particular instances had occurred where their emoluments had been supposed to reach, in a year, eight or ten thousand dollars, and that a reduction would excite less general competition for the office. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE INDIANS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi.

Mr. McKINLEY withdrew the amendment which he proposed to the fourth section, yesterday, intending, as he said, to offer it at a different stage of the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN then rose in reply to Mr. WHITE, and spoke about two hours. At about three o'clock he gave way for a motion to adjourn.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, 1830.

PAY OF PURSERS IN THE NAVY.

The bill "regulating the duties and providing for the compensation of pursers in the navy," was taken up, and read the third time; and the question being on its passage,

Mr. FOOT said that sufficient information had not been imparted to induce him to agree to the passage of this bill. He had examined into the amount of compensation now given to pursers, and he found that this bill proposed an entire change in relation to it. The number of pursers in the service, according to the blue book, is forty-three, and their compensation, at six hundred and sixty dollars per annum, the present allowance, amounts to twenty-eight thousand three hundred and eighty dollars. By this bill the compensation of the purser of a ship of the line is fixed at two thousand five hundred dollars a year, while the captain has but one thousand nine hundred and thirty dollars; and the purser of a frigate is to have two thousand dollars, which also exceeds the pay of a captain, unless he is commanding a squadron. The purser on board of a sloop of war is to have one thousand six hundred dollars, and of any other vessel one thousand three hundred dollars, both of which salaries exceed that of a master commandant, who, under the present regulations, receives but one thousand one hundred dollars. Their pay is proposed to be made greater, also, than that of a lieutenant, who only receives nine hundred and fifty dollars per annum. They are to receive, too, while not in service, the same pay as a lieutenant. Mr. F. said he could not see what possible public advantage could be derived from this alteration. The whole number of ships [he said] was twenty-five; and allowing a purser to each, the increase of expenditure, according to a calculation he made, would be thirty-three thousand three hundred dollars; the expense, according to the present system, being twenty-eight thousand three hundred and eighty, and according to the proposed plan sixty-one thousand six hundred and eighty dollars. The bill proposes an increase of pay more than one hundred per cent. of what it now is, while the officers who perform services at sea, with the exception of the captain of a squadron, receive not more than the purser of a second rate vessel.

Mr. HAYNE said if there was any thing certain in the world, it was, that the operation of this bill would be to reduce the compensation of pursers one-half. The object of the committee was to reduce their compensation, and there was no doubt whatever but that the bill would produce that effect. Notwithstanding this, it was very true that the change would produce an additional charge on the treasury. Mr. H. said, he would explain the subject, by stating the operation of the existing and the proposed rule, and then gentleman could decide which was the better. It has been felt as an evil, of which every one connected with the navy has complained, that the crew have been invariably divested of their entire pay by the pursers, who are authorized to lay up stores of goods, and who derive the greater part of their compensation by the sales of these goods to the sailors, at advanced prices.

The United States, as has been observed, allow a compensation to the pursers; but this is not their only compensation; it is the smallest part of it. They are permitted [said Mr. H.] to carry out stores, and sell them at a profit to the ship's company; and, although attempts have been made to regulate these profits, they have, on some articles, it is known, amounted to sixty per cent. Under this system, what must be the effect? And he would appeal to all who were connected with the navy, to those who know what effects such causes would produce on the human character. He repeated, that the purser was permitted to lay up the stores, and, to enable him to do so, money was advanced to him by the United States. By the regulations, he is authorized to sell them at a per centage; thus [Mr. H. said] making it his interest to purchase the goods at a high price, and to dispose of as much as possible. He is not dependent on his salary, but on the profits to be derived from the sale of the stores to the sailors, who are induced to purchase so much, and at so high a price, that, at the winding up of their accounts, their pay is exhausted by the purser. The operation of the law [said Mr. H.] was cruel and unjust towards these men, who were the most liable of any to be imposed upon. By the existing regulations, the purser is induced to screw from the sailor his last farthing. It was impossible [he said] to avoid frauds, under the present system. The purser had the opportunity and the means to lay up the stores at one price, and charge them at another. Mr. H. said he was not authorized to say that such a practice was general, but one case of this character had been reported by the Navy Department. It appeared on the trial of a purser, at a late court martial, that he had bought goods at one dollar and fifty cents, and sold the same at three dollars and fifty cents. The frauds of the purser were detected, he was found guilty, and cashiered. Abuses had been so interwoven in the system, that they must be practised while it continues. Mr. H. said he understood the profits of a purser, in this way, for a single year, were ten thousand dollars; and this was not improbable, for they were not required to render an account of their sales. That such abuses did prevail, no gentleman would deny. By the bill, the goods are to be purchased by Government, under the direction of the Navy Department, and furnished to the sailors at an advance of ten per cent. instead of allowing the purser to draw from the crew ten thousand dollars beyond his pay, as in the instance he had alluded to. Why, he asked, appoint pursers at a salary of seven or eight hundred dollars, and pay them the balance out of the pockets of the poor hard-working sailors, who, of all others, required to be defended from imposition? It was an act of common justice, and it was due to our sailors, to their comfort and happiness, to protect them. Mr. H. then recapitulated his arguments of yesterday, and, in conclusion, read an extract from the report of the Navy Commissioners, in recommendation of the measure proposed.

Mr. FOOT said there was no doubt that the emoluments of pursers would, in many instances, be reduced one-half, nor was there any more doubt that their pay, when unemployed, would be increased. He admitted the evil existed, but he considered the bill not calculated to remove it. The saving proposed by allowing the purser ten per cent. reminded him of the saving made some time ago by the Navy Agent in extra postages. He was, however, in favor of the first section of the bill, but he objected to that part of the bill increasing the pay of pursers to that of the highest navy officers. As the provisions of the bill would not, in his opinion, correct the evil, and as it would cause an additional expense of thirty odd thousand dollars, if adopted, with an additional commission of ten per cent. to be allowed by the United States, he felt it his duty to oppose it.

Mr. BELL opposed the bill, on the ground that neither the talents nor experience required to perform the duties of purser, or the responsibility attached to the office, justified so high a salary as the bill contemplated. Many revenue officers handle and are entrusted with more money and property than any purser, and yet have not a salary of more than one thousand dollars a year. Any person qualified to fill the office of clerk, if a man of probity, was competent to discharge the duties of purser. The situation was much sought after, as the services required were not difficult; and, if the salary was even less, we would find many anxious to accept of it, sufficiently qualified. We hear [said Mr. B.] much talk about reform and retrenchment. He would be glad, he said, to see some of it practised.

Mr. DICKERSON said he believed reform was necessary with respect to pursers, but he did not think this was the best way to effect it, by increasing their salaries. The abuses were enormous, and, to remedy them, he would suggest, to give to the pursers the salaries they have, and inflict a penalty on them for whatever abuse in office they may be guilty of. Let them sell out the goods at a fair price, and, if they behave dishonestly, discharge or cashier them, but do not raise their salaries. What reason, he asked, was there for raising them to the grade of lieutenants, when not on service? Is it because they have heretofore made too much, and we do not like to reduce them at once? Is it through a desire to save, not the United States, but these officers? If a proper accountability were enforced, the power of the Department would reach them; and he believed their present compensation was amply sufficient, without increasing it. Applications for this office were numerous, and it was generally thought that the office of purser is the direct road to fortune. Although believing it to be the intention of the Committee to produce a reform of these abuses, yet considering the bill ineffectual for that object, he would vote against its passage; and, as he wished to record his name, he asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TAZEWELL said he would vote for the bill, because it was recommended by the Navy Commissioners, although he had himself but little confidence in the success of the experiment. He had proposed to alter the rations, and to assimilate them to those of the French or British navy, which, if done, would render this officer, if at all necessary, merely a commissary, and would make the seamen more secure, and frauds less frequent; but others, more conversant with the matter than he was, recommended this bill, and he was willing to make the experiment. This was not a new plan. Complaints like the present had been formerly made in relation to the issuing of tobacco—a very important article in the consumption of sailors. The pursers had been in the habit of purchasing tobacco at high prices, charging accordingly, and made enormous profits. The Government, to remedy the evil, purchased the tobacco for each ship, and, in most cases, the tobacco, in a few months, became damaged, was condemned, and the purser had to purchase more. Such will be the case here, he feared; and lay up stores how and when you will, they will become damaged, and be condemned, and somebody must buy others in their stead, and that somebody will be the purser. But, as navy officers of experience have recommended this measure, he would vote for it, although he had no confidence in it, and but little in his own plan. His proposition was to alter the component parts of the ration, so as to allow the sailors to select what luxuries they thought proper, in lieu of the unnecessarily large quantities they now receive.

Mr. HOLMES said he was disposed to try the experiment. All saw and admitted the evil. He would vote for the bill.

Mr. BENTON opposed the plan proposed, as not calculated to effect its object, although, he was sure, suggested by the best motives. He said, a similar experiment was tried to remedy the abuses and impositions practised towards the Indians by the agents appointed to deliver them their goods, on the part of the United States. That experiment cost the country three hundred thousand dollars, and, notwithstanding, this had lasted for upwards of thirty years. He recommended the practice adopted in the army. The soldiers, he said, were as subject to imposition as sailors. There they have sutlers, and the soldiers may purchase from them, or not, as they please. In reply to the objection which might be urged against this, that sailors, being at sea, had no choice left, but were obliged to purchase from the pursers, Mr. B. said that the average time which our vessels were absent from a port, was not more than three months—a space of time for which they could, while in port, easily provide themselves in all necessities.

Mr. HAYNE replied that, under the existing system, all admitted that evils prevailed, and that a remedy was required. When an inquiry is made as to the proper remedy—and he submitted that every gentleman wanted light on the subject—ought we not, he asked, to make application for information to those who are acquainted with the whole system, with the nature and extent of the evils, and who are competent to recommend measures to correct those evils? He thanked gentlemen for giving the Naval Committee credit for good intentions, however they have failed in carrying them into effect; but he had to inform gentlemen that, at every step the Naval Committee took, they felt the want of that practical knowledge of the matter which was necessary for their progress, and had to apply for information to those experienced naval officers, the Commissioners of the Navy. It was in conformity with their suggestions and recommendations the provisions of the bill were framed, with the exception of some slight variation. The measures recommended by the gentleman from New Jersey have been resorted to, and have failed; and he would submit whether, on such subjects as this, gentlemen ought not to distrust their judgments. As to the remedy of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL] to alter the rations, he did not think it inconsistent with this bill, and if he [Mr. T.] wished to offer it, there was a bill before the Committee to which it could be appended. He would suggest that the President should be authorized to alter the rations from time to time, and that they should not be fixed by law as they now are. He would not say that the rations of our navy should be the same as that of the British or French. In the British navy, the sailors are forced to drink several quarts of beer a day, to make them red-faced; and if the gentleman would look into the rations of the French navy, he did not think that he [Mr. T.]

would consent to put our sailors on such and so small an allowance.

Mr. H. again stated the benefits which would result to the sailors, and to the United States, from the adoption of this bill, and then proceeded to notice the objections of Mr. BENTON; who had remarked that the experiment proposed had been tried with the Indians, and had failed. There was a wide difference, [said Mr. H.]; there was no analogy whatever between the two cases. In this bill guards are proposed which will effectually prevent any abuses. The supplies are to be laid up on requisition, on the order of the Navy Department, and will be subject to inspection. An invoice of them is to be given to the commander of the ship and to the purser, who is to give a receipt for them, when confided to his care. He is then held responsible for all, and has to keep regular accounts with the officers and crew. It is thus impossible that the stores will not be laid in well, and that any frauds or impositions can take place. The situation of sailors and soldiers was, he said, quite different. The soldier may purchase from the sutler or not, as he pleases, as he has another vender to resort to, but the sailor has no such chance—there is no competition at sea—the purser has all in his own power. When on shore he may act as the soldier. This bill may not, [said Mr. H.] succeed; but as those most skilled in such matters advise that it will remedy an existing evil, the committee thought it their duty to lay it before the Senate.

Mr. FOOT said that the bill would cause an increase not only of the expense of pursers, but an increase of expenses, exclusive of that, to the United States. If sugar is laid up here at twelve and a half cents a pound, and the vessel sails for the West Indies, there sugar of the same quality can be had for two and a half cents a pound. Slops, as they are called, can be purchased in the Mediterranean much cheaper than here; yet by each of these the United States will be a loser. He suggested to fix the premium at ten per cent on issues, and to let the compensation of pursers stand as it now is.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that he understood the chairman of the Committee [Mr. HARRIS] to state that the money was advanced by Government in long voyages. Suppose, then, that a vessel goes to the Pacific for three years, and that Government advances thirty thousand dollars, the interest on that sum would be equal to the purser's pay. In reply to what had been said by Mr. BENTON, Mr. S. said he was correct in stating that the general time of a voyage at sea was three months, but not so in stating that all a sailor had to do when he arrived in port, was to go ashore and buy what he wanted. The sailor has not money: he takes none to sea with him, and if he did, [said Mr. S.] he would throw it overboard, likely. But suppose Jack asks the purser for ten dollars; whether to go on shore for a frolic or buy a coat; the purser refuses him. Jack then says, I want a pair of boots. A sailor [said Mr. S.] never wants boots; but this case had, to his knowledge, occurred. Jack, of course, gets the boots; he is charged fifteen dollars for them; he goes on shore and sells them for two dollars, all which he spends. This, [said Mr. S.] is in reply to the remedy suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, and this would be the result of it. He said he would vote for the bill.

The question was then put on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, 34 to 10.

THE INDIANS.

The Senate resumed the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the Mississippi.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN moved to add to the bill the following:

"Sec. 9. That, until the said tribes or nations shall choose to remove, as by this act is contemplated, they shall be protected in their present possessions, and in the enjoyment of all their rights of territory and government, as heretofore exercised and enjoyed, from all interruptions and encroachments.

"Sec. 10. That, before any removal shall take place of any of the said tribes or nations, and before any exchange or exchanges of land be made as aforesaid, that the rights of any such tribes or nations, in the premises, shall be stipulated for, secured, and guaranteed, by treaty or treaties, as heretofore made."

Mr. MCKINLEY then renewed the amendment which he heretofore offered to the 4th section, in the following words:

"And upon the payment of such valuation, the improvements so valued and paid for shall pass to the United States; and possession shall not afterwards be permitted to any of the same tribe."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN addressed the Senate about two hours, in continuation of his speech heretofore commenced, when he gave way for an adjournment.

FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1830.

The bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi, was resumed, in Committee of the Whole, with the amendment offered by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Mr. F. addressed the Senate nearly two hours in continuation and conclusion of his speech on the subject.

[His speech, as delivered on the three several days, was as follows:]

I propose an amendment, Mr. President, to this bill, by the addition of two sections in the forms of provisos. The first of which brings up to our consideration the nature of our public duties, in relation to the Indian nations; and the second provides for the continuance of our future negotiations, by the mode of treaties, as in our past intercourse with them. The following is the amendment:

[See previous day's proceedings.]

The first of these sections discloses the real object sought by this bill, seemingly composed of harmless clauses. It supposes that the design of the system of which the present bill forms but a part, is really to remove all the Indian tribes beyond the Mississippi, or, in case of their refusal, to subject them to State sovereignty and legislation. The honorable Senator [Mr. WHITE] who yesterday addressed the Senate, found it necessary so to consider it; and to anticipate and endeavor to meet all such objections to this course of policy, as he deemed worthy of a refutation.

Sir, I prefer that this latent object should be put fully before us, that we and the nation may look at it, and freely scrutinize it. At an early stage of the present administration, its views and opinions on the interesting subject of our Indian relations were developed in language not to be mistaken. It is greatly to be regretted, sir, that our present Chief Magistrate did not pursue the wise and prudent policy of his exalted predecessor, President Washington, who, at a time of collision and difficulty with these tribes, came before the Senate, and laid open to them, in propositions for their approbation, the various important subjects involved in our relations. The annexed extract from the Journals of the Senate illustrates the principles of Washington's administration. It follows:

"SATURDAY, August 22, 1789.

"The President of the United States came into the Senate, attended by General Knox, and laid before the Senate the following state of facts, with the questions thereto annexed, for their advice and consent."

This was a most important document. It developed all the collisions that existed between the Indian tribes and the States; and referred to the consideration of the Senate certain leading principles of policy which he thought it was wise to pursue. These principles are embodied in seven distinct interrogatories; the fourth of which submits to the Senate "whether the United States shall solemnly guaranty to the Creeks their remaining territory, and maintain the same, if necessary, by a line of military posts." This question "was wholly answered in the affirmative" by that body, and the blank (for an appropriation of necessary funds) was ordered to be filled at the discretion of the President of the United States. Again, on the 11th of August, 1790, President Washington sent a special message to the Senate by his Secretary, the subject matter of which he introduces by the following suggestion:

"Gentlemen of the Senate:

"Although the treaty with the Creeks may be regarded as the main foundation of the future peace and prosperity of the Southwestern frontier of the United States, yet, in order fully to effect so desirable an object, the treaties which have been entered into with the other tribes in that quarter, must be faithfully performed on our part."

He then proceeds to remind the Senate, that, by the treaty with the Cherokees, in November, 1785, (the treaty of Hopewell) "the said Cherokees placed themselves under the protection of the United States, and had a boundary assigned them;" that the white people settled on the frontiers had openly violated the said boundary by intruding on the Indian lands; that the United States in Congress assembled, on the first day of September, 1788, had, by their proclamation, forbidden all such unwarrantable intrusions, enjoined the intruders to depart without loss of time; but that there were still some refractory intruders remaining. The President then distinctly announces his determination to exert the powers entrusted to him by the constitution, in order to carry into faithful execution the treaty of Hopewell, unless a new boundary should be arranged with the Cherokees, embracing the intrusive settlement, and compensating the Cherokees in the cessions they shall make on the occasion. And in view of the whole case, he requests the advice of the Senate, whether overtures shall be made to the Cherokees to arrange such new boundary, and concludes his communication with the following emphatical question: "3d. Shall the United States stipulate solemnly to guaranty the new boundary which may be arranged?"

It produced as pointed a response: for the Senate

"Resolved, In case a new or other boundary than that stipulated by the treaty of Hopewell shall be concluded with the Cherokee Indians, that the Senate do advise and consent solemnly to guaranty the same." A new boundary was arranged by a second treaty; the solemn guarantee was given to the Cherokees; and cogent, indeed, should be the causes that now lead us to think or speak lightly of such sacred obligations.

I lament, sir, that so bright and illustrious a precedent was not regarded, and that the President had not yielded to the safe guidance of such high example; and I deplore it the more because it was concerning these very tribes, in the State of Georgia, that General Washington chose to confer with his constitutional advisers.

Instead of this just proceeding, the present administration have thought proper, without the slightest consultation with either House of Congress; without any opportunity for counsel or concert, discussion or deliberation, on the part of these co-ordinate branches of the Government, to despatch the whole subject in a tone and style of decisive construction of our obligations and of Indian rights. It would really seem, sir, as if opinion was to be forestalled, and the door of inquiry shut forever upon these grave questions, so deeply implicating our national faith and honor. We must firmly protest against this Executive disposition of these high interests. No one branch of the Government can rescind, modify, or explain away, our public treaties. They are the supreme law of the land, so declared to be by the constitution. They bind the President and all other departments, rulers and people. And when their provisions shall be controverted; when their breach of fulfilment become subjects of investigation; here, sir, and in the other Hall of our Legislation, are such momentous concerns to be debated and considered. That we may freely exercise these essential powers, and review the proclaimed opinions of the Executive, I have submitted the first branch of the amendment. We possess the constitutional right to inquire wherefore it was that, when some of these tribes appealed to the Executive for protection, according to the terms of our treaties with them, they received the answer that the Government of the United States could not interpose to arrest or prevent the legislation of the States over them. Sir, it was a harsh measure, indeed, to faithful allies, that had so long reposed in confidence on a nation's faith. They had, in the darkest hour of trial, turned to the ægis which the most solemn pledges had provided for them, and were comforted by the conviction that it would continue to shed upon them a pure and untarnished beam of light and hope. Deep, indeed, must have been their despondency, when their political father assured them that their confidence would be presumptuous, and dissuaded them from all expectation of relief.

The instructions that have proceeded from the War Department to the agents of Indian affairs have excited just and strong jealousies of the measures that are now recommended. They have prompted this amendment, in the hope that, by some public and decided expression of our disapprobation, a train of political management with these tribes may be arrested, and our country saved from the dishonor of buying over the consent of corrupted chiefs to a traitorous surrender of their country. I will read a part of these instructions; they are from the War Department, to Generals Carroll and Coffee, of the date of 30th May, 1829: "The past (remarks the Secretary, in respect to Indian councils) has demonstrated their utter aversion to this mode, whilst it has been made equally clear, that another mode promises greater success. In regard to the first, (that by councils) the Indians have seen in the past, that it has been by the result of councils that the extent of their country has been from time to time diminished. They all comprehend this. Hence it is that those who are interested in keeping them where they are alarm their fears, and, by previous cautioning, induce them to reject all offers looking to this object. There is no doubt, however, but the mass of the people would be glad to emigrate; and there is as little doubt that they are kept from this exercise of their choice by their chiefs and other interested and influential men," &c. Again: "Nothing is more certain than that, if the chiefs and influential men could be brought into the measure, the rest would implicitly follow. It becomes, therefore, a matter of necessity, if the General Government would benefit these people, that it move upon them in the line of their own prejudices, and, by the adoption of any proper means, break the power that is warring with their best interests. The question is, how can this be best done? Not, it is believed, for the reasons suggested, by means of a general council. There, they would be awakened to all the intimations which those who are opposed to their exchange of country might throw out; and the consequence would be—what it has been—a firm refusal to acquiesce. The best resort is believed to be that which is embraced in an appeal to the chiefs and influential men, not together, but apart, at their own houses, and, by a proper exposition of their real condition, rouse them to think of that; whilst offers to them of extensive reservations in fee simple, and other rewards, would, it is hoped, result in obtaining their acquiescence."

Let us analyze this singular state paper. It does not

The Indians.

[SENATE.]

relish the congregation of Indian councils. In these assemblies, they deliberate and weigh the policy of measures; they calculate the results of proposed improvements. These councils embody the collected wisdom of the tribes. Their influence is of the authority of law; the people look to them for protection. They know that in the multitude of counsellors there is safety: Hence nations, far in advance of the Indians, always meet in council, when their great interests are to be promoted or defended. But these special agents are discouraged from hoping that the objects can be obtained in this good old fashioned way. The Indians are too wise to be caught when the net is spread so fully in sight. They are directed to avoid all associations; and, with the public purse in hand, to take the chiefs alone; to approach individually, and at home; "to meet them in the way of their prejudices." I admire the ingenious clothing of a most odious proposal.

A strong hint is suggested to try the effect of terror, and, by a proper exposition of their real condition, rouse them to think upon that, and to follow this up with "large offers to them of extensive reservations in fee simple, and other rewards." The report made by one of these agents to the War Department, dated September 2d, 1829, still further discloses the nature of the exigencies to which the Indians are to be subjected, to constrain their removal. The agent observes, "The truth is, they (Cherokees) rely with great confidence on a favorable report on the petition they have before Congress. If that is rejected, and the laws of the States are enforced, you will have no difficulty in obtaining an exchange of lands with them." It may be true, that if we withdraw our protection, give them over to the high-handed, heart-breaking legislation of the States, and drive them to despair, that when improper means fail to win them, force and terror may compel them. We shall have no difficulty, the agent assures the War Department. Sir, there will be one difficulty, that should be deemed insurmountable. Such a process will disgrace us in the estimation of the whole civilized world! It will degrade us in our own eyes, and blot the page of our history with indelible dishonor!

Now, sir, I have brought this measure before the Senate, and wait with intense anxiety to hear the final disposition of it. Where is the man that can, in view of such policy, open the door, or afford the slightest facility to the operation of influences that we should blush with honest shame, could we, in an unguarded moment, consent to have employed with our equal in the scale of civilization? It is not intended, sir, to ascribe this policy exclusively to the present administration. Far from it. The truth is, we have long been gradually, and almost unconsciously, declining into these devious ways, and we shall inflict lasting injury upon our good name, unless we speedily abandon them.

I now proceed to the discussion of those principles which, in my humble judgment, fully and clearly sustain the claims of the Indians to all their political and civil rights, as by them asserted. And here, I insist that, by immemorial possession, as the original tenants of the soil, they hold a title beyond and superior to the British Crown and her colonies, and to all adverse pretensions of our confederation and subsequent Union. God, in his providence, planted these tribes on this Western continent, so far as we know, before Great Britain herself had a political existence. I believe, sir, it is not now seriously denied that the Indians are men, endowed with kindred faculties and powers with ourselves; that they have a place in human sympathy, and are justly entitled to a share in the common bounties of a benignant Providence. And, with this conceded, I ask in what code of the law of nations, or by what process of abstract deduction, their rights have been extinguished?

Where is the decree or ordinance that has stripped these early and first lords of the soil? Sir, no record of such measure can be found. And I might triumphantly rest the hopes of these feeble fragments of once great nations upon this impregnable foundation. However mere human policy, or the law of power, or the tyrant's plea of expediency, may have found it convenient at any or in all times to recede from the unchangeable principles of eternal justice, no argument can shake the political maxim, that, where the Indian always has been, he enjoys an absolute right still to be, in the free exercise of his own modes of thought, government, and conduct.

In the light of natural law, can a reason for a distinction exist in the mode of enjoying that which is my own? If I use it for hunting, may another take it because he needs it for agriculture? I am aware that some writers have, by a system of artificial reasoning, endeavored to justify, or rather excuse the encroachments made upon Indian territory; and they denominate these abstractions the law of nations, and, in this ready way, the question is despatched. Sir, as we trace the sources of this law, we find its authority to depend either upon the conventions or common consent of nations. And when, permit me to inquire, were the Indian tribes ever consulted on the establishment of such a law? Whoever represented them or their interests in any Congress of nations, to confer upon the public rules of intercourse, and the proper foundations of dominion and property? The plain matter of fact is, that all these partial doctrines have resulted from the selfish plans and pursuits of more enlightened nations; and it is not matter for any great wonder, that they should so largely partake of a mercenary and exclusive spirit toward the claims of the Indians.

It is, however, admitted, sir, that, when the increase of population and the wants of mankind demand the cultivation of the earth, a duty is thereby devolved upon the proprietors of large and uncultivated regions, of devoting them to such useful purposes. But such appropriations are to be obtained by fair contract, and for reasonable compensation. It is, in such a case, the duty of the proprietor to sell: we may properly address his reason to induce him; but we cannot rightfully compel the cession of his lands, or take them by violence, if his consent be withheld. It is with great satisfaction that I am enabled, upon the best authority, to affirm, that this duty has been largely and generously met and fulfilled on the part of the aboriginal proprietors of this continent. Several years ago, official reports to Congress stated the amount of Indian grants to the United States to exceed two hundred and fourteen millions of acres. Yes, sir, we have acquired, and now own, more land as the fruits of their bounty than we shall dispose of at the present rate to actual settlers in two hundred years. For, very recently, it has been ascertained, on this floor, that our public sales average not more than about one million of acres annually. It greatly aggravates the wrong that is now meditated against these tribes, to survey the rich and ample districts of their territories, that either force or persuasion have incorporated into our public domains. As the tide of our population has rolled on, we have added purchase to purchase. The confiding Indian listened to our professions of friendship: we called him brother, and he believed us. Millions after millions he has yielded to our importunity, until we have acquired more than can be cultivated in centuries—and yet we crave more. We have crowded the tribes upon a few miserable acres on our Southern frontier: it is all that is left to them of their once boundless forests: and still, like the horse-leech, our insatiated cupidity cries, give! give!

Before I proceed to deduce collateral confirmations of this original title, from all our political intercourse and conventions with the Indian tribes, I beg leave to pause a moment, and view the case as it lies beyond the treaties made with them; and aside also from all conflicting claims between the confederation, and the colonies, and the Congress of the States. Our ancestors found these people, far removed from the commotions of Europe, exercising all the rights, and enjoying the privileges, of free and independent sovereigns of this new world. They were not a wild and lawless horde of banditti, but lived under the restraints of government, patriarchal in its character, and energetic in its influence. They had chiefs, head men, and councils. The white men, the authors of all their wrongs, approached them as friends—they extended the olive branch; and, being then a feeble colony and at the mercy of the native tenants of the soil, by presents and professions, propitiated their good will. The Indian yielded a slow, but substantial confidence; granted to the colonists an abiding place; and suffered them to grow up to man's estate beside him. He never raised the claim of elder title: as the white man's wants increased, he opened the hand of his bounty wider and wider. By and by, conditions are changed. His people melt away; his lands are constantly coveted; millions after millions are ceded. The Indian bears it all meekly; he complains, indeed, as well he may; but suffers on: and now he finds that this neighbor, whom his kindness had nourished, has spread an adverse title over the last remains of his patrimony, barely adequate to his wants, and turns upon him, and says, "away! we cannot endure you so near us! These forests and rivers, these groves of your fathers, these firesides and hunting grounds, are ours by the right of power, and the force of numbers." Sir, let every treaty be blotted from our records, and in the judgment of natural and unchangeable truth and justice, I ask, who is the injured, and who is the aggressor? Let conscience answer, and I fear not the result. Sir, let those who please, denounce the public feeling on this subject as the morbid excitement of a false humanity; but I return with the inquiry, whether I have not presented the case truly, with no feature of it overcharged or distorted? And, in view of it, who can help feeling, sir? Do the obligations of justice change with the color of the skin? Is it one of the prerogatives of the white man, that he may disregard the dictates of moral principles, when an Indian shall be concerned? No, sir. In that severe and impartial scrutiny which futurity will cast over this subject, the righteous award will be, that those very causes which are now pleaded for the relaxed enforcement of the rules of equity, urged upon us not only a rigid execution of the highest justice, to the very letter, but claimed at our hands a generous and magnanimous policy.

Standing here, then, on this unshaken basis, how is it possible that even a shadow of claim to soil, or jurisdiction, can be derived, by forming a collateral issue between the State of Georgia and the General Government? Her complaint is made against the United States, for encroachments on her sovereignty. Sir, the Cherokees are no parties to this issue; they have no part in this controversy. They hold by better title than either Georgia or the Union. They have nothing to do with State sovereignty, or United States, sovereignty. They are above and beyond both. True, sir, they have made treaties with both, but not to acquire title or jurisdiction; these they had before—ages before the evil hour to them, when their white brothers fled to them for an asylum. They treated to secure protection and guarantee for subsisting powers and privileges; and so far as those conventions raise obligations, they are willing to meet, and always have met, and faithfully performed them; and now expect from a great people, the like fidelity to plighted covenants.

I have thus endeavored to bring this question up to the control of first principles. I forget all that we have promised, and all that Georgia has repeatedly conceded, and, by her conduct, confirmed. Sir, in this abstract presentation of the case, stripped of every collateral circumstance—and these only the more firmly established the Indian claims—thus regarded, if the contending parties were to exchange positions; place the white man where the Indian stands; load him with all these wrongs, and what path would his outraged feelings strike out for his career? Twenty shillings tax, I think it was, imposed upon the immortal Hampden, roused into activity the slumbering fires of liberty in the Old World, from which she dates a glorious epoch, whose healthful influence still cherishes the spirit of freedom. A few pence of duty on tea, that invaded no fireside, excited no fears, disturbed no substantial interest whatever, awakened in the American colonies a spirit of firm resistance; and how was the tea tax met, sir? Just as it should be. There was lurking beneath this trifling imposition of duty, a covert assumption of authority, that led directly to oppressive exactions. "No taxation without representation," became our motto. We would neither pay the tax nor drink the tea. Our fathers buckled on their armor, and, from the water's edge, repelled the encroachments of a misguided cabinet. We successfully and triumphantly contended for the very rights and privileges that our Indian neighbors now implore us to protect and preserve to them. Sir, this thought invests the subject under debate with most singular and momentous interest. We, whom God has exalted to the very summit of prosperity—whose brief career forms the brightest page in history; the wonder and praise of the world; freedom's hope, and her consolation; we, about to turn traitors to our principles and our fame—about to become the oppressors of the feeble, and to cast away our birthright! Sir, I hope for better things.

It is a subject full of grateful satisfaction, that, in our public intercourse with the Indians, ever since the first colonies of white men found an abode on these Western shores, we have distinctly recognized their title; treated with them as owners, and in all our acquisitions of territory, applied ourselves to these ancient proprietors, by purchase and cession alone, to obtain the right of soil. Sir, [said Mr. F.] I challenge the record of any other or different pretension. When, or where, did any assembly or convention meet which proclaimed, or even suggested to these tribes, that the right of discovery contained a superior efficacy over all prior titles?

And our recognition was not confined to the soil merely. We regarded them as nations—far behind us indeed in civilization, but still we respected their forms of government—we conformed our conduct to their notions of civil policy. We were aware of the potency of any edict that sprang from the deliberations of the council fire; and when we desired lands, or peace, or alliances, to this source of power and energy, to this great lever of Indian government we addressed our proposals—to this alone did we look; and from this alone did we expect aid or relief.

I now proceed, very briefly, to trace our public history in these important connexions. As early as 1763, a proclamation was issued by the King of Great Britain to his American colonies and dependencies, which, in clear and decided terms, and in the spirit of honorable regard for Indian privileges, declared the opinions of the Crown and the duties of its subjects. The preamble to that part of this document which concerns Indian affairs, is couched in terms that cannot be misunderstood. I give a little extract: "And whereas it is just and reasonable and essential to our interest and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories, as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them or any of them as their hunting grounds," therefore, the Governors of colonies are prohibited, upon any pretence whatever, from granting any warrants of survey, or passing any patents for lands, "upon any lands whatever, which, not having been ceded or purchased, were reserved to the said Indians;" and, by another injunction in the same proclamation, "all persons whatever, who have either wilfully or inadvertently seated themselves upon any lands, which, not having been ceded to, or purchased by the crown, were reserved to the Indians as aforesaid, are strictly enjoined and required to remove themselves from such settlements."

This royal ordinance is an unqualified admission of every principle that is now urged in favor of the liberties and rights of these tribes. It refers to them as nations that had put themselves under the protection of the crown; and adverting to the fact that their lands had not been ceded or purchased, it freely and justly runs out the inevitable conclusion, that they are reserved to these nations as their property; and forbids all surveys and patents, and warns off all intruders and trespassers. Sir, this contains the epitome of Indian history and title. No king, colony, State, or territory, ever made, or attempted to make, a grant or title to the Indians, but universally and perpetually derived their titles from them. This one fact, that stands forth broadly on the page of Indian history, which neither kings nor colonies—neither lords, proprietors, nor diplomatic agents, have, on any single occasion, disputed, is alone sufficient to demolish the whole system of political pretensions, conjured up in modern times, to drive the poor Indian from the last refuge of his hopes.

The next important era in the order of time relates to the dispute of the colonies with Great Britain. The attention of the Congress on the eve of that conflict was called to the situation of these tribes, and their dispositions on that interesting subject. Then, sir, we approached them as independent nations, with the acknowledged power to form alliances with or against us. For, in June, 1775, our Congress resolved, "That the Committee for Indian Affairs do prepare proper talks to the several tribes of Indians, for engaging the continuance of their friendship to us, and neutrality in our present unhappy dispute with Great Britain." Again, on the 12th July, 1775, a report of the committee was agreed to, with the following clause at its head: "That the securing and preserving the friendship of the Indian nations, appears to be a subject of the utmost moment to these colonies." And, sir, the journals of that eventful period of our history are full of resolutions, all of which indicate the same opinions of those illustrious statesmen, respecting the unquestioned sovereignty of the Indians. I forbear further details. After the Revolution, and in the eighth year of our independence, in the month of September, A. D. 1783, the Congress again took up the subject of Indian affairs, and resolved to hold a convention with the Indians residing in the Middle and Northern States, who had taken up arms against us, for the purposes of receiving them into the favor and protection of the United States, and of establishing boundary lines of property, for separating and dividing the settlements of the citizens, from the Indian villages and hunting grounds, and thereby extinguishing, as far as possible, all occasion for future animosities, disquiet, and contention." If, at any point of our existence as a people, a disposition to encroach upon the Indians, and to break down their separate and sovereign character, could have been looked for, or at all excused, this was the time; when we had just come out of a long, severe, and bloody conflict, often prosecuted by our foes with unnatural barbarity, and to aggravate which, these very tribes had devoted their savage and ferocious customs. And yet, sir, what do we find? Instead of the claims of conquest, the rights of war, now so convenient to set up, the American Congress, greatly just, accord to these very Indians the character of foreign nations, and invite them to take shelter under our favor and protection; not only this, but adopt measures to ascertain and establish boundary lines of property between our citizens and their villages and hunting grounds.

Under the confederation of the old Thirteen States, and shortly before the adoption of the Constitution, on the 20th of November, 1785, a treaty was made with the Cherokee nation, at Hopewell. This treaty according to its title, was concluded between "Commissioners Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, of the one part, and the Headmen and Warriors of all the Cherokees, of the other." It gives "peace to all the Cherokees," and receives them into the favor and protection of the United States. And, by the first article, the Cherokees agree to restore all the prisoners, citizens of the United States, or subjects of their allies, to their entire liberty. Here, again, we discover the same magnanimous policy of renouncing any pretended rights of a conqueror in our negotiations with the allies of our enemy. We invite them to peace; we engage to become their protectors, and in the stipulation for the liberation of prisoners, we trace again the broad line of distinction between citizens of the United States and the Cherokee people.

Who, after this, sir, can retain a single doubt as to the unquestioned political sovereignty of these tribes? It is very true, that they were not absolutely independent. As they had become comparatively feeble, and as they were, in the mass, an uncivilized race, they chose to depend upon us for protection; but this did not destroy or affect their sovereignty. The rule of public law is clearly stated by Vattel—"one community may be bound to another by a very unequal alliance, and still be a sovereign State." Though a weak State, in order to provide for its safety, should place itself under the protection of a more powerful one, yet, if it reserves to itself the right of governing its own body, it ought to be considered as an independent State." If the right of self-government is retained, the State preserves its political existence; and, permit me to ask, when did the Southern Indians relinquish this right? Sir, they have always exercised it, and were never disturbed in the enjoyment of it, until the late legislation of Georgia and the States of Alabama and Mississippi.

The treaty next proceeds to establish territorial domains, and to forbid all intrusions upon the Cherokee country, by any of our citizens, on the pains of outlawry. It provides, that, if any citizen of the United States shall remain on the lands of the Indians for six months "after the ratification of the treaty, such person shall forfeit the protection of the United States, and the Indians may punish him, or not, as they please." What stronger attribute of sovereignty could have been conceded to this tribe, than to have accorded to them the power of punishing our citizens according to their own laws and modes; and, sir, what more satisfactory proof can be furnished to the Senate, of the sincere and inflexible purpose of our Government to maintain the rights of the Indian nations, than the annexation of such sanctions as the forfeiture of national protection, and the infliction of any punishment within the range of savage discretion? It is to be recollected, that this treaty was made at a time when all admit the Cherokees to have been, with very rare exceptions, in the rudest state of Pagan darkness.

It is really a subject of wonder, [said Mr. F.] that after these repeated and solemn recognitions of right of soil, territory, and jurisdiction, in these aboriginal nations, it should be gravely asserted that they are mere occupants at our will; and, what is absolutely marvellous, that they are a part of the Georgia population—a district of her territory, and amenable to her laws, whenever she chooses to extend them.

After the treaty of Hopewell was concluded and ratified, and in the year 1787, the States of North Carolina and Georgia transmitted their protests to Congress, in which they complained of the course of transactions adopted with respect to the Indians, and asserted a right in the States to treat with these tribes, and to obtain grants of their lands. The Congress referred the whole matter to a committee of five, who made an elaborate report that disclosed the principles upon which the intercourse of the confederacy with these people was founded. It is material to a correct understanding of this branch of the subject, that we should advert to a limitation, subsisting at that time, upon the powers of the old Congress. The limitation is contained in the following clause of the articles of confederation: "Congress shall have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians not members of any other States; provided that the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated."

Upon this clause and its proviso, the committee proceed to report: "In framing this clause, the parties to the federal compact must have had some definite objects in view; the objects that come into view principally in forming treaties, or managing affairs with the Indians, had been long understood, and pretty well ascertained in this country. The committee conceive that it has been long the opinion of the country, supported by justice and humanity, that the Indians have just claims to all lands occupied by, and not fairly purchased from them." "The laws of the State can have no effect upon a tribe of Indians or their lands within a State, so long as that tribe is independent and not a member of the State. It cannot be supposed that the State has the powers mentioned," (those of making war and peace, purchasing lands from them and fixing boundaries,) "without absurdity in theory and practice. For the Indian tribes are justly considered the common friends or enemies of the United States, and no particular State can have an exclusive interest in the management of affairs with any of the tribes, except in uncommon cases." The Senate perceive the estimate that was formed of these State pretensions. The Committee argue, with conclusive energy, that, to yield such powers to particular States, would not only be absurd in theory, but would in fact destroy the whole system of Indian relations—that this divided, alternate, cognizance of the matter, by the States and by the Congress, could never be enforced, and would result in discordant and fruitless regulations. The grounds assumed in this able report are unanswerable. The Committee regarded the subject as national, concerning the whole United States, of whom the Indians were the common friends or foes.

That such a concern was too general and public in all its bearings, to be subjected to the legislation and management of any particular State. The Congress therefore, assume the entire jurisdiction and control of it. And after this report, we hear no more of State protests. They yielded their claims to a much safer depository of this interesting trust. Sir, I take leave to say, that the sound, sensible principles of this report have lost nothing of their authority by time, and that every year of our history has confirmed their wisdom, and illustrated the justice and humanity of the Congress of '87.

The Convention that formed and adopted the Constitution, in their deliberations upon the security of Indian rights, wisely determined to place our relations with the tribes under the absolute superintendence of the General Government, which they were about to establish. The proviso under the old compact, that had, in ambiguous terms, reserved to particular States an undefined management of Indian affairs, was altogether discarded, and the simple, unqualified control of this important branch of public policy, was delegated to Congress in the following clause of the Constitution: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." An incidental argument, in favor of my views, cannot fail to strike the mind on the face of this clause. The plea that is now, for the first time, urged against the Indians, rests upon the allegation, that the tribes are not distinct nations—that they compose a portion of the people of the States; and yet, in the great national charter, this work of as much collected wisdom, virtue, and patriotism, as ever adorned the annals, or shed light upon the government of any age or country, the Indian tribes are associated with foreign nations and the several States, as one of the three distinct departments of the human family, with which the General Government was to regulate commerce. Strange company, truly, in which to find those it now seems convenient to denominate a few poor miserable savages, that were always the peculiar subjects of State sovereignty, mere tenants at will of the soil, and with whom it is "idle" to speak of negotiating treaties.

There was another subject, closely connected with this, that engaged the anxious deliberations of the great statesmen who composed the memorable convention—and this was the treaty power. To found this well, was a concern worthy of their first and best thoughts. The good faith of a nation was not to be pledged but on grave and great occasions; for, when plighted, it brought the nation itself into obligations, too sacred to be argued away by the suggestions of policy or convenience, profit or loss. They, therefore, subjected the exercise of this high function to two great departments of the Government—the President and Senate of the United States. They required formalities to attend the exercise of the power that were intended and calculated to guard the trust from rash and inconsiderate administration. But these requisites complied with, and a treaty made and concluded, no retreat from its claims was provided or desired by the convention. No, sir. To shut up every avenue of escape—to compel us to be faithful—"treaties" are declared, by the charter of our Government, "to be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." How could the inviolate character of a treaty be more effectually preserved? Let convulsions agitate the commonwealth—let the strifes of party shake the pillars of the political edifice—around the nation's faith barriers are raised, that may smile at the storm. And, sir, if these guards fail, if these defences can be assailed and broken down, then may we indeed despair. Truth and honor have no citadel on earth—their sanctions are despised and forgotten, and the law of the strongest prevails.

I fear that I shall oppress the patience of the Senate by these tedious details; but the subject is deeply interesting, and each successive year of our political history brings me fresh and strong proofs of the sacred estimation always accorded to Indian rights. Sir, in the very next year that followed the formation of the constitution, on the 1st day of September, 1788, the encroachment of the whites upon the Indian territory, as guarantied to them by the treaty of Hopewell, made with the Cherokees, as we have already stated, in 1785, caused a proclamation to be issued by Congress, of the date first mentioned, affirming in all things the treaty of Hopewell, and distinctly announcing (I give the literal clause) "the firm determination of Congress to protect the said Cherokees in their rights, according to the true intent and meaning of the said treaty." And they further resolve, "that the Secretary of War be directed to have a sufficient number of the troops in the service of the United States in readiness, to march from the Ohio to the protection of the Cherokees, whenever Congress shall direct the same."

The next important event, in connexion with the Cherokees, is the treaty of Holston, made with them on the 2d July, 1791. This was the first treaty negotiated with the Cherokees after the constitution. And it is only necessary to consider the import of its preamble, to become satisfied of the constancy of our policy, in adhering to the first principles of our Indian negotiations. Sir, let it be remembered that this was a crisis when the true spirit of the constitution would be best understood; most of those who framed it came into the councils of the country in 1788. Let it be well pondered, that this treaty of Holston was the public compact in which General Washington, as a preparative solemnity, asked the advice of the Senate, and concerning which, he inquired of that venerable body whether, in the treaty to be made, the United States should solemnly guaranty the new boundary, to be ascertained and fixed between them and the Cherokees.

The Indians.

[SENATE.]

The preamble to this treaty I will now recite:

"The parties being desirous of establishing permanent peace and friendship between the United States and the said Cherokee nation, and the citizens and members thereof, and to remove the causes of war, by ascertaining their limits, and making other necessary, just, and friendly arrangements: the President of the United States, by William Blount, Governor of the territory of the United States of America, South of the river Ohio, and superintendent of Indian affairs for the Southern District, who is vested with full powers for these purposes, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States; and the Cherokee nation, by the undersigned chiefs and warriors, representing the said nation, have agreed to the following articles," &c.

The first article stipulates that there shall be "perpetual peace and friendship" between the parties; a subsequent article provides, that the boundary between the United States and Cherokees "shall be ascertained and marked plainly, by three persons appointed by the United States, and three Cherokees on the part of their nation."

In pursuance of the advice of the Senate, by the seventh article of this treaty, "The United States solemnly guaranty to the Cherokee nation all their lands not hereby ceded."

And after several material clauses, the concluding article suspends the effect and obligation of the treaty upon its ratification "by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States."

Now, sir, it is a most striking part of this history, that every possible incident, of form, deliberation, advisement, and power, attended this compact. The Senate was consulted when our plenipotentiary was commissioned; full powers were then given to our commissioner; the articles were agreed upon; the treaty referred to the Executive and Senate for their ratification, and, with all its provisions, by them solemnly confirmed.

It requires a fullness of self-respect and self-confidence, the lot of a rare few, after time has added its sanctions to this high pledge of national honor, to attempt to convict the illustrious men of that Senate of gross ignorance of constitutional power; to charge against them that they strangely mistook the charter under which they acted; and violated almost the proprieties of language, as some gentlemen contend, by dignifying with the name and formalities of a treaty "mere bargains to get Indian lands." Sir, who so well understood the nature and extent of the powers granted in the constitution, as the statesmen who aided by their personal counsels to establish it?

Every administration of this Government, from President Washington's, have, with like solemnities and stipulations, held treaties with the Cherokees; treaties, too, by almost all of which we obtained further acquisitions of their territory. Yes, sir, whenever we approached them in the language of friendship and kindness, we touched the chord that won their confidence; and now, when they have nothing left with which to satisfy our cravings, we propose to annul every treaty—to gainsay our word—and, by violence and perfidy, drive the Indian from his home. In a subsequent treaty between the United States and the Cherokee nation, concluded on the 8th July, 1817, express reference is made to past negotiations between the parties, on the subject of removal to the west of the Mississippi; the same question that now agitates the country, and engages our deliberations. And this convention is deserving of particular notice, inasmuch as we shall learn from it, not only what sentiments were then entertained by our Government towards the Cherokees, but, also, in what light the different dispositions of the Indians to emigrate to the West, and to remain on their adjacent patrimony, were considered. This treaty recites that application had been made to the United States, at a previous period, by a deputation of the Cherokees, (on the 9th January, 1809) by which they apprized the Government of the wish of a part of their nation to remove west of the Mississippi, and of the residue to abide in their old habitations. That the President of the United States, after maturely considering the subject, answered the petitions as follows: "The United States, my children, are the friends of both parties, and, as far as can be reasonably asked, they are willing to satisfy the wishes of both. Those who remain may be assured of our patronage, our aid, and our good neighborhood." "To those who remove, every aid shall be administered, and when established at their new settlements, we shall consider them as our children, and always hold them firmly by the hand." The convention then establishes new boundaries and pledges our faith to respect and defend the Indian territories. Some matters, by universal consent, are taken as granted, without any explicit recognition. Under the influence of this rule of common fairness, how can we ever dispute the sovereign right of the Cherokees to remain east of the Mississippi, when it was in relation to that very location that we promised our patronage, aid, and good neighborhood? Sir, is this high-handed encroachment of Georgia to be the commentary upon the national pledge here given, and the obvious import of these terms? How were these people to remain, if not as they then existed, and as we then acknowledged them to be, a distinct and separate community, governed by their own peculiar laws and customs? We can never deny these principles, while fair dealing retains any hold of our conduct. Further, sir, it appears from this treaty, that the Indians who preferred to remain east of the river, expressed "to the President an anxious desire to engage in the pursuits of agriculture and civilized life in the country they then occupied," and we engaged to encourage those laudable purposes. Indeed, such pursuits had been recommended to the tribes, and patronized by the United States, for many years before this convention. Mr. Jefferson, in his message to Congress as early as 1805, and when on the subject of our Indian relations, with his usual enlarged views of public policy, observes: "The aboriginal inhabitants of these countries, I have regarded with the commiseration their history inspires. Endowed with the faculties and the rights of men, breathing an ardent love of liberty and independence, and occupying a country which left them no desire but to be undisturbed, the stream of overflowing population from other regions directed itself on these shores. Without power to divert, or habits to contend against it, they have been overwhelmed by the current, or driven before it. Now, reduced within limits too narrow for the hunter state, humanity enjoins us to teach them agriculture and the domestic arts; to encourage them to that industry which alone can enable them to maintain their place in existence; and to prepare them in time for that society which, to bodily comforts, adds the improvement of the mind and morals. We have, therefore, liberally furnished them with the implements of husbandry and household use; we have placed among them instructors in the arts of first necessity; and they are covered with theegis of the law against aggressors from among ourselves." These, sir, are sentiments worthy of an illustrious statesman. None can fail to perceive the spirit of justice and humanity which Mr. Jefferson cherished towards our Indian allies. He was, through his whole life, the firm unshrinking advocate of their rights, a patron of all their plans for moral improvement and elevation.

It will not be necessary [said Mr. F.] to pursue the details of our treaty negotiations further. I beg leave to state, before I leave them, however, that with all the southwestern tribes of Indians we have similar treaties, not only the Cherokees, but the Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, in the neighborhood of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, hold our faith, repeatedly pledged to them, that we would respect their boundaries, repel aggressions, and protect and nourish them as our neighbors and friends; and to all these public and sacred compacts Georgia was a constant party. They were required, by an article never omitted, to be submitted to the Senate of the United States for their advice and consent. They were so submitted; and Georgia, by her able Representatives in the Senate, united in the ratification of these same treaties, without, in any single instance, raising an exception, or interposing a constitutional difficulty or scruple.

Other branches of our political history shed abundant light upon this momentous question. When the Congress of the United States directed their cares to the future settlement and government of the vast and noble domains to the northwest of the river Ohio, ceded by the State of Virginia, among other matters which they deemed to be vitally connected with the welfare of that region, was the condition and preservation of the Indian nations. The third article of their celebrated ordinance, for the government of the Northwestern Territory, is in the following words: "Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged. The utmost good faith shall always be observed towards the Indians; their lands and property shall never be taken from them without their consent; and, in their property, rights, and liberty, they never shall be invaded or disturbed, unless in just and lawful wars, authorized by Congress; but laws founded in justice and humanity shall, from time to time, be made, for preventing wrongs being done to them, and for preserving peace and friendship with them." Sir, the more minutely we look into the proceedings of the Congress of 1787, the more deeply shall we venerate the wisdom and virtue, the largeness of views, and the political forecast, that blessed and illustrated the councils of our country. This solitary article would forever stand out, and alone sustain their reputation. We shall presently learn what concern was manifested by the State of Georgia, to spread the whole influence and control of this article over the cession which she made to the Union, of the territory now composing the States of Alabama and Mississippi.

How can Georgia, after all this, desire or attempt, and how can we quietly permit her, "to invade and disturb the property, rights, and liberty of the Indians?" And this, not only not "in just and lawful wars authorized by Congress," but in the time of profound peace, while the Cherokee lives in tranquil prosperity by her side. I press on the inquiry—How can we tamely suffer these States to make laws, not only not "founded in justice and humanity," "for preventing wrongs being done to the Indians," but for the avowed purpose of inflicting the gross and wanton injustice of breaking up their Government—of abrogating their long cherished customs, and of annihilating their existence as a distinct people?

The Congress of the United States, in 1799, in an act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and again, by a similar act in 1802, still in force, distinctly recognized every material stipulation contained in the numerous treaties with the Indians. In fact, sir, these acts of legislation were passed expressly to effectuate our treaty stipulations.

These statutes refer to "the boundaries, as established by treaties, between the United States and the various Indian tribes;" they next direct such "lines to be clearly ascertained, and distinctly marked," prohibit any citizen of the United States from crossing these lines, to hunt or settle, and authorize the employment of the public and military force of the Government, to prevent intrusion, and to expel trespassers upon Indian lands. The twelfth section of this important law most wisely guards the great object of Indian title from all public and private imposition, by enacting "that no purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indian or nation, or tribe of Indians, within the bounds of the United States, shall be of any validity in law or equity, unless the same be made by treaty or convention, entered into pursuant to the constitution.

I trust, sir, that this brief exposition of our policy, in relation to Indian affairs, establishes, beyond all controversy, the obligation of the United States to protect these tribes in the exercise and enjoyment of their civil and political rights. Sir, the question has ceased to be—What are our duties? An inquiry much more embarrassing is forced upon us: How shall we most plausibly, and with the least possible violence, break our faith? Sir, we repel the inquiry—we reject such an issue—and point the guardians of public honor to the broad, plain faith of faithful performance, and to which they are equally urged by duty and by interest.

Here I might properly rest, as the United States are the only party that the Indians are bound to regard. But, if farther proofs be wanting to convince us of the unwarrantable pretensions of Georgia, in her late violent legislation, they are at hand, cogent, clear, and overwhelming. This State, sir, was not only a party to all these conventions with the General Government; she made as solemn treaties with the Creeks and Cherokees for herself, when a colony, and after she became a State. These form a part of her title, and are bound up with her public laws. On the 1st of June, 1773, she negotiated a treaty with these Indian nations, by the joint agency of the Governor of the colony and the superintendent of Indian affairs; in which boundaries are established and cessions of land agreed upon. Again, on the 31st May, 1783, after her independence as a State, another treaty was concluded between the Governor of Georgia and five of her most distinguished citizens duly appointed by the Legislature of the State of the one part, and the Chiefs, Headmen, and Warriors of the hordes or tribes of the Cherokee Indians, "in behalf of the said nation, on the other part." And in the first article of this convention, the distinct, independent existence of the Cherokees is acknowledged: for it provides, "that all differences between the said parties, heretofore subsisting, shall cease and be forgotten." Is it not utterly fallacious to contend, in the face of this treaty that the Cherokees are under the jurisdiction of a State, that finds it necessary to negotiate for peace with them by all the forms of a regular treaty? But more than this; by the last article of this treaty, the Cherokees agree to cede, grant, release, and quit claim to Georgia, all the lands up to a certain boundary line defined in the said document; and until since the extraordinary usurpation of this State, in extending her laws over this nation, these treaty lines were respected, and never disputed.

In the year 1777, the States of Georgia and South Carolina met the Creek and Cherokee nations at Dewitt's corner, for the avowed purpose of making a treaty of peace with them. Sir, if the greatest potentate of Europe had been a party, the preliminaries could not have been more formal or solemn. First, are produced what are denominated "the Georgia full powers" delegated to her commissioners, to meet "the Indian Congress" to be held at Dewitt's corner—next appear “the South Carolina full powers,” for the like purpose—and lastly, the Creek and Cherokee “full powers.” These powers are opened and exchanged at this Congress, and a treaty is agreed upon by the plenipotentiaries, establishing peace, and the future boundaries between their respective territories.

In many of the treaties made by the United States with the Cherokees and Creeks, large sections of land were relinquished to us, which, by our compact with the State of Georgia, we received for her use. She never questioned, at those times, our right to treat for those lands, nor the Indian's right of granting them; but gladly availed herself of such rich accessions to her domains, and proceeded very promptly to distribute them amongst her citizens. Now, it is a fundamental maxim in all codes of law which acknowledge the obligations of equity and good conscience, that if a party is silent when these old fashioned rules of upright dealing require him to speak, he shall forever thereafter hold his peace. The application of this sound and wholesome rule will instantly strike the moral apprehensions of every member of the Senate.

I am indebted to the State of Georgia for a clear and very satisfactory exposition of the nature of Indian treaties, and the obligations that arise from them. It is an authority for positions, which I have had the honor to maintain, of the greater weight, as it proceeds from the highest functionary of her Government. In February, 1825, the Creeks, by a treaty made with the United States, ceded all their lands to us within the geographical limits of Georgia, for the use of that State. By an article in the treaty, it was provided that the United States should protect the Indians against the encroachments, hostilities, and impositions of the whites, &c. &c. until the removal of the Indians should have been accomplished according to the terms of the treaty. The Governor of Georgia, on the 22d day of March, of the same year, issued his proclamations as “Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy of the said State, and of the militia thereof,” in which, after stating the conclusion of the treaty already mentioned, and the article in it for the protection of the Creeks, the Governor proceeds: “I have, therefore, thought proper to issue this, my proclamation, warning all persons, citizens of Georgia, or others, against trespassing or intruding upon lands occupied by the Indians within the limits of this State, either for the purpose of settlement or otherwise, as every such act will be in direct violation of the provisions of the treaty aforesaid, and will expose the aggressors to the most certain and summary punishment by the authorities of the State, and of the United States. All good citizens, therefore, pursuing the dictates of good faith, will unite in enforcing the obligations of the treaty as the supreme law,” &c.

The Senate will perceive that this Executive injunction founds its requirements, explicitly, upon the faith and authority of the treaty, as the supreme law; and this a treaty made with Indians. Yes, sir, a treaty with a part of the very Indians now asserted by Georgia to be below the reach of treaties—poor objects! with whom it is declared to be ridiculous and idle to speak of treating!

Sir, she cannot recall her proclamation. Give these sacred doctrines their full operation here; let their influence prevail in the eventful issue now opened for our decision; and the Indians, who are involved in it, will be satisfied. They have approached us with no other plea; they urge no other or higher considerations. They point us to the faith of treaties, and implore us by the constitutional obligation of these national compacts, to raise around our ancient allies the effective defences which we have so often promised to maintain. Carry out these rules of public duty, and the Cherokee delegation, who have been waiting at your doors with anxious interest, will return to their home relieved from the burthen that now sinks their spirits, and with the grateful conviction that the successors of Washington are still true to his memory.

What could have wrought [said Mr. F.] this entire revolution in opinions, and in three short years? Our relations with the Indians have not changed. Condition and circumstance, claim and obligation, remain precisely the same. And yet, now we hear that these Indians have been for all the time, since Georgia had existence, a component part of her population; within the full scope of her jurisdiction and sovereignty, and subject to the control of her law!

The people of this country will never acquiesce in such violent constructions. They will read for themselves; and when they shall learn the history of all our intercourse with these nations; when they shall perceive the guaranties so often renewed to them, and under what solemn sanctions, the American community will not seek the aids of artificial speculations on the requisite formalities to a technical treaty. No, sir. I repeat it: They will judge for themselves, and proclaim, in language that the remotest limit of this republic will understand—“call these sacred pledges of a nation's faith by what name you please, our word has been given, and we should live and die by our word.”

If the State of Georgia is concluded, and morally bound to stay her hand from invading the lands or the government of the Indians, the States of Mississippi and Alabama are equally and more strongly obliged. They came into the Union after most of the treaties had been made. The former in 1816, and the latter in 1819. These obligations were liens upon the confederacy, and they must take the benefits with the burthens of the Union. They cannot complain of concealment or surprise. These conventions were all public and notorious; and the Indians under their daily view, in actual separate possession, exercising the rights of sovereignty and property.

Moreover, we have heard much of constitutional powers and disabilities in this debate. Sir, I proceed to demonstrate that both Mississippi and Alabama are, by a fundamental inhibition in the constitution of their Government, prevented from extending their laws over the Indians. When Georgia, in 1802, granted to the United States the territory that composes the greater part of these two States, she made it an express condition of the cession, that the States to be formed of it should conform to all the articles of “the ordinance for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio,” excepting one single article prohibiting involuntary servitude. When these States applied to the General Government to be formed into territories, this eventful condition of the Georgia cession was remembered by all parties. Mississippi and Alabama, in the most deliberate manner, agreed to the condition, and assumed the articles of the ordinance as an integral part of their political condition. When they afterwards proposed to us to be received into the Federal Union, acts of Congress were duly passed, authorizing them respectively to form a constitution and State Government for the people within their territories, with this proviso—“That the same, when formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the principles of the ordinance of the 13th July, A. D. 1787,” for the territory northwest of the Ohio, and they were afterwards, upon duly certifying to Congress that they had conformed to those principles and engrafted them into their constitution, admitted into the republic. The third article of this ordinance I have already read and considered, and will only add, that human wisdom and skill could not have devised a more effectual safeguard to the Indian tribes, than are now incorporated into the laws and constitutions of the States of Mississippi and Alabama. It would have been well in these States to have reviewed their own origin, to have examined the sources of their power, before they, rashly and in disregard of principles that are essential to their political existence, usurped dominion over a community of men as perfectly independent of them as they are of Mexico. And shall we, sir, quietly submit to the breach of conditions that we tendered as the indispensable terms of their admission, that were fairly propounded, and freely and fully accepted? Why, sir, it appears to me that the fulfilment of solemn contracts, the good faith of the public treaties, the fundamental provisions of State constitutions, are to be regarded as matters of very trifling obligation, when they are all to be broken through to reach a feeble and unoffending ally. With a man of truth and honesty, such high considerations as address us would supersede the occasion for argument; and how can we evade them without deep dishonor!

I have complained of the legislation of Georgia. I will now refer the Senate to the law of that State, passed on the 19th December, 1829, that the complaint may be justified. The title of the law would suffice for such purpose without looking further into its sections. After stating its object of adding the territory in the occupancy of the Cherokee nation of Indians to the adjacent counties of Georgia, another distinct office of this oppressive edict of arbitrary power is avowed to be, "to annul all laws and ordinances made by the Cherokee nation of Indians." And, sir, the act does annul them effectually. For the seventh section enacts, "that after the first day of June next, all laws, ordinances, orders, and regulations of any kind whatever, made, passed, or enacted by the Cherokee Indians, either in general council, or in any other way whatever, or by any authority whatever, of said tribe, be, and the same are hereby declared to be, null and void and of no effect, as if the same had never existed." Sir, here we find a whole people outlawed—laws, customs, rules, government, all, by one short clause, abrogated and declared to be void as if they never had been. History furnishes no example of such high handed usurpation—the dismemberment and partition of Poland was a deed of humane legislation compared with this. The succeeding clauses are no less offensive; they provide that "if any person shall prevent by threats, menaces, or other means, or endeavor to prevent any Indian of said nation from emigrating, or enrolling as an emigrant, he shall be liable to indictment and confinement in the common gaol, or at hard labor in the penitentiary, not exceeding four years, at the discretion of the Court; and if any person shall deter, or offer to deter, any Indian, head man, chief, or warrior of said nation, from selling or ceding to the United States, for the use of Georgia, the whole or any part of said territory, or prevent, or offer to prevent, any such persons from meeting in council or treaty any commissioner or commissioners on the part of the United States, for any purpose whatever, he shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and liable, on conviction, to confinement at hard labor in the penitentiary, for not less than four, nor longer than six years, at the discretion of the Court." It is a crime in Georgia for a man to prevent the sale of his country, a crime to warn a chief or head man that the agents of the United States are instructed "to move upon him in the line of his prejudices," that they are coming to bribe him to meet in treaty with the commissioner. By the way, sir, it seems these treaties are very lawful, when made for the use of Georgia.

It is not surprising that our agents advertised the War Department, that if the General Government refused to interfere, and the Indians were left to the law of the States, they would soon exchange their lands and remove. To compel, by harsh and cruel penalties, such exchange, is the broad purpose of this act of Georgia, and nothing is wanting to fill up the picture of this disgraceful system, but to permit the bill before us to pass without amendment or proviso. Then it will all seem fair on our statute books. It legislates for none but those who may choose to remove, while we know that grinding, heart-breaking exactions are set in operation elsewhere, to drive them to such a choice. By the modification I have submitted, I beg for the Indian the poor privilege of the exercise of his own will. But the law of Georgia is not yet satisfied. The last section declares, "that no Indian, or descendant of any Indian, residing within the Creek or Cherokee nations of Indians, shall be deemed a competent witness in any Court of this State, to which a white person may be a party, except such white person resides within the said nation." It did not suffice to rob these people of the last vestige of their own political rights and liberties; the work was not complete until they were shut out of the protection of Georgia laws. For, sir, after the first day of June next, a gang of lawless white men may break into the Cherokee country, plunder their habitations, murder the mother with the children, and all in the sight of the wretched husband and father, and no law of Georgia will reach the atrocity. It is vain to tell us, sir, that murder may be traced by circumstantial probabilities. The charge against this State is, you have, by force and violence, stripped these people of the protection of their government, and now refuse to cast over them the shield of your own. The outrage of the deed is, that you leave the poor Indian helpless and defenceless, and in this cruel way hope to banish him from his home. Sir, if this law be enforced, I do religiously believe that it will awaken tones of feeling that will go up to God, and call down the thunders of his wrath.

The end, however, is to justify the means. "The removal of the Indian tribes to the west of the Mississippi is demanded by the dictates of humanity." This is a word of conciliating import. But it often makes its way to the heart under very doubtful titles, and its present claims deserve to be rigidly questioned. Who urges this plea? They who covet the Indian lands—who wish to rid themselves of a neighbor that they despise, and whose State pride is enlisted in rounding off their territories. But another matter is worthy of a serious thought. Is there such a clause in our covenants with the Indian, that when we shall deem it best for him, on the whole, we may break our engagements and leave him to his persecutors? Notwithstanding our adversaries are not entitled to the use of such humane suggestions, yet we do not shrink from an investigation of this pretence. It will be found as void of support in fact as the other assumptions are of principle.

It is alleged that the Indians cannot flourish in the neighborhood of a white population, that whole tribes have disappeared under the influence of this proximity. As an abstract proposition, it implies reproach somewhere. Our virtues certainly have not such deadly and depopulating power. It must, then, be our vices that possess these destructive energies—and shall we commit injustice, and put in, as our plea for it, that our intercourse with the Indians has been so demoralizing that we must drive them from it to save them? True, sir, many tribes have melted away; they have sunk lower and lower; and what people could rise from a condition to which policy, selfishness, and cupidity conspired to depress them.

Sir, had we devoted the same care to elevate their moral condition that we have to degrade them, the removal of the Indian would not now seek for an apology in the suggestions of humanity. But I waive this, and, as to the matter of fact, how stands the account? Wherever a fair experiment has been made, the Indians have readily yielded to the influence of moral cultivation. Yes, sir, they flourish under this culture, and rise in the scale of being. They have shown themselves to be highly susceptible of improvement, and the ferocious feelings and habits of the savage are soothed and reformed by the mild charities of religion. They can very soon be taught to understand and appreciate the blessings of civilization and regular government. And I have the opinions of some of our most enlightened statesmen to sustain me. Mr. Jefferson, nearly thirty years ago, congratulates his fellow citizens upon the hopeful indications furnished by the laudable efforts of the Government to meliorate the condition of those he was pleased to denominate "our Indian neighbors." In his message to Congress, on the 8th of December, 1801, he states, "among our Indian neighbors, also, a spirit of peace and friendship generally prevails; and I am happy to inform you that the continued efforts to introduce among them the implements and practice of husbandry, and of the household arts, have not been without success. That they are becoming more and more sensible of the superiority of this dependence for clothing and subsistence over the precarious resources of hunting and fishing? And already are we able to announce that, instead of that constant diminution of numbers produced by their wars and their wants, some of them begin to experience an increase of population." Upon the authority of this great statesman, I can direct our Government to a much more effective, as well as more just and honorable remedy for the evils that afflict these tribes, than their proposed removal into the wild uncultivated regions of the Western forests. In a message to Congress, on the 17th October, 1803, Mr. Jefferson remarks, "with many of the other Indian tribes, improvements in agriculture and household manufactures are advancing, and with all our peace and friendship are established on grounds much firmer than heretofore." In his message of the 2d December, 1806, there is a paragraph devoted to this subject deserving of our most respectful consideration. The friends of Indian rights could not desire the aid of better sentiments than Mr. Jefferson inculcated in that part of the message where he says, "We continue to receive proofs of the growing attachment of our Indian neighbors, and of their disposition to place all their interests under the patronage of the United States. These dispositions are inspired by their confidence in our justice; and in the sincere concern we feel for their welfare. And as long as we discharge these high and honorable functions with the integrity and good faith which alone can entitle us to their continuance, we may expect to reap the just reward in their peace and friendship." Again, in November, in 1808, he informs the Congress that "with our Indian neighbors the public peace has been steadily maintained; and generally from a conviction that we consider them as a part of ourselves, and cherish with sincerity their rights and interests, the attachment of the Indian tribes is gaining strength daily, is extending from the nearer to the more remote, and will amply requite us for the justice and friendship practised towards them. Husbandry and household manufactures are advancing among them, more rapidly with the Southern than Northern tribes, from circumstances of soil and climate."

The Indians.

Mr. Madison, in his message of November, 1809, likewise bears his public testimony to the gradual improvement of the Indians. "With our Indian neighbors," he remarks, "the just and benevolent system continued towards them, has also preserved peace, and is more and more advancing habits favorable to their civilization and happiness." I will detain the Senate with but one more testimonial, from another venerable Chief Magistrate. Mr. Monroe, as lately as 1824, in his message, with great satisfaction, informs the Congress that the Indians were "making steady advances in civilization and the improvement of their condition." "Many of the tribes," he continues, "have already made great progress in the arts of civilized life. This desirable result has been brought about by the humane and persevering policy of the Government, and particularly by means of the appropriation for the civilization of the Indians. There have been established, under the provisions of this act, thirty-two schools, containing nine hundred and sixteen scholars, who are well instructed in several branches of literature, and likewise in agriculture and the ordinary arts of life." Now, sir, when we consider the large space which these illustrious men have filled in our councils, and the perfect confidence that is due to their official statements, is it not astonishing to hear it gravely maintained, that the Indians are retrograding in their condition and character; that all our public anxieties and cares bestowed upon them have been utterly fruitless, and that for very pity's sake we must get rid of them, or they will perish on our hands? Sir, I believe that the confidence of the Senate has been abused by some of the letter writers, who give us such sad accounts of Indian wretchedness. I rejoice that we may safely repose upon the statements contained in the letter of Messrs. J. L. Allen, R. M. Livingston, Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, and the Rev. Samuel A. Worcester. The character of these witnesses is without reproach, and their satisfactory certificates of the improvement of the tribes, continue and confirm the history furnished to us in the several messages from which I have just read extracts.

It is further maintained, "that one of the greatest evils to which the Indians are exposed is, that incessant pressure of population, that forces them from seat to seat, without allowing time for moral and intellectual improvement." Sir, this is the very reason—the deep, cogent, reason, which I present to the Senate, now to raise the barrier against the pressure of population, and with all the authority of this nation, command the urging tide "thus far and no farther." Let us save them now, or we never shall. For, is it not clear as the sunbeam, sir, that a removal will aggravate their woes? If the tide is nearly irresistible at this time, when a few more years shall fill the regions beyond the Arkansas with many more millions of enterprising white men, will not an increased impulse be given, that shall sweep the red men away into the barren prairies, or the Pacific of the West? Such, I fear, will be their doom.

If these constant removals are so afflictive, and allow no time for moral improvement; if this be the cause why the attempts at Indian reformation are alleged to have been so unavailing; do not the dictates of experience, then, plead most powerfully with us, to drive them no further; to grant them an abiding place, where these moral causes may have a fair and uninterrupted operation in moulding and refining the Indian character? And, sir, weigh a moment the considerations that address us on behalf of the Cherokees especially. Prompted and encouraged by our counsels, they have in good earnest resolved to become men, rational, educated, Christian men; and they have succeeded beyond our most sanguine hopes. They have established a regular constitution of civil government, republican in its principles. Wise and beneficent laws are enacted; the people acknowledge their authority, and feel their obligation. A printing press, conducted by one of the nation, circulates a weekly newspaper, printed partly in English and partly in the Cherokee language—schools flourish in many of their settlements—Christian temples, to the God of the Bible, are frequented by respectful, devout, and many sincere worshippers. God, as we believe, has many people among them, whom he regards as the "apple of his eye." They have become better neighbors to Georgia. She made no complaints during the lapse of fifty years, when the tribes were a horde of ruthless, licentious, and drunken savages; when no law controlled them; when the only judge was their will, and their avenger the tomahawk.

Then, Georgia could make treaties with them, and acknowledge them as nations; and in conventions trace boundary lines, and respect the land-marks of her neighbor: and now, when they begin to reap the fruits of all the paternal instructions, so repeatedly and earnestly delivered to them by the Presidents—when the Cherokee has learned to respect the rights of the white man, and sacredly to regard the obligations of truth and conscience—is this the time, sir, to break up this peaceful community, to put out their council fires, to annul their laws and customs, to crush the rising hopes of their youth, and to drive the desponding and discouraged Indian to despair? Let it be called a sickly humanity—every freeman in the land, that has one spark of the spirit of his fathers, will feel and denounce it to be an unparalleled stretch of cruel injustice. And, if the deed be done, sir, how it is regarded in Heaven will, sooner or later, be known on earth; for this is the judgment-place of public sins. And all these ties are to be broken asunder, for a State that was silent and acquiescent in the relations of the Indians to our present Government—that pretended to no right of direct interference whilst these tribes were really dangerous; when their ferocious incursions justly disturbed the tranquillity of the fire-side, and waked the “sleep of the cradle,” for a State that seeks it now against an unoffending neighbor, which implores her by all that is dear in the graves of her fathers; in the traditions of by-gone ages; that beseeches her by the ties of nature, of home, and country, to let her live unmolested, and die near the dust of her kindred!

Sir, our fears have been addressed in behalf of those States whose legislation we resist: and it is inquired with solicitude, would you urge us to arms with Georgia? No, sir. This tremendous alternative will not be necessary. Let the General Government come out, as it should, with decided and temperate firmness, and officially announce to Georgia, and the other States, that if the Indian tribes choose to remain, they will be protected against all interference and encroachment; and such is my confidence in the sense of justice in the respect for law, prevailing in the great body of this portion of our fellow-citizens, that I believe they would submit to the authority of the nation. I can expect no other issue. But if the General Government be urged to the crisis, never to be anticipated, of appealing to the last resort of her powers; and when reason, argument, and persuasion fail, to raise her strong arm to repress the violations of the supreme law of the land, I ask, is it not in her bond, sir? Is her guaranty a rope of sand? This effective weapon has often been employed to chastise the poor Indians, sometimes with dreadful vengeance, I fear; and shall not their protection avail to draw it from the scabbard? Permit me to refer the Senate to the views of Mr. Jefferson, directly connected with this delicate, yet sacred duty of protection. In 1791, when he was Secretary of State, there were some symptoms of collision on the Indian subject. This induced the letter from him to Gen. Knox, then our Secretary of War, a part of which I will read: “I am of opinion, that Government should firmly maintain this ground: that the Indians have a right to the occupation of their lands, independent of the States within whose chartered limits they happen to be; that, until they cede them by treaty, or other transaction equivalent to a treaty, no act of a State can give a right to such lands; that neither under the present constitution, nor the ancient confederation, had any State or person a right to treat with the Indians, without the consent of the General Government; that that consent has never been given by any treaty for the cession of the lands in question; that the Government is determined to exert all its energy for the patronage and protection of the rights of the Indians, and the preservation of peace between the United States and them; and that, if any settlements are made on land not ceded by them, without the previous consent of the United States, the Government will think itself bound, not only to declare to the Indians that such settlements are without the authority or protection of the United States, but to remove them also by public force.”

Mr. Jefferson seems to have been disturbed by no morbid sensibilities. He speaks out as became a determined statesman. We can trace in this document the same spirit which shed its influence on a more eventful paper—the declaration of our rights, and of our purpose to maintain and defend them. He looked right onward, into the broad path of public duty; and if, in his way, he met the terrors of State collision and conflict, he was in no degree intimidated. The faith of treaties was his guide; and he would not flinch in his purposes, nor surrender the Indians to State encroachments. Let such decided policy go forth in the majesty of our laws now, and, sir, Georgia will yield. She will never encounter the responsibilities or the horrors of a civil war. But if she should, no stains of blood will be on our skirts; on herself the guilt will abide forever.

Sir, [said Mr. F.] if we abandon these aboriginal proprietors of our soil, these early allies and adopted children of our forefathers, how shall we justify it to our country? to all the glory of the past, and the promise of the future? Her good name is worth all else besides that contributes to her greatness. And, as I regard this crisis in her history; the time has come when this unbought treasure shall be plucked from dishonor, or abandoned to reproach.

How shall we justify this trespass to ourselves? Sir, we may deride it, and laugh it to scorn now; but the occasion will meet every man, when he must look inward, and make honest inquisition there. Let us beware how, by oppressive encroachments upon the sacred privileges of our Indian neighbors, we minister to the agonies of future remorse.

I have, in my humble measure, attempted to discharge a public and most solemn duty towards an interesting portion of my fellow men. Should it prove to have been as fruitless as I know it to be below the weight of their claims, yet even then, sir, it will have its consolations. Defeat in such a cause is far above the triumphs of unrighteous power; and in the language of an eloquent writer—“I had rather receive the blessing of one poor Cherokee, as he casts his last look back upon his country, for having, though in vain, attempted to prevent his banishment, than to sleep beneath the marble of all the Cæsars.”

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1830.

CONFIRMATION OF CERTAIN LAND CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for confirming certain claims to lands in the district of Jackson Court House, in the State of Mississippi; and, after a brief explanation, Mr. ELLIS moved to amend the bill, by striking out “the minimum price,” and inserting “fifty cents per acre.”

Mr. FOOTE said, he thought it would hardly consist with the plighted faith of the Government to adopt the amendment. The United States had given their pledge that no land should be sold at a price less than that fixed by law; and as the minimum price was now fixed at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, these lands ought not to be given for a lower sum, unless the law was changed so as to operate equally on all purchasers.

Mr. ELLIS replied, that it was not his intention to embarrass the bill at this late period of the session, and he would therefore withdraw his amendment.

Mr. FORSYTH said, if he understood the subject rightly, the bill provided for confirming the claim of one individual to twelve hundred and fifty acres only, when that individual claimed one hundred thousand acres under a Spanish grant. If this person had a just title to the whole one hundred thousand acres, he ought to have it. He believed that the passage of the law would be either an injury to the individual, or to the United States; for if his title was not good for the whole amount claimed by him, it was defective as to the number of acres proposed to be confirmed to him.

Mr. ELLIS said the title of Lewis Baudray to one hundred thousand acres of land was unquestionable; and was derived from a Spanish grant made as far back as the year 1790. It was well known to the Senate, that Congress had invariably refused to sanction confirmations to large grants. There were the grants to Maison Rouge, Baron Bastrop, &c. which Congress refused to sanction, solely on the ground that they were for such large tracts. He had no doubt that, under the treaty, all the claimants were entitled to the lands they held under Spanish grants, because the treaty expressly stipulates that their rights shall be guaranteed to them. With respect to the proviso objected to by the gentleman from Georgia, he was in favor of it, inasmuch as it gave to Lewis Baudray a complete title to twelve hundred and fifty acres; and if he chose to accept that in lieu of the large grant he claimed under it, was his own consideration.

Mr. FORSYTH said there was something in the matter he did not distinctly understand, and the difficulty was increased by the report. In the list of claims was that of Lewis Baudray, confirmed to his wife Margaret Morales, in 1808, with testimony of inhabitation and cultivation, but there was no order for the survey to take place.

Mr. BARTON said that the usual course pursued to obtain grants of land under the Spanish authorities, had been first to obtain a warrant of survey, so that there might be no dispute of title; this was not always done, nor was it absolutely necessary. The settlement of a tract of land, and proof of inhabitation and cultivation for three years, was sufficient to perfect the title. This individual, if he had not complied with the letter of the law, had, at all events, made the settlement for the fact of inhabitation from 1808 to 1828, was distinctly proved. Thousands of such cases had occurred in Missouri, and indeed in all the country which was obtained under the Louisiana purchase, and Congress had passed laws to confirm such grants: for it frequently happened that no survey had been made; but the occupation and cultivation was deemed sufficient, and the United States Surveyor laid off the tracts. He was satisfied that, in this case there had been an original concession, as it was called, or warrant of survey which may have been lost; and it was also highly probable that the Spanish officers had exceeded their powers; but by limiting the confirmation to the number of acres provided for in the bill, justice would be done both to the United States and to the individual.

Mr. BIBB offered the following proviso, as an amendment: "But shall be in satisfaction and extinguishment of the claim or demands of said claimants, respectively, to any other or greater quantity of land, as against the United States; and all persons or person claiming, or to claim, under the United States."

Mr. ELLIS regretted that the Senator from Kentucky had offered this amendment. If he would reflect, he would see that it was in contravention of the treaty of France, by which Louisiana was acquired. The treaty provided that every person inhabiting the ceded territory, should be protected in the enjoyment of his life, religion, and property. These rights were considered as property, and consequently, the adoption of the amendment would be a violation of the rights secured by the treaty.

Mr. BIBB said it was important to enforce the principle, that those who did not present their claims, and support them by proper testimony, should forfeit them. Congress had appointed commissioners to examine into the validity of all Spanish grants, and those who did not present before them their testimony to establish their titles, could not now have very strong claims on the United States. It was not safe to the Government to leave such important subjects still undecided.

A few remarks from Messrs. BARTON, ADAMS, and KANE, in opposition, and Mr. BIBB, in support of the amendment, the question was taken, and it was rejected.

Mr. FOOT said, if he was not very much mistaken, this bill would introduce an entirely new principle in our land legislation. He hoped that the faith of treaties might be rigidly adhered to, and their provisions strictly enforced, in every instance. If he rightly understood the provisions of the bill, it not only secures the Spanish claimants in all their rights, but it even goes farther, it secures to them rights which they had never yet satisfactorily established. He was desirous of obtaining further information, before he could vote for the bill. He said that there was no case, within his recollection, in which the United States Government had passed laws to make up the deficiency of Spanish titles. It was, therefore, he believed, an entirely new principle in legislation; and he was not, with the present lights, prepared to support it.

The question was then taken, and the bill ordered to be engrossed and read a third time—ayes 21.

SURGEON GENERAL OF THE NAVY.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE, the bill creating the office of Surgeon General of the Navy was taken up.

Mr. HAYNE said that, previous to taking the question on the passage of this bill, he wished to avail himself of the advantages suggested by his friend from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL] when this bill was under discussion on a former day; and, in accordance to the views of that gentleman, introduced a clause for the regulation of the navy ration. He knew of no better mode of increasing the comforts, adding to the enjoyments, and promoting the health, of our seamen, than by the amendment he was about to introduce. It was, he said, very desirable that the crews of our public vessels should be supplied with as many of those articles of comfort, to which they have been accustomed, as the interests of the navy and the country would permit. The experience of England and France, to which he had alluded on a former day, afforded some light on this subject, and their naval regulations, with respect to the ration, were now before him. He did not design to follow either; but he wished to introduce an amendment which would enable the President to try, at such times and places as he might deem most suitable to the comforts of the sailor and the interests of the country, how far sugar, coffee, tea, cocoa, wine, and raisins, might be substituted for the beef, pork, and whiskey, with which our crews are at present supplied. In no instance, however, would the ration exceed twenty-five cents, as provided for by the present law. The British ration amounted to about twenty-two cents.

In introducing this amendment, his object was to make an experiment, and to see how far our efforts may tend to introduce a system of temperance in the navy—temperance, such as entire abstinence from spirituous liquors, being among the schemes of the day. He was not disposed to think that such a scheme would suit the navy at present. Indeed, he thought, if it were enforced, that it would be impossible to get crews. But a gradual change might be effected, both in the appetite, the manners, and morals, of our sailors, by judicious regulations; and, if part of their grog was exchanged for tea and coffee, &c. he was of the opinion that it would have a happy effect on the health, the morals, and the constitution, of our tars.

Mr. HOLMES wished to know if it was intended that the sailor should receive money in part for his grog. If so, the evil complained of by Mr. HAYNE would not be prevented; because, so soon as the sailor got his money, he would go off and purchase grog. This was the evil Mr. H. would like to see prevented.

Mr. HAYNE replied, that the object and effect of the amendment would be to enable the Executive to allow, as circumstances require it, the sailor to draw only part of the grog at present allotted to him, and to supply him with sugar, wine, coffee, &c. for the remainder.

Mr. SPRAGUE wished to have the amendment so modified as to embrace the midshipmen; because it is well known that the use of spirituous liquors among this class of our naval officers has already produced alarming and painful consequences. A boy goes on board one of our public vessels, and, in a few years, he, by a most improper use of ardent spirits, becomes a most incorrigible drinker; and is soon incapable of serving either himself or his country.

Mr. HAYNE said he had no objection to the modification proposed by Mr. SPRAGUE, and would accept it; though he thought the gentleman was misinformed as to the facts or evils which he alluded to. Mr. H. did not think that intemperance prevailed among our midshipmen. They, for the most part, drank wine, which was not furnished them by the Government, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SPRAGUE] appeared to think, but was laid in by one of their own mess, previous to embarkation for a cruise. They, the midshipmen, drew pay for the ration, and supplied themselves with whatever luxuries or necessities they might think proper; so that, if the modification proposed by Mr. S. was adopted, it would not have the effect intended.

Mr. HAYNE's amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. DICKERSON said he thought the passage of the law would be establishing an unnecessary office. He thought it would be better to leave the purchase of medicines to the surgeons who go out in our ships of war, who would thus, as it was important they should, always supply themselves with fresh drugs. If, as argued by the gentleman from South Carolina, it was important for the surgeons at sea to make reports, though he did not see the importance of it, it might be done as heretofore; there was no necessity for creating an office merely to receive reports. He had heard retrenchment and economy much talked of, and he should like to see it put into practice. He was opposed to the creation of unnecessary offices; he had recorded his vote in opposition to retaining a major general in the army, and, as he wished to be understood, he should ask for the yeas and nays, that he might record his vote against this bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he had not much respect for that word "retrenchment." Reform was desirable and necessary; that reform which lops off useless expenditures, corrects abuses, gives a judicious direction to the public money, and secures a faithful and effectual performance of the public business; and it was evident to his mind, from the effects of a similar arrangement in the medical department of the army, that such would be the consequence of this bill, if carried into a law. Mr. S. went on to show that, from the losses sustained from medicine, after the termination of a cruise, that the actual saving to the Government, which the provisions of this bill would ensure, would amount to twenty thousand dollars per annum, at the very lowest calculation.

Mr. HAYNE, in continuation, argued that, by the passage of the bill, great expense in the medical department of the navy would be saved, and the health and comfort of the seamen would be promoted. He showed, from a report from the War Department, part of which he read, that, by the adoption of the system in the army, order and regularity had taken place of confusion, and an annual saving was made of near forty thousand dollars. The bill did not proceed entirely from the Naval Committee, but was the result of a thorough examination of the subject, and of a fair and perfect understanding with the Navy Department.

Mr. HOLMES observed, that he did not object to the bill in consequence of the additional expense that might be incurred (if, indeed, there should be any additional expense) on so important a subject as the health and comfort of our seamen, if he thought the proposed plan would effect the object it contemplated. He had long thought that the method of putting up medicines, both for our navy and merchant service, was extremely defective, and that some improved system ought to be adopted. He recollected having introduced a bill, at one period, to correct this evil in the merchant service, by requiring a strict examination of the medicine chests of all vessels sailing from our ports; but the bill, he believed, never was acted on. But he thought it extremely doubtful whether one officer (a Surgeon General) could perform the duties contemplated in the bill, or rather, he doubted whether he could correct the evils complained of, and provided against in the latter clause of the bill. He thought the general proposition a good one; but he would inquire if the Surgeon General could carry it into operation? He asked if this officer could be present at Key West and Boston, Pensacola and New York, Portsmouth and Norfolk, Baltimore and New Orleans, or any other port from which our public vessels were about to sail, in order to purchase, superintend, and inspect, the medicines for the cruise? and also be present at the different ports at which these vessels may arrive on their return, in order to examine and decide what medicines are, and what are not, fit for future use? It was evident [Mr. H. said] that there must be some one, on whose judgment they could rely, present at the different ports, to carry the object of the bill into effect. It seemed, therefore, that, though the design was good, there would be insuperable difficulties in the execution.

After a few observations from Mr. DICKERSON,

Mr. HAYNE said he would offer a few words in explanation, as to the difficulties and objections urged by the gentlemen from Maine and New Jersey. The medicines, like all other naval stores, will be furnished on requisitions from the proper department, in the same manner as he supposed the samples would be sent on to the Surgeon General for examination, and by his orders were furnished in the army. They would be put up and secured under the immediate inspection of the proper inspecting officer. The gentleman from New Jersey has said, that those medicines which remain, after the return of a vessel from a cruise, are entirely "worthless; and, consequently, it was unnecessary to provide for their preservation afterwards." Such might be the case; but if it were, it was to be attributed to the evils complained of, and for which the bill provided a remedy. It was well ascertained, by men of science, that, if medicines were properly put up, if they were secured from the action of light and air, that they would be as good at the end of one, two, or three years, as they are on the first day.

The question was then taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote: yeas 36, nays 6.

MONDAY, APRIL 12, 1830.

The Senate was engaged this day for more than six hours on Executive business.

TUESDAY, APRIL 13, 1830.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

On motion of Mr. ROWAN, the Senate took up the bill to organize the Attorney General's department, and to erect it into an Executive office.

Mr. BARTON deemed the bill a very inadequate remedy for any existing evils in the law department of the Government, or in the manner of collecting the revenue. He thought the measure proposed inexpedient. He thought that, where an evil did exist, a proper remedy ought to be applied; and believing that the Government of the United States was old enough, a Home Department, to take charge of the internal concerns of the country, ought to be established. His opinion was, that the period was not very remote, if it had not now arrived, when it would be necessary to confine the Secretary of State to the appropriate duties of his office, and transfer the internal concerns of the country to another department. As to the Attorney General, he ought to conduct a subordinate branch of the Home Department, and not be the head of it, as proposed by the bill, which made him half a law officer, and half a head of a Department, with a large increase of salary for various duties which he cannot perform. If this bill passed, and the Attorney General was metamorphosed into the head of a bureau, an assistant must be appointed, who, like all other deputies, would have to perform most of the duties.

Attorney General's Department.

[SENATE.]

Mr. ROWAN moved to fill the blanks in the bill so as to give to the clerk to be appointed a salary of fourteen hundred dollars per annum, and to the messenger and assistant messenger, the salaries of seven hundred dollars and three hundred and fifty dollars; which motions were carried.

Mr. FORSYTH moved, as an amendment, a proviso, that "the Attorney General shall not, during his continuance in office, engage in any private practice in the courts of the United States, or of the States." It appeared to Mr. F. that the duties prescribed to the Attorney General by the bill would require his undivided attention, and render it impossible for him to attend the courts, unless to conduct cases in which the United States were concerned.

Mr. ROWAN said that, the objections urged, and the remedy proposed, by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Forsyth] had occurred to the Committee who reported the bill, but the evils did not appear to them in the same light that they had appeared to strike the mind of the gentleman from Georgia. Indeed, he thought the amendment rather a matter of supererogation. If it should be found that, after the performance of all the duties prescribed in the bill, together with the duties already imposed on him, the Attorney General had still leisure, he was of the opinion that, by employing such leisure in the practice of the higher courts of law, his intellect would be strengthened, his mind improved, and his legal acquirements increased, so as to enable him to render more efficient and distinguished service to the Government. If the duties of the office should engross the whole time of the Attorney General, then the amendment would be entirely unnecessary. It appeared, therefore, that the amendment was either unnecessary or injudicious. As he had said before, it would be unnecessary, if the duties prescribed in the bill should engross his whole time, because it would then be impossible for him to attend to private practice; and, if he should have leisure, after performing his public duties, it would be injudicious, nay, injurious to the United States, to prevent him from that intellectual exercise which would prepare him for the more effectual performance of his public duties.

Mr. FORSYTH observed that he admitted the correctness of the observation of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Rowan] that the exercise of the faculties not only sharpens, but invigorates the human faculties; and the only difference between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. R.] and himself, was this: Mr. R. appears to apprehend, that, after a faithful and thorough performance of all the duties imposed by the bill, in addition to those already assigned him, the Attorney General will have sufficient leisure to attend to private practice. Mr. F. thought differently. The duties of the office would be great and various. Independent of the present duties of the office, he would have others from the Land, the Treasury, and the Patent Office—he would be subject to the orders of the President of the United States, and would be liable to be called on to go to any part of the United States, to represent the nation in the courts of justice. If such were to be the outline of his duties, (and it appeared to him that the bill pointed to that course) there would not be much much time left to devote to private practice, if the public business received proper attention. But even if it should not engross all his time, and he should engage in the service of private individuals, he cannot foresee what time the public service will demand his attention; and if he should endeavor to secure the emoluments of private practice, it will often be at the expense of his official duties, and consequently, injurious to the interests of the United States. He thought that nothing ought to be left to the discretion of the Attorney General. The salary was sufficient to secure the highest grade of professional talent, and he presumed it was thought so by the committee who reported the bill. It was as great as the compensation allowed to any of the heads of Department, or any of the high officers of Government, and these were all prohibited from the practice of law in all the inferior courts of the United States; and he thought they ought also to be prohibited from practice in all courts. He said he had no particular anxiety about either the bill or the amendment; but if the one was carried into operation, he thought the other should succeed.

Mr. HOLMES thought that his motion to recommit was sufficiently distinct, and understood by every gentleman. He thought that some of the duties, if not all, proposed by the bill to be imposed on the Attorney General, should be done by another Department. It did not become him to direct the committee; he did not think it proper for him to do so; they ought on all such matters to have a proper latitude given them. To say that if his resolution prevailed the bill could not be perfected this session was no argument with him; neither of the Executive Departments were perfected at once: all of them were gradually established as experience and expedience showed and prescribed. He was opposed to this bill, because he was opposed to the creation of an unnecessary office. Where an office was really necessary, he never would be found to vote against its establishment.

Mr. McKINLEY said he was not very solicitous about the bill; nevertheless, he considered that a change was necessary in the organization of the Law Department of the Government; and if gentlemen would devise a better one than the present, he would yield it his support. He believed that in no country was the Law Department in so wretched a condition as in the United States. Some of our most important legal affairs are entrusted to an officer who, he believed, was no lawyer; and whose compensation was not sufficient to command a high grade of intellectual endowment. Mr. McK. said he knew a circumstance which illustrated this position. It related to the celebrated Yazoo claim. The amount was large, and the District Attorney of the United States was directed by the Comptroller to make the best defence he could for the Government; but not one tittle of testimony was furnished him for that purpose. This, and such evils as this, would be corrected by the provisions of the bill. It will then become the duty of the Attorney General to direct the District Attorneys, and to furnish them with the best testimony that can be procured to substantiate the claims of the Government, or to defend it from the imposition of creditors. If this course were pursued, and a rigid responsibility introduced, those abuses that have crept in would be corrected; and he believed that a saving from half to a million of dollars annually, to the Government, would be the result. He thought it would not be so difficult to induce gentlemen of the first legal and intellectual powers to accept the office, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Webster] seemed to think. If, however, a better remedy for the evil were devised, he would have no objections to give it his support.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN felt friendly to the bill, but he was opposed to those sections which imposed on the Attorney General the task of superintending the concerns of the Patent Office, and the publication of the laws. It was highly important, however, that some officer should be appointed to attend to the collection of the revenue, and to direct the various suits which it might become necessary for the United States to bring. The Senator from Missouri admitted there were evils in the present system, and he hoped he would agree to apply the remedy to a part of them, if the whole could not be reached. It had been stated some days ago, by a Senator on this floor, [Mr. WEBSTER] that a bill had been in progress, and considerably matured, in the other House, to appoint an officer to manage the important business of the collection of the revenue; but that the friends of the bill had abandoned it in despair, because of the numberless applications from incompetent persons for the office to be created. Now, [said Mr. F.] that will always be the case, unless you establish an office with a high salary, and requiring the talents of an eminent jurist. It was not necessary that the law officer to be appointed should personally attend to petty collections; but let him be the head of the system—let it go abroad that such an officer has the charge of the business, and all those inferior agents who have been complained of will feel his power, and properly attend to the duties.

Being in favor of the system, though with some slight objections to the present bill, he should vote for the motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES] to re-commit it, that it might be again presented in a more favorable shape.

Mr. SANFORD advocated the bill.

Mr. HOLMES observed, that the salary of the Attorney General was now fixed at three thousand five hundred dollars per annum; and the reason why it was not so large as the salaries of other heads of Departments was, that, by being permitted to pursue his other avocations, which were acknowledged to be profitable, he more than made up to himself the amount of compensation received by the others who were confined to their offices. If this bill intended to establish a Home Department, let it be called so, and made so, instead of legislating for the benefit of a particular individual, and giving him the high salary of a head of a department, and permitting him to devote his time to the practice of his lucrative profession. This was legislating for the people—economy and retrenchment with a vengeance. Mr. H. had intended to offer a resolution to re-commit the bill, with instructions to report one to establish a Home Department; but for us in the minority [said he] there is little chance of our successfully maintaining any proposition we make.

Mr. JOHNSTON thought the time had arrived when an attempt at least should be made to organize a department such as that contemplated by the bill. There were duties, [he said] appended to the Treasury, State, and War Departments, which did not properly belong to them; and which ought to be transferred to a separate and distinct department. He approved of the bill as far as it goes. There ought, he thought, to be a head through the agency of which the claims, &c. of our Government against individuals, should be prosecuted, and debts due the Government collected. He said that at the present time, the debts due the United States, amounted to near four millions of dollars; and that the greater part of this sum was in suit, and the agency of which was reposed in the hands of an officer, who, though a good and meritorious one, was no lawyer, and had consequently to depend, in the prosecution of his duty, on the legal advice of the Attorney General. He thought, therefore, that there was not that strict responsibility in the present system, which the magnitude of the office demanded; and which he believed the provisions of the bill would meet. But there were others, and anomalous duties, imposed on the Attorney General by the bill, to which Mr. J. objected. Our Indians, our Patent Office, and public lands, required another department. The navy had its appropriate duties; but he could not see what relation Indian affairs had to the War Department, the Patent Office to the State Department, or the public lands with the treasury, to which they are at present attached. The duties of these offices were of sufficient importance to demand a separate department independent of the law office, provided for in the bill. He did not know whether the term Home Department, would be an appropriate name for the office to which these duties should be arranged; but the subject had been so long before the public, and had been so ably and so minutely discussed, that he presumed all were acquainted with the meaning it conveyed, and the duties to be assigned it.

Mr. WEBSTER doubted the existence of the evils the bill was proposed to remedy. He should like much to see in detail, the losses and crosses that had been so much complained of. It was easy to say, that the Government had sustained losses under the present system; it might be true, or there might be an error as to facts. Every great creditor, like the Government of the United States, necessarily had had debts; but this usual consequence of large dealings, was no evidence of the badness of the system. His opinion was, the system wanted enlargement, not change. He did not believe any good would result from the metamorphosis of the Attorney General into the head of a bureau; nor did he believe it possible for any one individual to attend to the duties of both departments. One word as to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia. His [Mr. F's.] opinion was, that, if the bill created an executive officer—a head of a department, with a salary equivalent to that of the heads of the present Executive Departments—he should confine himself strictly to the duties of his office, and be debarred from engaging in any law practice in which the United States was not concerned. Now, [said Mr. W.] that is as reasonable as for a gentleman to tell his physician, that he should not feel the pulse of any other human being. He, [Mr. W.] if the bill passed, would go farther than the gentleman from Georgia; he would say to such an officer, you shall not only not engage in any private practice, but you shall not be trusted with the management of any law business of the Government. Make this proviso, [said Mr. W.] and the bill would be a sensible one; the officer would be, what he ought to be, an agent of the treasury; leaving the Attorney General to manage the law concerns of the Government, and, by continual practice, to keep himself bright in his profession.

Mr. W. then argued on the inconsistency of combining the Law Department with a branch of the Treasury Department; of confining the highest law officer of the Government to the desk of a bureau, examining accounts, and superintending clerks, instead of sending him into the courts; and contended that the bill imposed duties on the Attorney General impossible for him to perform consistently with the duties rightly belonging to him.

Mr. KING then moved to lay the bill on the table. A bill [he said] was under discussion, some days past, reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, providing for the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi; and as there was no probability that a final decision could be made at present on the bill before the Senate, he wished the one he had mentioned taken up and disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

THE INDIANS.

The unfinished business was then resumed on the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi.

Mr. MCKINLEY concluded, in answer to Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN; when Mr. FORSYTH, also in reply to Mr. F. occupied the floor until the usual hour of adjournment.

The Indians.

[SENATE.]

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 14, 1830.

The Senate resumed the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians.

Mr. FORSYTH continued his remarks on the subject, until the usual hour of adjournment.

THURSDAY, APRIL 15, 1830.

The Senate resumed the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians, and at three o'clock Mr. FORSYTH concluded in reply to Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.

[The following is the substance of the remarks of Mr. F.]

After an inquiry to the mover of the amendment, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and an explanation of his purpose, Mr. FORSYTH said—

I regret, sir, that the amendment to the bill, proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, is not more definite and precise. His explanation of its purpose is not more satisfactory than the amendment itself, and it is only by looking to his speech that we are relieved from embarrassment. His amendment and explanation leaves us to conjecture whether he intends that the United States shall interfere with the Indians in the old States north of the Roanoke or not. His speech was plain enough. The Indians in New York, New England, Virginia, &c. &c. are to be left to the tender mercies of those States, while the arm of the General Government is to be extended to protect the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and especially the Cherokees, from the anticipated oppressions of Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia. We thank the gentleman for his amiable discrimination in our favor. He, no doubt, hopes that his zeal and industry in the Indian cause will be crowned with success; that he will be able to persuade the Senate, and his friends in the House of Representatives, to interfere, and compel the President to take new views of the relative power of the State and General Governments, and that under these new views the physical force of the country will be used, if necessary, to arrest the progress of Georgia. The expectation the gentleman has expressed, that Georgia will yield, in the event of this desirable change in the Executive course, is entirely vain. The gentleman must not indulge it; with a full and fair examination of what is right and proper, Georgia has taken her course and will pursue it. The alternative to which the Senator looks, of coercion, must be the result. While I entertain no fears that the gentleman's hopes will be realized, I consider it a matter of conscience, before entering upon the discussion of the general subject of the bill, to relieve the Senator from any apprehension that it may become necessary to cut white throats in Georgia to preserve inviolate the national faith, and to perform our treaty engagements to the Indians. It is true, the gentleman displays no morbid sensibility at the idea of shedding the blood of white men in this crusade in favor of Indian rights.

[Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN explained: he did not say he felt no morbid sensibility at the idea of shedding blood in defence of the Indians.]

Mr. FORSYTH continued: I would not misapprehend the gentleman for the world, and no inducement could tempt me to misrepresent him; but I cannot be mistaken in the impression made by his remarks. The gentleman eulogized Mr. Jefferson for his letter to General Knox, of the 10th of August, 1791. He dwelt with peculiar emphasis on the spirit of that letter, and said Mr. Jefferson had no morbid sensibility at the idea of shedding blood in defence of the Indians against the whites. He wished ardently that the present Executive had spoken with the firmness and in the spirit of that letter to Georgia; he believed Georgia would have yielded, and would now yield to such language from the Executive; if she did not, the responsibility of the blood shed would be upon her head.

Now, sir, although we dread no responsibility, I have so much kindness for the Senator as to wish to satisfy him, that there is no occasion for an assault upon us, notwithstanding he displayed so little sympathy for the whites—a circumstance not wonderful, however—having exhausted all his sympathy upon the red men, none for the whites could be reasonably looked for from him. I propose then, sir, for his relief, to show that, considering this as a treaty question, arising under a fair exercise of the treaty making power with a foreign Government, entirely unconnected with any disputes about the relative power of the State Government, and the Government of the United States, that Georgia stands perfectly justified, upon his own principles, in the steps she has chosen to take with regard to those Cherokees who reside within her territorial limits. The gentleman asserts that the Creeks and Cherokees are acknowledged to be independent nations, by treaties made, first with Georgia, and lastly with the United States; that the independence of those tribes is guaranteed by the United States; that treaties with the United States are the supreme laws of the land, and must be executed, although in collision with State constitutions and State laws. The independence of the tribes rests on this argument—that the formation of a treaty is, between the parties, an acknowledgment of mutual independence. I will not stop to show the numerous exceptions to this rule; insisting, however, that the gentleman shall admit, what I presume nobody will deny, that the two parties to a treaty, independent when it was made, may, by the terms of that instrument, change their characters, and assume those of sovereign and dependent. The gentleman has thought proper to refer to the Creeks; why, I cannot tell; they, at least, have now no business with Georgia. We are rid of them, and I hope the gentleman has no desire to bring them back upon us to aid the Cherokees. But, as he has referred to them, I will ask his attention to the first article of the treaty of Galphinton, concluded on the 12th November, 1785, parts of which he has himself quoted:

“Article 1. The said Indians, for themselves, and all the tribes or towns within their respective nations, within the limits of the State of Georgia, have been, and now are, members of the same, since the day and date of the constitution of the said State of Georgia.”

Is not this article broad enough to sustain the claim of the State to the sovereignty over the Creeks? If they were members of the State, as they acknowledged themselves to have been, from the adoption of the constitution of Georgia, what became of their separate and independent character as a nation or tribe? So much for the Creeks. I will not, in tenderness to the lately defunct administration, say more on this chapter of our Indian history. How stands it with the Cherokees? Their situation differed from that of the Creeks in this: all the Creeks who were within the United States occupied land within the territorial limits of Georgia; the Cherokees occupied a territory in North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, the greater number being in North Carolina. The treaty of De Wett's Corner, formed May 16, 1777, with South Carolina and Georgia, by the Cherokees, settles the question with the Cherokees. The first article of this treaty is in these words:

“Article 1. The Cherokee Nation acknowledged that the troops, during the last summer, repeatedly defeated their forces, victoriously penetrated through their lower towns, middle settlements, and valleys; and quietly and unopposed, built, held, and continue to occupy, the fort at Esenneca, thereby did effect and maintain the conquest of all the Cherokee lands eastward of the Unicaye mountain; and to and for their people, did acquire, possess, and yet continue to hold, in and over the said lands, all and singular, the rights incidental to conquest; and the Cherokee nation, in consequence thereof, do cede the said lands to the said people, the people of South Carolina."

You see, sir, the Cherokees admit that South Carolina had, by conquest, acquired a right to all the land in the valleys below the Unicaye mountains. These mountains lie in Tennessee, beyond the territorial claims of South Carolina and Georgia. South Carolina conquered the country from their red neighbors; the right of conquest is admitted: the benefit of that conquest was, according to the well known rights of Georgia and South Carolina, with both of whom the treaty was formed, to be enjoyed respectively by those States. But this is not all: no subsequent change in the political condition of the United States can be used as a pretext for denying to Georgia the claim to sovereignty over the Cherokees within her limits. We stand impregably fortified upon treaties to which the United States are parties. Every professional man who remembers his Blackstone, knows that legislation is the highest act of sovereignty. Now, sir, by the ninth article of the treaty of Hopewell, of the 28th November, 1785, a treaty which begins with these words: "the United States give peace to all the Cherokees, and receive them into their favor and protection;" strange words to be used to an unconquered and independent nation the Cherokees surrender to Congress the power of legislating for them at discretion. I pray the gentleman to hear it.

"For the benefit and comfort of the Indians, and for the prevention of injuries or oppressions on the part of the citizens or Indians, the United States in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right of regulating trade with the Indians, and managing all their affairs in such manner as they think proper."* This treaty, with all its burthens and benefits, fell to the new Government under the constitution, when it was established, and the power of legislating at discretion, to prevent injuries or oppressions on the part of the citizens or Indians, was one of the benefits secured by it. So much for the independence of the Cherokee nation. It may be asked, however, what has this treaty to do with the question between Georgia and the Cherokee Government? It does not follow that, because the United States have sovereignty over the Cherokees, that the State has it? The compact made by the United States with Georgia, in 1802, furnishes the satisfactory answer to this inquiry. The United States, having acquired, by the ninth article of the treaty of Hopewell, the power of legislation over the Cherokees, had the goodness to transfer it to the State. Let us see, sir, what this compact is. By the first article, Georgia ceded to the United States all her right, claim, title, &c. to the jurisdiction and soil of the lands lying west of the Cattaohochie, as far as Mississippi, &c. on specified conditions. By the second article, the United States accept the cession on the conditions expressed, and they "cede to the State of Georgia, whatever claim, right, or title, they may have to the jurisdiction and soil of any lands, lying within the United States, and out of the proper boundaries of any other State, and situated south of the Southern boundaries of the States of Tennessee, North Carolina, and South Carolina, and east of the boundary line herein above described, as the Eastern boundary of the territory ceded by Georgia to the United States." The Senator from New Jersey may be assured, that the Cherokees, over whom the Georgia laws are to operate, live upon the territory described in the second article of the compact of 1802, south of Tennessee, North Carolina, and South Carolina, and east of the Cattaohochie. Gentlemen may amuse themselves with finding fault with this transfer by the United States of a power granted to them and intended to be used by the United States only. They may prove it, if they choose, an act of injustice to the Cherokees—a violation of faith. We will not take the trouble to interfere with such questions. The United States obtained, by treaty, the power to legislate over the Cherokees, and transferred it to Georgia. The justice and propriety of this transfer must be settled by the United States and the Cherokees. In this settlement Georgia has her burthen to bear, as one of the members of the Union; but no more than her fair proportion. If any pecuniary sacrifices are required to do justice to the injured, let them be made: if a sacrifice of blood is demanded as a propitiation for this sin, to avert the judgment of Heaven, let the victim be selected. Justice demands that it be furnished by the whole country, and not by Georgia, and if the honorable Senator from New Jersey will fix upon one between the Delaware and the Hudson, he will escape all imputations of being actuated by any motive but the love of justice—pure justice. For us it is enough to have shown, that what we claim is in our bond, and until the gentleman can rail off the seal, our claim must be allowed, though it should extend to the penalty of a pound of flesh. Yes, sir, we claim, and we will have the penalty of the bond—the pound of flesh, not in the Shylock spirit to destroy; we will take it upon the conditions prescribed by the learned doctor in the court of Venice, the gentle Portia—"Not one drop of blood shall be shed;" we will take our "just pound," neither "more nor less, by one poor scruple:" the balance in which our rights are weighed shall stand precisely even; neither scale shall descend below the other "the ninth part of a hair." Respect for the Senator from New Jersey will not permit me to charge him with any premeditated obliquity of vision; but certainly, when it is recollected that all the treaties I have presented to the Senate were examined and quoted by him, it is strange by what fatality it was, that his eye did not for a moment rest upon either of the pregnant provisions to which I have endeavored to direct his attention. There they stand, conclusive refutations of all his arguments founded upon other provisions of the same or subsequent instruments, unless he is able to prove that they have been formally altered by the parties to them.

Sir, [said Mr. F.] having shown, if not to the satisfaction of the Senator from New Jersey, I trust to that of the Senate, that upon the principles assumed by the adversaries of the bill, Georgia stands justified in her course; I shall proceed to submit a few observations on the subject of the disposition which ought to be made of the Indians within the United States. The preliminary inquiry was not merely with a view to relieve the mind of the Senator from New Jersey from painful apprehensions, but to show to the Senate that our opinions on the great subject of the aborigines were not formed to suit our interests, nor at all influenced by them; that there was no motive operating upon our minds to tempt us into erroneous judgments. The condition of the remnants of the once formidable tribes of Indians is known to be deplorable: all admit that there is something due to the remaining individuals of the race; all desire to grant more than is justly due for their preservation and civilization. Recently great efforts have been made to excite the public mind into a state of unreasonable and jealous apprehension in their behalf. The evidences of these efforts are before us in petitions that have been pouring in from different parts of the country. The clergy, the laity, the lawyers, and the ladies, have been dragged into the service and united to press upon us. But these efforts have been unavailing: the people are too well informed to be deluded; they have too much confidence in the justice and wisdom of the administration to be misled by persons who have united, at this eleventh hour, in opposition to a project which has been steadily kept in view by three administrations. To show what has been attempted, I pray the Senate to attend to an extract of a letter received from a most respectable and intelligent gentleman in one of the New England States. [Here Mr. F. read the extract which follows:]

* The 8th article of the treaty with the Choctaws, of the 3d January, 1786, and the 8th article of the treaty with the Chickasaws, of the 10th January, 1786, both concluded at Hopewell, are copies of this article. Congress have powers, by this article, to legislate at discretion, for the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws. A bill to remove them against their consent, if Congress believed such removal necessary for their preservation and prosperity, might be vindicated under them.

"An attempt is making in the Eastern States to create a great deal of sympathy for this people; and the attempt is making, so far as I can discover, by what is termed the 'Christian party in politics.' Petitions to Congress have been got up, printed and circulated through the New England States for signatures, without any post mark to indicate their starting point; they have been forwarded to every town; addressed to 'Congregational clergyman of ——— or either of his deacons,' with instructions to have them filled with as many signatures as can be obtained, and then forwarded to Congress with as little delay as possible. These petitions supplicate Congress to protect the Indians in the occupancy and enjoyment of the lands where they reside, and the civil regulations they may adopt for their own government. Many of these petitions probably have reached Congress before this time."

Considering the means employed, it is surprising, not that we have petitions before us, but that we have so few, and to the Southern section of the Union it is a consolation to know that these efforts to prejudice the question of their rights should have, in many instances, produced a fair investigation of them, and the expressions of popular opinion in their behalf, the more precious since they were spontaneous, the offspring of honest conviction and not of political arrangement. That many respectable persons have been deceived is not disputed. They have been the unresisting instruments of the artful and designing, and ministered to political malignity, while they believed themselves laboring in the cause of justice and humanity.

Two evidences of such delusions are before me. A circular printed for the signature of the ladies, and forwarded to me with a note, "read with a view to eternity," as if I were in danger of eternal punishment if I did not abandon the defence of the position taken by Georgia, on which I have already periled my reputation as a politician, and stand responsible as an accountable being. The other, sir, is to judge by its contents, the work of an amiable Revolutionary soldier, (Alpheus Camden, of Long Island, he signs himself) who expresses the deepest conviction of the propriety of his opinions, and urges me, as I dread the horrors of an Indian and a servile war, to retrace my own steps, and correct the opinions of the State. These delusions will pass away; this venerable man, like all others who have been misled, will soon know that they misunderstood both our principles and our purposes, and have formed on this subject crude judgments without the knowledge of the facts necessary to a correct decision; and without due reflection upon the past or the future.

In common with all who have addressed the Senate, I feel and have ever felt the strongest anxiety to do justice to the Indian tribes. I have reflected much on the subject since the project of congregating them beyond the Mississippi, and establishing a great Indian government, was first suggested during Mr. Monroe's administration. I looked on that project as wild, visionary, and impracticable. Anticipating its discussion in 1823, I contemplated proposing a scheme of my own; fixed the outline, and arranged some of its details. This scheme would have embraced these provisions:

That the land occupied by the Indians in all the States and Territories, should be taken possession of as the property of the Government in the new States, and of the States in the old; each tribe to be credited on the books of the treasury with ——— per acre, bearing an interest of five per cent. for the land occupied by them.

This debt to be called the Indian fund: the interest to be paid semi-annually to defray the expenses of governing and civilizing the Indians until they are incorporated as citizens of the United States; after that event the debt to be considered as extinguished.

A grant in fee simple to be made to each Indian family of ——— acres for each member of it; not alienable before the year 1900, and no leases beyond one year to be valid. This land to be surveyed in a body, and good soil carefully selected.

Twelve hundred and eighty acres to be set apart in the centre of the granted lands for public use as the seat of the Indian government.

Government to be organized for the Indians by Congress. A governor to be appointed by the President of the United States of white, or Indian, or mixed blood. Three counsellors to be chosen by the chiefs of the tribes. Representatives, (according to the number of Indians) but never less than ten, to be chosen by the Indians annually.

The governor and council to propose laws to the representatives, the governor having a veto on the proceedings of the representatives.

The counsellors and representatives to be of Indian or mixed blood; their compensation and that of all the officers to be fixed by Congress.

Judges to be nominated by the governor and council, and approved by representatives, removable every ten years. Judges, to be white men, for twenty years. Jury trials to prevail; the jurors to be of Indian or mixed blood.

Criminal and civil laws subject to the revision of Congress.

System of education to be devised by Congress; all the Indian children under ten, to be embraced in the provision to be made, and their education not to be considered complete until they are twenty-one.

All Indians to become citizens in 1900.

Indians not willing to submit to these regulations to be removed beyond the Mississippi; hunting lands to be provided for them there, and a just indemnity made for the expense and trouble of removal.

Full of the idea [said Mr. F.] of conferring important benefits on this hapless race, I was on the point of proposing a bill to be presented to the consideration of Congress. But I was led by the frequent occurrence of constitutional objections to this previous inquiry: Has the Government of the United States the constitutional power necessary to execute such a scheme? It involved the exercise of these two important powers, to appropriate to the exclusive use of the Indians, land, the jurisdiction over which, with the soil itself, was claimed by the States, and without the consent of the States, and the power to establish exclusive municipal regulations for the government of a class of persons within the State sovereignty. Convinced, on a short examination, that neither power was conferred by any grant of authority in the constitution, and neither fairly incidental to any specific grant in that instrument, I was reluctantly compelled to abandon my project.

Although not reconciled to the project of Mr. Monroe's administration, I was convinced that the basis of that project—the removal of the Indians beyond the States and Territories—was the only mode by which the power of the General Government could be properly and exclusively exercised for their benefit. I do not believe that this removal will accelerate the civilization of the tribes. You might as reasonably expect that wild animals, incapable of being tamed in a park, would be domesticated by turning them loose in the forest. This desirable end cannot be obtained without destroying the tribal character, and subjecting the Indians, as individuals, to the regular action of well digested laws. Wild nature never was yet tamed but by coercive discipline. The recent experiment made on the Arkansas has somewhat shaken my faith. It is understood that the Cherokees, who removed to that country in 1817-18, with a view to continue the hunter's life, have advanced more rapidly than those who remained on this side of the Mississippi, in the arts of civilized life. Yet, doubting, as I do, the effect of this measure as a means of civilization, I shall vote for it, with a hope of relieving the States from a population useless and burthensome, and from a conviction that the physical condition of the Indians will be greatly improved by the change: a change not intended to be forced upon them, but to be the result of their own judgment, under the persuasions of those who are quite as anxious for their prosperity and tranquillity, as the self-constituted guardians of their rights, who have filled this Hall with essays and pamphlets in their favor. That all the Indians in the United States would be benefited by their removal beyond the States, to a country appropriated for their exclusive residence, cannot be doubted by any dispassionate man who knows their condition. With one or two remarkable exceptions, all the tribes are rapidly diminishing in number, from the operation of causes the State Governments either will not, or do not, choose to remove. The report made in 1820 to the War Department, by the agent, Morse, appointed to collect information on this subject, shows that there were then in New England two thousand five hundred and twenty-six Indians; in New York, five thousand one hundred and eighty-four; in Virginia, North and South Carolina, four hundred and ninety-seven; in Georgia, five thousand Cherokees; making an aggregate of thirteen thousand one hundred and seven in the old States. All these Indians, with the exception of the Cherokees in Georgia, are in a state of involuntary minority. Their property in the hands of trustees or agents, not chosen by themselves, but appointed for them, with but a nominal responsibility for the faithful performance of their duty. As individuals, they are responsible for crimes, and punishable in the courts of justice of the States. But they can neither sue nor be sued, contract nor be contracted with, without the intervention of their trustee. Without industry, and without incentives to improvement, with the mark of degradation fixed upon them by State laws; without the control of their own resources, depending upon a precarious, because ill-directed, agriculture, they are little better than the wandering gypsies of the old world, living by beggary or plunder.

Of the new States, Ohio contains two thousand four hundred and seven; Indiana and Illinois, seventeen thousand; Alabama, twenty thousand Creeks; Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina, eight thousand Cherokees; Mississippi, twenty-eight thousand six hundred and twenty-five Choctaws and Chickasaws. In the Territory of Florida, there are five thousand; in Michigan, twenty-eight thousand three hundred and eighty; total, one hundred and nine thousand four hundred and eighteen.

In some of these States the laws have been, and in others they probably will soon be, extended to the Indians as individuals. These Indians are partially regulated by their own usages, yet subject to the operation of the criminal law in the courts of the United States. In no part of the country have the Indians an admitted right to the soil upon which they live. They are looked upon as temporary occupants, who have not, and are not, intended to have a fee simple title to the land. They are hunters, whose game is every day diminishing, and who must change their place of residence, or their mode of procuring subsistence.

In the removal of the Indians from the old States, for which provision should be made, from motives of humanity, the United States have no interest. Should those residing in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, North and South Carolina, be disposed to try their fortunes in the West, the States from which they remove, or the owners of the land upon which they now reside, (in many cases the land occupied by them has been granted to white persons) should be required to pay all the expenses of their transportation to the country allotted for them. Georgia, of the old States, stands on distinct ground. The United States are bound by compact to pay all the cost of extinguishing the Indian claim to lands lying within her limits. In the new States, the only benefit to be derived by the United States from the removal of the Indians, is this: The lands occupied by them will be immediately subject to survey, sale, and settlement. For the old and for the new States, this important object will be gained: a race not admitted to be equal to the rest of the community; not governed as completely dependent; treated somewhat like human beings, but not admitted to be freemen; not yet entitled, and probably never to be entitled, to equal civil and political rights, will be humanely provided for.

I should be happy, if a sense of public duty permitted me to dismiss this subject with these brief remarks. The Senator from New Jersey has imposed upon me the necessity of occupying much of the time of the Senate, in the examination of the charges made against the State of Georgia. His amendment seems to have been manufactured for the purpose of assailing and vilifying the State—I mean not to excuse nor to defend the State; neither is it necessary. A fair exposition of facts is sufficient for her triumphant vindication. She stands at present on the vantage ground. All the public functionaries, to whom the constitution gives the power to decide upon our pretensions, have admitted them to be just. The gentleman, indeed, censures the President of the United States, for deciding an important question, which ought to have been submitted to Congress. With what justice is this censure bestowed? Is it not the duty of the President to execute the laws, and observe the obligations of the United States? The Cherokees demanded the intervention of the President, alleging an infraction of a compact made with them. Was the President to interfere because the Cherokees complained? Was the President to decide against the pretensions of a State, without examination into the merits of the question presented? It was his duty, under the high sanctions of his oath of office, to decide. He could not escape a decision, had he a mind to evade it. This decision has been made, and if error has been committed, it is in favor of the Cherokees. The President considers the obligation of the United States to guarantee to the Indians the enjoyment of their lands as paramount to the claims of the State—a decision which cannot be sustained. The land and the Indians are, according to the same principles, subject to the exclusive control of the State sovereignty, and such will be the decision, should the question ever be judicially determined. I trust and believe that the question will never be agitated; it will not be, unless the Senator from New Jersey should succeed in filling the minds of the Cherokees with vain hopes, and tempting them to acts fatal to their security. The President has, in conformity with his constitutional opinions, stated to the Indians what is their true position. They must remove, or remain and be subjected to the State laws, whenever the States choose to exercise their power. The gentleman assumes that this is a violation of a treaty stipulation with an independent tribe, and on this assumption he rests his condemnation of the Executive. Now, sir, the gentleman must perceive, that the President puts a different construction upon these compacts; that he construes them as made under the constitution of the United States, which gives to the General Government no power, by the instrumentality of an Indian compact, to limit the jurisdiction or narrow the sovereignty of one of the States. I will not now inquire who is right, the gentleman or the Executive. It is not my purpose to defend the President; he has done what he believed his duty required, and is not justly chargeable with any attempt to forestal opinion, or shut the door to inquiry. What prevents the Senator, if he wishes a decision of Congress, from presenting fairly and openly the question, on the construction of these instruments? I should be glad to meet him on fair ground. I invite him to present distinct resolutions, affirming that the Indians are independent Governments, beyond the control of all the States; that the fee simple of the land occupied by them is theirs; that neither the General Government nor the States can regulate their affairs; that treaties can only be made with them by the United States. Why is not this done, sir? Is it not because the legislation of the United States, the legislation of the States, the judicial decisions of the Federal tribunals, and the judicial decisions of the State tribunals, all concur to prove that such positions are untenable? These opinions, sir, are the novelties of the present hour, got up for a special purpose, and to produce political effect; and can be productive of no injury, unless the Cherokees should be deluded by them.

But, sir, I am forgetting the main purpose of my addressing the Senate. Georgia is the theme of the evening chant, and the matia song of all the calumniators of the Union, who have taken the Cherokees into their holy keeping. No epithet is too strong, no reproach too foul, to cast upon her, for having followed the example of ten States, in the exercise of jurisdiction over the Indians within their territory. All the New England States, New York, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Maryland, escape censure for similar acts with those which have brought down upon us torrents of invective. I may be permitted to point out some of the causes which have led to the great anxiety that is exhibited for the Cherokee Government.

The late Secretary of War points out some of the most prominent. There are a great many white men, missionaries, and others connected with the missions, who have comfortable settlements on the land occupied by the Cherokees, and a direct interest in preventing any change in their condition. These persons have been actively engaged in correspondence with their friends, and the patrons of their missionary establishment. The Cherokee Government is in the hands of a few half-breeds and white men, who, through its instrumentality, regulate the affairs and control all the funds of the tribe. There is a press established, supported by those funds: a press established in a community of thirteen thousand souls, not five hundred of whom can read or write! The money which ought to be used to feed and clothe the common Indians, who are represented as half starved and naked wretches, is applied to the support of a printing press, to the establishment of exchanges of newspapers with the printers of the United States. It is thus, sir, that the Cherokees have been made so prominent. There is another, not less powerful agent, at work. The Cherokee Government have a Delegation in Washington, sent here to defend the independence of the tribe; and as the leaders understand the value of money, the Council have passed a resolution authorizing the Delegation to pay out of the public treasury for any aid or advice that may be obtained in the execution of their trust. Of these printed circular letters, of these printed memorials to Congress, of these pamphlets and essays, which have been laid upon our tables, how many have been fabricated under the hope or promise of present reward? Let those who are confidential with the Cherokee Delegation answer the question.

Ungrateful as they are, [said Mr. F.] reproach and censure are not new to us. Our Western lands and Indian relations became fruitful sources of dispute between Georgia and the United States, soon after the declaration of independence, and have continued to be at intervals subjects of controversy since that eventful period. Always abused for making unfounded and unjust pretensions, it has been our great good fortune to show, in the progress of time, that our claims were just; to have them always finally admitted. While justice has been done to the claims of the State, her character has not ceased to be the object of contumely; we were right; we have finally obtained the object in dispute; yet we are still reproached as if the charges of unjust pretension had been substantiated by evidence, and had received the sanctions of time. I ask the patient attention of the Senate to a brief sketch of the history of our disputes.

The States claimed as common property our Western lands, as obtained by the expenditure of common blood and common treasure. The State of New Jersey presented a remonstrance to the old Congress, claiming for the Confederation all the Western lands. Regardless of Indian rights, and the independence of the tribes, now so dear to her Senator, New Jersey claimed the soil of the wild land for the Confederation; leaving the jurisdiction to the State where the land lay. The States north of the Roanoke made a transfer of their Western lands. Georgia offered a transfer, but the conditions proposed were not satisfactory, and the transfer was not made. In order to press upon Georgia this surrender of her lands, questions were raised under the articles of Confederation about the power of the States over the Indians. A war was threatened on the Southern frontier, by the Creeks and Cherokees. Assistance was claimed under the articles of Confederation, and Congress, although bound by these articles to defend all the States, talked gravely of examining into the justice of actual war, in order to determine on the propriety of affording necessary aid to their white brethren; and claimed, in defiance of the article in the Confederation, exclusive control of Indian affairs. To tempt Georgia, a transfer of lands was suggested as the best practicable mode of settling all questions of relative power between the States and the Confederation. By a majority vote of Congress, treaties were required to be held, whenever a majority of the States ordered them to be held. These difficulties continued until the constitution was adopted. The first President of the United States found the country embarrassed by Indian hostilities, and his attention was early directed to give tranquillity to our frontier settlements. The State of Georgia had formed treaties at Shoulderbone, Augusta, and Galphinton, with the Creek Indians. Their validity was disputed. General Washington asked the advice of the Senate of the United States on these points: Should an inquiry be made into the circumstances under which these treaties were held? If fairly held, should they be enforced by the arms of the Union? If not valid, should they be made the bases of new arrangements with the Southern tribes? These inquiries were all answered in the affirmative. Investigation into the validity of these treaties was made by the commissioners of the United States, Griffin and others; and the result was, a report that these compact were made with all the usual formalities and fairness of Indian treaties. They were not enforced by the arm of the United States; an arrangement was preferred; and territory previously surrendered to the State by the Indians was restored to them as hunting grounds; and the intercourse act, of 1790, was passed to enforce this violation of State sovereignty. What did Georgia do on this palpable violation of her admitted right? Animated by a love of the Union, by her respect for the peace and tranquillity of the country, to which her just claims had been unconstitutionally surrendered, she used no violence, she sought no redress by unhallowed means. She came here, sir, to protest against this new treaty, and against the law of 1790, as equally repugnant to her claims and to the constitution of the United States. She hoped for indemnity. It never was made. We have the satisfaction to see, upon the public records, the acknowledgment that our complaints were just. A committee of Congress reported that injustice had been done to the State, and that indemnity was due. In the compact of 1802, there is found the admission of the United States that lands, formerly ceded by the Creeks to the State, had been taken, without equivalent, from the State. Without authority under the constitution, it certainly was wrested from us. I ask the honorable Senators from the East what would have been the conduct of one of the New England States, had a similar surrender of their territory been made, even under the pressure of dire necessity, to a foreign government? What is the feeling of the East on this point may be learned from the correspondence of the Governor of Maine, and the late Secretary of State, on the Northeastern boundary of the United States, now a question of arbitration with Great Britain. An inspection of that correspondence will show that some warmth is felt, even in the cold regions of the North. The blood can run amidst the snows of Maine, in a heady current, not less than under the influence of a southern sun. Fortunately for Governor Lincoln, he lived in a favored region; and his doctrines of State rights and sovereignty brought down no invectives upon his head, although, in theory, and in language too, he did not lag far behind the fiery Georgian. The Senate will perceive, sir, from the protest of the State, that the Senator from New Jersey mistakes, when he asserts that Georgia has always acquiesced in his favorite doctrines. The first encroachment upon her sovereignty was resisted in the only practicable and peaceable form. The claim to all the Western lands lying on the Mississippi, as the property of the United States, was revived under the Constitution, on the old ground, and a new claim set up, on a new ground, to that portion of the State of Georgia, which lay between latitude thirty-one degrees North, and latitude thirty-two degrees and thirty minutes North, on this singular pretext. The strip of territory formed a part of Georgia or South Carolina, until the Floridas belonged to Great Britain, and was annexed to West Florida, by Great Britain, prior to 1770. The treaty of peace with Great Britain having surrendered to the latitude thirty-one degrees, the surrender was made to the confederation, and not to Georgia or South Carolina. In the negotiation with Spain to fix the southern boundary of the United States, latitude thirty-one degrees was claimed as the boundary of Georgia. When that boundary was admitted by Spain, latitude thirty-one degrees became, in the language of the United States, not the boundary of Georgia, but the boundary of a territory surrendered to the confederation, by the treaty of 1783, with Great Britain. Pressed by these claims, and anxious to strengthen the State in her territorial pretensions, the Legislature of Georgia, in an evil hour, made sale to companies, in the year 1794, of large portions of her Western lands. Improper means having been used to secure the passage of the legislative enactments for these sales, they were declared void by a subsequent Legislature, and by a convention which met in the succeeding year to alter the State constitution. The Yazoo fraud, as it is usually called, is a constant theme of reproach to the State. No one remembers the stern integrity that prevented its success. Not satisfied with a barren claim to our Western lands, the United States deemed it expedient, in 1798, to make a direct attack upon the State sovereignty, by the erection of a government—the territorial government of Mississippi—within our boundaries. It is true, sir, as if in ridicule of our pretensions, there is a solemn reservation in the act of the right of the State to the soil and jurisdiction. The sovereignty is assumed. Exclusive legislation exercised by the United States, with a saving of the rights of soil and jurisdiction thus openly violated. Within the period embraced by these transactions, the State was harassed by Indian depredations and Indian wars. Irritating questions were perpetually arising between the State and the United States. The agitation produced by the sale of our lands to private companies, and the subsequent annulment of the act of sale; the usurpation by the hand of power of our sovereign and territorial rights, and the irritating questions produced by the savages within our limits, almost compelled the State to a surrender of the Western lands, so long the object of desire to the other members of the Union. In January, 1798, a convention having been called to reform the constitution, the Legislature adopted the report and resolution which I will read to the Senate. [Mr. F. read the report and resolutions in the appendix No. 1.] The Legislature recommended the insertion of a clause in the new constitution, authorizing the Legislature to sell the Western lands on these conditions:

First, the payment, out of the public treasury, of one million five hundred thousand dollars in specie, bank or funded stock of the United States.

Second, that the United States should extinguish, (at their sole and proper expense,) the Indian claims to all the land not ceded by Georgia, within certain designated periods of time. All the lands between the temporary line separating the whites and Indians, and the river Ocmulgee, within two years from the date of cession. The land lying between the Ocmulgee and Flint rivers, within seven years; between the Flint and Cathahochie, within fifteen years.

Third, that the United States should guaranty the absolute right and title to the northward and eastward of the Cathahochie forever.

Fourth, That the territory ceded should be admitted into the Union whenever the number of inhabitants entitled it to a Representative in Congress as a free and independent State.

This legislative recommendation was effectual: the convention incorporated a clause in the constitution of Georgia, authorizing a cession to the United States. Under acts of Congress and of the State Legislature, Commissioners were subsequently appointed, and the compact of 1802 was formed. It will be found, by reference to the compact, that the conditions proposed by the Legislature of Georgia were not obtained. For one million five hundred thousand dollars in specie, bank stock, or funded stock, was substituted one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, payable out of the proceeds of the land ceded. For the extinguishment of Indian claims within fifteen years, was substituted a promise to extinguish that claim as soon as it could be done peaceably and on reasonable terms. For the guarantee of the absolute right and title to the land east of the Cathahochie, was substituted a cession of the right of the United States to the jurisdiction and soil. The act was nevertheless ratified by Georgia, and it was fondly hoped that no future disputes about Indians and Indian lands could possibly arise. Relying upon the faith of the United States, Georgia, from the date of the compact until recently, refrained from all exercise or claim of authority over these subjects, looking confidently forward to a period not remote, when all her just claims would, without effort on her part, be satisfied by the General Government. To this compact the honorable Senator from New Jersey may look for an answer to his repeated inquiry, why did Georgia acquiesce in the exercise of the treaty-making power by the Federal Government? Georgia, having imposed upon the United States the obligation to extinguish the Indian title, did not consider herself authorized to interfere in the manner in which that obligation was performed. Why she has been compelled to interfere will be seen by a short history of the execution of the compact. The money stipulated has been, after some difficulties, paid. Of the land, after the expiration of twenty-eight years, a large territory still remains occupied by the Indians. When it is borne in mind, [said Mr. F.] that since the year 1802, countless millions of acres of land have been purchased by the United States from Indian tribes; independent States created, and territorial governments formed upon it, is it surprising that the Georgians should inquire, why it is, that this compact has not been fully and faithfully executed? To say nothing of Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and the

[SENATE.]

Territories of Michigan and Arkansas, compare the purchases made by the United States in Ohio, from Indians, and the effect of these purchases on the political power of the South and West. On the 30th of April, 1802, the act passed authorizing the people of Ohio to form a constitution. How stands Ohio compared with Georgia—an independent State of the Revolution—in 1802 represented by three Representatives in Congress! At this moment Ohio is cursed by the presence of but a few Indians, occupying a small body of land, while in political power she stands, to adopt expressions vauntingly used in this House, by the side of the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. Ohio has been fostered, and the promise to Georgia has not been performed. Ohio has fifteen Representatives in Congress, Georgia but seven. Why is this, sir? Were there greater difficulties in making Indian purchases from the Southern tribes than from the Northern Indians? If such is the fact, a sufficient cause existed to repress our complaints. The United States, from 1805 to 1819, purchased for other States twenty-nine millions six hundred and seventy-eight thousand five hundred and forty acres, not one foot of which lies in Georgia, from the Southern tribes. Vast acquisitions have been made, without difficulty, for the United States: difficulties have always occurred when the Georgia compact was to be fulfilled. But, [said Mr. F.] confining this examination to the Cherokee tribe, look at the singular facts presented by the history of the purchases made from them since 1802. By the report of the Secretary of War, of 30th March, 1824, all the lands purchased for Georgia, from the Cherokees, since 1802, is nine hundred and ninety-five thousand three hundred and ten acres; two hundred and ninety-five thousand three hundred and ten by the treaty of 1817, and seven hundred thousand by the treaty of 27th of February, 1819. Of about five millions of acres occupied by the tribe in 1802, not one-fifth part has yet been obtained under the promise of the General Government. It may be imagined, sir, that this has arisen from the impracticability of making purchases from this tribe. They have been unwilling peaceably to sell on reasonable terms. What will the Senate think of the obligations of truth and justice in the performance of agreements, when I inform them that within that period, more land has been purchased from the tribes than was claimed by them in Georgia; for Alabama, Tennessee, North Carolina, and South Carolina, eight millions five hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and forty acres have been obtained, by the successive arrangements of 1805, 1806, 1816, and 1819. We saw ourselves postponed, time after time, to suit the convenience of other States, without murmur. Complaint would have been justified; it was not made; we relied upon the good faith of the Government for a performance of its obligations in reasonable time. How vainly, we but too soon discovered. The facts just stated show to the Senate that the Cherokees, without difficulty, surrendered more land than was claimed by Georgia. Why the convenience of some of the States was consulted in preference to the performance of a solemn promise, has never been explained. But this is not all; in 1817, through the agency of General Jackson, a contract was made with the Cherokees, by which their removal from Georgia was secured; a contract made at their instance, and for the particular accommodation of that portion of the Cherokees who occupied the lower towns, lying in Georgia, who desired to remove to the West, to continue the hunter's life; the upper towns, lying out of Georgia, desiring to remain permanently where they were. This contract was but partially executed; in the partial execution of it, the interests of Georgia were sacrificed to the policy of the Federal Government. The Cherokees, who wished to remain, threw every obstacle in the way of the emigration proposed. The agent, Mr. Minn, states, in his official report to the Secretary of War, that the poor creatures who were disposed to remove, terrified by their head men, were afraid publicly to approach, to consult him, or to enrol their names as required by the contract: they crept to his tent in the silence and darkness of midnight, to whisper their wishes and their fears. Uniting prudence to firmness, he was able to overcome opposition, and his official statement of 1818, to the Secretary of War, authorizes me to say, that, by a strict adherence to the contract of 1817, justice would have been speedily done to Georgia.

Without apparent reasonable cause, the contract of 1817 was formally abandoned, and that of 1819 substituted. The Cherokees in Georgia remained in Georgia, and to the whole tribe was held out the idea of a permanent residence on the spot they then occupied, with a view to their civilization. This new arrangement led us to believe that Mr. Monroe's administration was not disposed to act fairly towards the State. I mean not to prove or to assert that this belief was well founded. I seek to produce no unpleasant feelings, but merely to show the simple fact that the belief prevailed. Under the impression that we were suffering by premeditated injustice, we quarrelled with Mr. Monroe, as we would have quarrelled with any other President. We expressed our opinion in strong terms, and met the usual fate of those who dispute with persons holding the patronage and power of Government. We were abused and calumniated by all those who hoped any thing from the administration, as the price of their industrious malice. The memorials of the State Legislature to the Executive were disregarded, and the memorials of the Cherokee chiefs, praying that no farther application should be made to buy lands from them, was sent to Congress; and, finally, a message from the President connected the compact with Georgia with his project of Indian Western Government. Against this disastrous conjunction, considered as an indefinite postponement of justice to the State, we raised our voices and our hands. The right of the State was defended by committees in the House of Representatives, and so far sustained, that successive appropriations were made for a further extinguishment of the Indian title in Georgia. Under the first appropriation, negotiation with the Cherokees was opened—it failed. Under the second, a contract was formed with the Creeks. The incident and result of that contract are well known. I will not dwell upon them unless compelled to it. I have no wish to revive the remembrance of disgraceful transactions, nor to indulge unmanly triumph over our defeated adversaries. It is well known, sir, that in those Creek disturbances, the Cherokees, with a view to find support for their own pretensions, were active intermeddlers.

I feel the indulgence of the Senate in the adjournment of yesterday, to enable me to finish my remarks—remarks that ought to have been, and would have been, then terminated, but for the unexpected delay produced by the transaction of Executive business. Apology, for any time I could occupy, would be misplaced. It cannot be expected from me. The State of Georgia has been made so prominent, so wantonly prominent in this discussion, that any thing and every thing that can be said by her Representatives in this body would be excused and justified. Peculiarly appropriate to our condition is the language of Cassius, who was "Hated by those he loved,

Braved by his brother; checked like a bondman:
All his faults observed, set in a note book,
Learned and conned by rote, to east into his teeth."

If Socrates was right when he said that it is good to have calumniators, since, if they say the truth, we may correct our faults; if not, it does no harm; we ought to be very thankful to those who, by putting us under a course of moral instruction, are striving to make us perfect. In this Hall, in the Representative Chamber, in every corner of the country, where a partisan newspaper is to be found, we are discussed without measure, and abused without mercy. This is not all; we are important enough to attract attention in transatlantic assemblies. The Chapel of St. Stephen's has lately resounded with the name of Georgia. On the discussion of the question of universal suffrage, we have been quoted and condemned by a minister of imperial Britain; the minister of a Government whose diplomatic records are disgraced by compacts to monopolize the horrible profits of the slave trade; the records of whose legislation are stained by acts to legitimate and regulate that hateful traffic; the minister of a Government which has but just emancipated a large portion of its subjects, distinguished for wealth, intelligence, and integrity, from odious political and civil disabilities, founded solely on the color of their religious creed; the minister of a Government, a company of whose merchants owns an empire of slaves; an empire gained by a succession of crimes, black enough to make the sun turn pale, were its blessed beams affected by human turpitude; the minister of a Government, in whose colonial dependencies a black man is delivered over to the discretion of his master, and torture and death inflicted upon him is estimated in pounds and shillings, has had the effrontery, in the face of the British nation, and of the world, to upbraid Georgia for enactments to prevent the danger of servile insurrection; a danger to which we are exposed by the peculiar character of a part of our population—a population fixed upon us by the avarice of Britain's self.

The reproach was worthy of its author. A minister of the House of Brunswick, with the principles of a Jacobite; the virulent opponent of Catholic emancipation, while opposition was consistent with the retention of his place in the ministry; the eloquent advocate of Catholic emancipation when place was in danger, was true to himself and his vocation, whilst censuring one of the States of this republic. We may live, sir, to see this opponent of universal suffrage its advocate. If the great captain should again give the word of command, "to the right about face," we may hear of a splendid argument, founded upon the safety and tranquillity of the empire; we may see recorded, opinions abandoned for place, in favor of universal suffrage. Should this second miracle be worked by the conqueror of Waterloo, I trust we shall be spared the praise of the convert. His censure we shall bear without resentment. His praise would be intolerable. But, sir, what does the wretch deserve, who, copying into the columns of his newspaper, in this country, the discussions of Parliament, adds to this speech of the Home Secretary, part only of the reply of the great leader of the opposition, to induce a belief that the opposing champions united to pour out the vials of their wrath upon our heads in one undivided stream; when, in fact, the great advocate (Brougham) although condemning the spirit of our law, pointed, in marked terms, to the necessity of our condition, and taunted his adversary with the inconsistency of his condemnation of the Georgia laws, while the atrocious code of Jamaica was suffered to remain in force? The truth, the whole truth, suits not the purposes of editorial malignity. They understand how to suggest falsehood, by the suppression of truth, when the object is to deceive, by making a false impression upon the public mind. If we should feel a strong indignation at these, and similar efforts here, to prejudice the public mind; to degrade the character of our State; if, under the influence of this indignation, we should pour out our souls in torrents of bitter invective against our artful opponents, we might hope to stand excused before the throne of the Giver of life. Erring man, the child, and, but too often, the victim of passion, could not condemn us.

But, sir, I must not be withdrawn from my purpose, by the dishonorable artifices of editors of American newspapers, by the arts of Senatorial ingenuity, or by the uncal-culated and grossly inconsistent censures of the British minister. I traced, yesterday, the history of the execution of the compact of 1802 to the period when the Creek tribe was removed from our territory. The Cherokees, having been foiled in their efforts to control the Creek movements, sought to strengthen themselves in their position, by forming and publishing a constitution. A few white men and half-breeds were the authors of this scheme—a scheme hateful to many of the Indians, who desired to counteract it. The half-breeds and the whites, having the funds of the tribe, were able to retain the power in their hands, and they proceeded to convert citizens of the United States into Cherokees, by the short and simple process of marriage or adoption. This decisive evidence of the intention of the Cherokees, to perpetuate themselves as sovereigns within the sovereignty of Georgia, attracted the immediate attention of the Executive of the State. Transmitting a copy of the Cherokee constitution to the President of the United States, and calling to his recollection the provision in the constitution which forbade the erection of any new State within the jurisdiction of any other State, and the formation of any State by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress, inquiry was made what measure had been adopted, or was contemplated, to vindicate the outraged sovereignty of the States of North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, and Alabama. This inquiry was not deemed worthy of an answer. The respect due to the State not being strong enough to tempt the Executive of the Union to direct his mind to this subject, an inquiry was made in the House of Representatives by Mr. WILDE, of Georgia. The resolution of inquiry was offered on the 21st of February, 1828, modified on the 22d at the suggestion of Mr. STORRS, of New York, laid on the table on motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, taken up on the 29th, modified by Mr. WILDE, who introduced it, laid on the table on motion of Mr. STORRS, taken up and passed on the 3d of March. The answer to this resolution disclosed these facts: that the Cherokee constitution had been communicated to the War Department in November, 1828, by the commissioners Cocke and Davidson; by the Governor of Georgia, in January, 1829, with his letter of inquiry; but, that the honorable Secretary had not found leisure to give his attention to this subject, until the 23d of February, 1829, two days after the call for information was proposed in Congress. The letter of the Secretary to the Cherokee agent bears date on that day. Had not the resolution of inquiry been accidentally delayed in its progress through the House, the Secretary would have had no time to devote to the subject until after Congress had acted upon it. But what was the determination of the Government, as disclosed in this extorted letter from the Secretary to the Cherokee agent? The agent was directed to inform the Cherokees, that the formation of their constitution would produce no change in their relations with the United States. The effect of this Delphic answer on Georgia and the Cherokees might have been, and no doubt was, anticipated. The Cherokees understood the response of the oracle as favorable to their wishes. The State understood that the administration had resolved not to interfere; to leave the Cherokees to make the most of their case before the tribunal of public opinion; to aid them, if aid should be found popular; in no event to act with Georgia, unless controlled by circumstances.

Thus, after the lapse of twenty-eight years, after large pecuniary sacrifices, and the more important sacrifice of political consequence, to avoid irritating and perplexing questions between the State and Federal Government, we found ourselves compelled to submit to the intrusive sovereignty of a petty tribe of Indians, or to put it down by our own authority, without the aid, and probably against the wishes, of the Federal administration. Every hour's delay would have strengthened the claims of the new Government, and prescription and acquiescence would have been pleaded against us with zeal and effect. The subject of extending the laws of the State over the Indians was presented to the Legislature by the State Executive. To give time to the Federal Government to fulfil its compact, by the extinguishment of the Cherokee claim to the land, and thus cut up the controversy by the roots, and to apprise the Indians, who were about to become the subjects of the State laws, of the intention to act upon them, it was proposed to make the enactments prospective. The expediency of this measure could not be doubted, and the only difficulty felt was on the question of power. We did not suppose it possible that any statesman in this country would deny that the Indians within our limits were under the discretionary control of the Congress of the United States, or of the State Legislature; and had not the arguments used here been founded upon the original right of the Indians to the soil and sovereignty of the country, I should not trouble the Senate with any inquiry going farther back than the constitution of the United States. The honorable Senator from New Jersey claims that the Cherokee Indians were, ever have been, and ever shall be, the owners of the soil, and independent of the Government of the State and of the Union; and he denies that the European discoverers, particularly the English, ever claimed or exercised the right to legislate directly over the Indians, as their dependents or subjects. The European doctrine of the right conferred by the discovery of new countries, inhabited by barbarous tribes, was, I thought, well known. The discoverer claimed the sovereignty over the discovered country, and over every thing under, upon, and above it, from the centre to the zenith. The lands, the streams, the woods, the minerals, all living things, including the human inhabitants, were all the property of, or subject to, the Government of the fortunate navigator, who, by accident or design, first saw the before unknown country. Such were the doctrines of Spain, England, and France. Portugal claimed under a Papal bull, which conferred upon the crown empire and domain over every country newly discovered on the globe, not possessed by Christian people. This Papal title was in perfect unison with the prevailing sentiments of an age, in which the decrees of the Roman Pontiff made and de-throned kings, established and overturned empires. All Christendom seems to have imagined that, by offering that immortal life, promised by the Prince of Peace to fallen man, to the aborigines of this country, the right was fairly acquired of disposing of their persons and their property at pleasure. A few examples from the history of the discoveries and settlements will show the prevalent opinion of the day. The great Columbus, equipped by Spain, came authorized by Ferdinand and Isabella to take all newly discovered lands for the crowns of Castile and Leon; if successful, as his reward, plenary powers were given to him over the country and people discovered, and a large share of the profits to be derived from them promised. This grant was not extraordinary, from sovereigns who considered war with infidels, and their forcible conversion to the true faith, or expulsion from their country, as part of their Christian duty. The great discovery was made; Guanahani was found. Our imaginations have been inflamed by eloquent descriptions of this event. The gazing crowd of enraptured savages watching, on their sunny island, those vast bodies on the ocean, that, with sails spreading to the breeze, like the white wings of an enormous bird, came carcering to their shores; the gaudy Europeans, pressing around their illustrious leader, splendidly attired, and moving to the sound of martial music, in all the imposing pomp of civilization, to the promised land; the savage islanders looking upon the strangers, not as men to be watched and feared, but as angels or gods to be welcomed and adored. The first act of the Castilian admiral was an act of devotion. The symbol of his faith was erected, and amidst these wondering children of nature, this first prayer to the true God was lifted up in the Western world:

"Domine Deus, Æterne et Omnipotens, qui sacro tuo verbo, et cælum, et terram, et mare creasti; benedicatur et glorificetur nomen tuum, laudetur tua majestas, quæ dignata est per humilem servum tuum, ut ejus sacrum nomen agnoscat et prædicetur in hac altera mundi parte."

After blessing and glorifying the name of God that he had designed to make him the humble instrument of causing his holy name to be known and preached in this new world, how did the great navigator, distinguished as he was by his superior intelligence and humanity, treat the untaught children of nature? Provisions necessary for his crew were at first voluntarily offered by the inhabitants. When no longer voluntarily offered, they were procured by artifice, by playing upon their ignorant fears. When artifice did not succeed, they were taken by force. Without their consent, forts were erected on the territory occupied by Indians; and power, as far as it was politic, exercised over them. When the Admiral returned to his country, it is asserted that he lost, for a season, the favor of his illustrious patroness, Isabella, the heroism of whose character was equalled by the loveliness of her person and the tenderness of her heart, by carrying as slaves some of the inhabitants of the new world to Spain. The wretched inhabitants of the newly discovered lands soon found severe teachers of the religion of peace. The name of the Saviour of mankind was belched forth in thunder from the mouths of those dreadful fiery engines that scattered dismay and death through their helpless ranks; it broke upon the devoted race in the deep tones of the furious bloodhounds, baying at their heels, as they fled through the fastnesses of the mountains, where they sought in vain a refuge from torture and death. The dreadful ravages committed upon this helpless people called for the interference of the Government of Spain, and oppression and cruelty were reduced to system by the "repartimientos" and "encomiendas" by Spanish legislation.

The Indians were divided among the Europeans, and recommended for instruction in the doctrines of Christianity. Forced to unnatural labor, starved, and tortured, they died, but died not in the Christian faith. They rejected with scorn the priestly promises of eternal joy, turned their eyes from the holy cross, and expired, expressing an abhorrence of that place of happiness in the world to come, into which Spaniards could be permitted to enter. Passing by the Portuguese, the polished French, and manly English, what did they? The island of St. Christopher's was settled in conjunction by the subjects of these great rivals. No Spaniard had ever fixed himself upon it. The French and English were permitted to gain foothold as friends; were received as guests. In the dead of night, when the unsuspecting natives were in a state of profound repose, the ruffians broke in upon and destroyed all the grown males, as the allies of Spain, that the island might be enjoyed in peace by the victors.

But to bring our examples a little nearer home. The New England pilgrims, who came flying from persecution, how piously they returned thanks to God for the wonderful dispensation of his Providence, which had swept away whole tribes of Indians by pestilence, in order to furnish, without expense or force, a country for a few persecuted whites from the fast anchored isle. Abandoning farther recital of acts which may be considered unauthorized by governments, let us see what were the doctrines of the English Government, to whose power we succeeded, and upon whose opinions we act. What do the grants of the Kings of England to the various proprietors contain? Ample, conclusive, and exclusive transfers of sovereignty and domain, subject only to the reserved rights of the Crown, over all the territory described in the grant, and all the persons upon it. The proprietors exercised, at discretion, eminent domain, and when they surrendered their governments, and colonial governments were established in their place, the colonial governments exercised, under the like restriction, the same power. The Indians were considered incumbrances upon the territory granted to the proprietor, or subjected to the colonial government, and the mode of treating them was altogether discretionary. Their good will was purchased by trifling presents, by poisonous potations; when these means were insufficient, as they usually soon ceased to be, disputes arose about trade, mutual depredations were committed, and the sword acquired what could no longer be obtained for a nominal price. The whole of Rhode Island was bought for fifty fathoms of beads. No proprietor or government ever dreamed of resting a claim to title upon a purchase from the natives. An appeal was always made, in case of dispute, to the patent from the Crown. Such was the course of William Penn, in his controversy with Lord Baltimore. A few facts in relation to Pennsylvania will instruct the Senator from New Jersey as to the true light in which the Indians were viewed by Penn, whose conduct to the Indians is considered as the beau ideal of justice and humanity. Colden's History of the Five Nations contains a speech of Canassatego, a chief of the Six Nations, to the Governor of Maryland, in 1744; he complains that the Indians, deceived by the Governor of New York, conveyed their land to him, in trust, to keep it safe from the Dutch, and that the Governor sold it, afterwards, in England, to their beloved Onas. Penn had long desired to free this land from the incumbrance upon it, but the Indians would not sell. What did Onas in the matter of this flagrant fraud? No doubt he gave them back the land, and held the Governor of New York answerable for the purchase money. He kept the land, and gave the Indians some trifling presents as peace offerings for the deceptions practised upon them, and thought he acted justly and generously. A law of Pennsylvania, of 1771, exhibits, in a still stronger light, how sacredly regardful the successors of the Founders of the City of Brotherly Love were of Indian titles and Indian rights. In common with other lovers of sobriety, the Legislators of Pennsylvania forbade the sale of ardent spirits to Indians, in any larger quantity than one gallon, under a penalty of twenty pounds, half to the Government, the residue to the informer. They did not, like the good people of Connecticut, authorize the offending liquid to be taken from the poor Indians and given to the poor whites, but the sale of it was forbidden, "to prevent the Indians from being debauched by rum, and cheated of their peltry." This praiseworthy act contains this humane and wise exception: "Provided always, That the Governor and Council, or persons by them authorized to hold treaties with any nation of Indians, may, at such treaties, give any reasonable quantity of rum, as by them shall be thought necessary," &c. To debauch the Indians with rum and cheat them of their land was quite a Government affair, and not at all criminal; but to use rum to cheat them of their peltry, was an abomination in the sight of the law. Clear and definite ideas may be formed of the opinions entertained throughout this Anglo-American part of this continent, by an examination of the powers proposed to be given to the union of the colonies contemplated in 1754, over Indians and Indian lands, and the reasons assigned for vesting some of them in the Union. It was proposed to vest in the President General, with the advice of the Grand council of the Union, power to hold or direct all Indian treaties in which the general interest of the colonies might be concerned, and make peace or declare war with Indian nations; that they should make such laws as they judged necessary for regulating all Indian trade; that they should make all purchases from Indians for the Crown, not then within the boundaries of particular colonies, or that should not be within their boundaries when some of them might be reduced to more convenient dimensions. These were the powers proposed at Albany to be given to the Union, by the unanimous approbation of the Commissioners from New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, and Pennsylvania. It is to the reasons assigned for granting these powers to which I invite attention. As to the power of peace and war with Indian nations, it is alleged in the report of this plan of the Union, (Carey's American Museum, vol. 5, pp. 287 and '8) that was supposed to be in every colony, and was expressly granted to some by charter, so that no new power was intended to be granted to the colonies. As to purchases of Indian lands, it is said, private purchases are inconvenient, and lead to wars. Public fair purchases would prevent wars. "It is much cheaper to purchase of them (the Indians) than to take and maintain the possession by force; for they are generally very reasonable in their demands for land; and the expense of guarding a large frontier against their incursions is vastly great; because all must be guarded, and always guarded, as we know not where and when to expect them." The discretionary power in the States to take Indian lands, and maintain possession by force, is here distinctly asserted; but purchase is recommended as the cheaper mode of quietly enjoying the lands granted by the Crown. Peace and war with Indian nations were made by the colonies at pleasure. The plan of the Union not being approved in Great Britain, was abandoned by the colonies. To remedy some of the evils arising in the management of colonial affairs, the royal proclamation of 1763 was issued. It was with unfeigned surprize I heard this proclamation quoted by the Senator from New Jersey as a proof that Great Britain never asserted its right to legislate for the savages, or to appropriate, without a previous purchase, their lands. I ask the Senator to examine it. It asserts:

First, the sovereignty and dominion of Great Britain over Indians and Indian territory.

Secondly, that the Indians were, as subjects, under the protection of the Crown.

Thirdly, that the right to appropriate the land occupied by the Indians resided in the Crown. It contains grants to the whites, and reservations to the Indians as hunting grounds.

Fourthly, that it was expedient to reserve the ground West of the sources of the rivers named in it, for the present, to the use of the Indians.

Fifthly, that the lands East of the sources of those rivers, part of which was then actually occupied by the Indians, should be granted at the discretion of the proprietary or colonial authorities.

The laws and usages of the different colonies throw additional light on this point, if any were required, after the assertions of authority contained in the proclamation of 1763. In war, the Indian never was treated as a civilized enemy; the males were put to death on the principle of retaliation, and the women and children sold into slavery, for the benefit of the captors. In Massachusetts, rewards were offered for captives, and pecuniary inducements held out to encourage the breed of dogs found useful to go out with the hunt-serjeant, in pursuit of Indian rebels. In Virginia, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Maryland, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, and South Carolina, laws were passed, yet on their statute books, [some of them have just been re-published by the House of Representatives,] to regulate, to protect, and to punish Indians.

So stood the question of power over the Indians when the Revolution began. On the Declaration of Independence, the States, respectively, took upon themselves all the authority Great Britain ever exercised, or claimed to exercise, within their limits. The Indians were at their discretion; and whether they were managed by direct enforced legislation, or by voluntary contract, no other Government could interfere between the State and the Indians residing within its territory. The acknowledgment of independence, and the definitive treaty of peace, gave to us all that we desired, in the surrender of the claims of the nation, previously the acknowledged owner of the country and the people. In that war, these savages became the allies of Britain, and were, with her, conquered in the struggle. We claimed them as our dependents, not only by the title surrendered by Great Britain, but of that obtained by victory in frequent and bloody battles. The Senator from New Jersey does not think we conquered Britain, as we are not entitled to claim Canada and the other dependencies of the British Crown. Certainly we were not conquered by Britain. What we fought for, we maintained, and it was finally surrendered to us—all the rights of sovereignty and domain to the territory formerly held as colonial possessions by Great Britain, then forming the confederacy of the United States. We never claimed Canada, nor any other British dependency.

The right of sovereignty and domain covered the claim of legislation over the Indians, and of title to the land occupied by them.

The acknowledgment was made to the United States, and the treaty of peace formed with the confederation. Is there any thing in the articles of confederation which deprives the individual States of any portion of their sovereignty over Indians or Indian lands? The confederation, nine States consenting, could make treaties. Although frequent contracts were made with Indians, and were called treaties, it never was considered that the power to interfere in any manner with the Indians in a State was comprehended within the treaty-making authority granted to the Confederacy. The conclusive evidence of this assertion is the resolution of the old Congress, directing treaties to be held with Indian tribes, whenever a majority of the States ordered them to be held—a gross and manifest usurpation, if founded on the treaty power. That it was not so intended is obvious by referring to the special grant of authority, in these words: "The Congress shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians, not members of any of the States; provided, that the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated." It would be the height of absurdity to suppose, that this clause ever would have been incorporated with the articles of confederation, if, under the power to make treaties, treaties were intended to be made with Indians. It would have been granting all power over a subject to the Confederacy, and then granting a special power over the same subject, clogged with limitations and restrictions. Under this clause, the power of the confederation was claimed and exercised. The report of the committee of Congress, in 1787, quoted by the Senator from New Jersey, is founded on this clause, not on that authorizing treaties. That report is not entitled to respect as an authority, however it may be used as argument, as the opinion of the members of the committee, Messrs. Keary, Carrington, Bingham, Smith, and Danc, of Beverly, Massachusetts. It was never adopted, nor even discussed, in the old Congress. As matter of opinion, it sustains State claims to jurisdiction over all things and persons upon Indian territory, save only the Indians—a distinction neither supported by reason, nor founded on any principle of national law; it admits the power of the State to make the Indian tribes members of the State. The clause in the articles of confederation is sufficiently explicit, without looking to the glosses upon it. The old Congress had, under this clause, no authority to regulate trade or affairs "with Indians, members of any State." The right of a State, then exercised, or to be exercised, of incorporating the Indians as a part of their political system, by legislation, is distinctly recognized; when exercised, the power of the Confederacy ceased. Over those not incorporated, the power granted was to be exercised without infringing or violating the legislative right of any State within its own limits. There was a practical construction of this clause in November, 1782. The Catawbas, residing in South Carolina, applied to Congress for redress of alleged grievances. A recommendation to South Carolina to take such measures for their satisfaction as the legislature of South Carolina should think fit, was the only redress obtained from Congress. No doubt justice was done by the State, as it would have been, had the application been made, in the first instance, to the State Legislature.

If I am not deceived, there is nothing in the articles of confederation that touches the power of a State to legislate for the Indians within its limits. All the acts of State legislation, to which I have already alluded, operated while the confederation existed. With one, only, of these, will I trouble the Senate—the act of Pennsylvania, of 1744, for the speedy trial of capital offences committed by any Indian or Indians in the remote parts of the province. [Mr. F. read the act.] It is not to be denied, that the power of controlling the Indians by legislation was possessed and exercised by the States subsequent to the Revolution, as it had been by the colonies prior to that event. The constitution of the United States produced very important changes in the condition of the State sovereignties. One thing is guarded by special provision—the powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. Has the power over Indians within the States been delegated by the constitution? It distinctly appears, by the first article of the constitution, that Indians, when taxed, are a part of the State population, and increase its political representation; excluded only when not made subject to the burthens of the State. The name of Indian is found no where else in the constitution but in that article and in this clause: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, between the States, and with the Indian tribes." To the Confederation was given power over all Indian affairs that could be exercised, without encroaching upon State sovereignty. To the Federal Government is given the power, without limitation, to regulate commerce only—an unlimited power over one object, in place of a limited power over all the objects of our Indian relations. The proceedings of the convention, on this clause of the constitution, show the intentions of the authors of it.

The Federal Convention met on the 14th of May. Up to the 18th of August no proposition was made to grant any authority to the Government about to be created over Indian affairs. On that day, powers, in addition to those previously agreed on, were proposed to be given to the Congress of the United States. Among these was "to regulate affairs with Indians, as well within as without the limits of the United States." [Journal of the Convention, p. 260.] With other propositions, this was submitted to a committee, who reported on the 22d August, that the clause in the constitution "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States," should be amended by adding the words "and with Indians within the limits of any State not subject to the laws thereof." [Idem p. 277.] On the 31st August, this amendment, with others, was referred to a committee formed of a member from each State present. [Idem p. 318.] On the 4th of September, that committee reported that, in their opinion, the second clause of the first section of the seventh article of the constitution ought to be amended, by adding at the end, "and with the Indian tribes." This amendment was adopted on the same day. [Idem pp. 320, 324, 325.] The convention then refused to give the new Government the power to regulate all affairs with the Indians, either within or without the limits of a State. The convention refused to give the power to regulate commerce with Indians within the limits of any State not subject to the laws thereof, but gave it power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes. The fair conclusion is, that the Congress were not intended to have any special authority over Indians within a State, subjected to State laws. If their separate existence as a tribe is destroyed by State legislative enactments, the control of the Government of the United States, even over the commerce with them, is at an end. When members of a State, paying taxes, they are enumerated as a part of the representative population; they are, as such, answerable to the United States only, as other members of the community. The acts passed in execution of this power, although founded upon the mistaken assumption that the authority of Congress was not limited to the single object of regulating commerce with the tribes, but extended to any intercourse with them, have, nevertheless, all contained the acknowledgment of the State power. All Indians within the ordinary jurisdiction of the States, and surrounded by white inhabitants, are expressly excepted from the operation of the intercourse laws, and the State Executives are vested by them, equally with the Executive of the United States, with authority to permit white persons to pass into and throughout the Indian territories. Under this construction of the constitution, the States of New England, the States of New York, of Maryland, of Virginia, of South Carolina, in relation to the Catawbas, have continued to exercise the same legislative authority over their Indians as prior to the establishment of the new Government. No difficulty has occurred, no question has been raised. What is remarkable is, that in not one of those States, until within the last ten years, have any of the Indians been fairly within the meaning of the first article of the constitution, or been embraced by the provisions of the intercourse laws. In none of these States have the Indians paid taxes; in none have they been, until lately, within the ordinary jurisdiction of the State. One act of the Legislature of New York, passed April 12, 1822, is worthy of notice, as an evidence of the undisputed power of State legislation, and of the necessity for its exercise. An unhappy creature, an old woman, was executed by the Senecas for witchcraft. The executioner was tried, convicted, and condemned, in the courts of criminal jurisdiction in New York, although the act was committed on the Seneca lands, and in obedience to the usages and customs of the tribe. The Legislature pardoned the offender, the instrument of the tribe; at the same time, to prevent a farther disgrace to the State by the commission, within its sovereignty, of similar atrocities, the Legislature enacted that the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of trying and punishing all persons, of whatsoever nation or tribe, for crimes and offences committed in any part of the State, except offences cognizable under the constitution in the courts of the United States, of right belonged to, and was exclusively vested in, the courts of justice of the State, organized under the constitution and laws thereof. It is not in the old States only that legislative power is exercised over Indians. Maine, our young sister, the birth of yesterday, has been, and is constantly permitted to legislate, not for Indians, but for Indian tribes. In 1821, Maine passed an act, in 1826 an additional act, "for the regulation of the Penobscot and Passamaquoddy tribes of Indians."

The exclusive control of the Indians is claimed as a branch of the treaty-making power, and on this rests all the arguments used here, against the right of the States to legislate for, and make contracts with, the Indians. Now, sir, I assert explicitly, that the power to make a treaty with Indians within a State is not delegated to the United States; and I assert further, that the power of making contracts with Indians is not prohibited to the States. The right of the United States to contract with, or legislate for, the Indians, beyond the States, is not denied; it is a necessary consequence of the controlling power of the Government over the territories of the Union. That the President has made, with the advice and consent of the Senate, various contracts with Indians, and called them treaties, is not to be denied. That various contracts have been made with Indians, by States and individuals, under the superintendence of the United States, is certain; they have been submitted, too, to the Senate, voted upon as, and have been called, treaties. What I assert is, that these instruments are not technically treaties, supreme laws of the land, superior in obligation to State constitutions and State laws. Can it be believed that the stern jealousy of the State Governments gave to the United States the power to use a miserable fragment of the population of a State, to extend, indefinitely, their authority, and narrow that of the State Government? The words of the constitution must be, indeed, clear, to reconcile us to this absurd belief. The tenth section of the first article of the constitution proves that the Indian contracts were not in the contemplation of the convention, when the treaty-making power was discussed. By the seventh article, already quoted, it is shown that a distinction is made between foreign nations, States, and Indian tribes. Indian tribes are not, in the terms of the constitution, foreign nations or States. The constitution gives to the President and Senate the power to make treaties—the prohibition to the States of the exercise of this power, covers, necessarily, the whole power granted. Let us see what this prohibition is. It is divided into two classes: "No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation." This prohibition is absolute: treaties, alliances, and confederations, if made, must be made by the United States. The other prohibition is conditional: "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign Power." A contract made between the United States and individuals or corporations, is not a treaty; a compact by State with State, or by the United States with a State, is not a treaty. How, then, can a contract made with a petty dependent tribe of half starved Indians be properly dignified with the name, and claim the imposing character of, a treaty? Now, sir, if a contract with an Indian tribe is not a treaty, alliance, or confederation, but is a compact or agreement, the State Governments can make them at their pleasure, without the consent of Congress; that consent is required only for agreements or compacts made with another State, or with a foreign Government. This is no trifling verbal criticism; important consequences are deduced from this abuse of the word treaty.

Indian contracts made with Creeks and Cherokees by the United States, to fulfil their obligations to Georgia, under the compact of 1802, under the false title of treaties, have been pleaded in bar of the rights of the State under that compact, and asserted to be of superior obligation, not to the compact only, but to the State constitution and the State laws. As usual, when error is to be imposed upon us for truth, the magic name of Washington has been used. The venerable weight of that great name is of powerful influence. He made treaties with Indians—he consulted the Senate—he ratified treaties solemnly negotiated—he performed the obligations of national faith. Such are the general assertions made by the honorable Senator. Will he show us any treaty, made by Washington with Indians living altogether within the limits of a State? Can he show us an instance of an interference by General Washington, in the management of the Indians in any of the old States, either to prevent the formation of contracts by State authority, or the punishment of Indians by State tribunals? I will not suffer the cause of the State to rest upon the failure to produce these necessary proofs of the right to use this great name to our prejudice.

The Indians.

[SENATE.]

I have before me satisfactory proof that General Washington thought, as we think, that the management of Indian affairs was a matter of discretion. Contracts or legislation, purchase or coercion, were equally at the pleasure of the United States, and one or the other to be adopted, as policy and justice should require. In laying before the Senate of the United States, on the 25th of May, 1789, the Indian contracts made by order of the old Congress, Gen. Washington sent with them a report from the Secretary of War, General Knox, of course approved by him. This report contains these sentences: "That it may be proper to observe, that the Indians are tenacious of their lands, and generally do not relinquish them, excepting on the principle of a specific consideration expressly given for the purchase of the same. That the practice of the late English Colonies and Government, in purchasing the Indian claims, has finally established the habit in this respect, so that it cannot be violated but with difficulty, and at an expense greatly exceeding the value of the object." [Executive Journal, pp. 1, 2.] This is not the language of a Chief Magistrate who felt that treaties only could be made with Indians. It is the language of a person who recommends contracts as the best of several modes of effecting an object—best, because the cheapest, and conformable to the habits of the people of whom he speaks—habits not to be violated without difficulty, and at an expense greatly exceeding the value of the object. The Senate will perceive that the doctrines expressed at Albany, in 1754, which I have quoted, are advanced by General Knox. The opinions of the two periods of time are the same. Purchase from the Indians, not because it is the only or the just mode of managing them, but as the cheapest and most convenient.

It is not in this body that it is necessary to pursue this inquiry. The Senate have decided that contracts made with Indians (on the treaty sent last year from New York) within a State, for their lands, were not such instruments as required the sanction of the Senate. The contract sent for ratification as a treaty, was returned to the President, neither ratified nor rejected. Within a few months the Governor of New York has, under a law of the State, called together the Oneidas, and made a treaty with them, as it is called, in open day, and utterly disregarding the pretensions of the United States, under the treaty-making power, and the provisions of the laws regulating intercourse with Indians. The Indians not in the States are reached by the legislation of the United States; various provisions are applicable to them. The Supreme Court of the United States has pronounced upon the condition of the Indians and the Indian lands—the Indians are subject to the United States or the States—the Indian lands owned in fee simple by the Government of the United States, or by State Governments. The dependence of the Indians was asserted and maintained in our diplomatic correspondence at Ghent. By the judgment of all the authorities of the country, according to all law and all usage, the Indians are in the condition of the perpetual inhabitants described by Vattel as sometimes united to a social system without enjoying all its advantages, partaking only of those given by law or custom; the sovereign having always the power to improve that condition, as time and circumstances may permit.

The State of Georgia, after a fair investigation of her position, was confident that, never having surrendered to the United States her power over the Indians within her eminent domain, that the exercise of that power not being in any manner prohibited to her by the constitution of the United States, proceeded to follow the example of the other States, and the act of 1828 was passed, subjecting, after the 30th June, 1830, all the Indians in the State to the regular operation of the State laws. We were not permitted, unmolested, to follow in the footsteps of New York or Maine. What was not censured in either, was in us a crime. The judgments of Heaven were threatened for our crying sins. We are told here, that, should we persist, a tone of moral feeling will be roused that will make Georgia tremble. Little does the Senator know the character of the State. It is not made of such frail materials. We tremble not at the approach of danger. Empty sounds do not affect our nerves. Why should we tremble, sir? What can be anticipated that we have not already endured? Falsehood? Ossa and Pelion have been piled upon us. Calumny? It has been rolled over us in volumes black as the smoke that rises from the pit of Acheron. Threats of the force of the United States? The bayonets of the regular army have been flashed in our faces, and pointed at our throats. We have endured all, without shrinking, and with no other emotion than contempt for our calumniators, and pity for the weakness of those who menaced, without the courage or the power to execute their idle threats.

Responsible to no earthly tribunal for the exercise of her sovereign authority, Georgia is not to be questioned in this body, composed of the Representatives of the States, for the wisdom, the justice, or equity of her laws. I have heretofore challenged a comparison of our Indian legislation with that of any other State. This challenge has not been accepted. I am under no obligation to join issue with the Senator from New Jersey, who chooses to complain of our act as oppressive to his favorite Cherokees. As a mark of my respect, I will, however, endeavor to correct his errors of misapprehension and of fact. The act of 1828 having been intended merely to give fair warning to the Cherokees and to the United States of the determination of the State, its provisions were not carefully considered, as a session of the Legislature was to intervene before it could take effect. In 1829, it being apparent that some, if not all, the Cherokees in the State would remain, at least for a time; after June, 1830, it was necessary to make matured and permanent provision for governing and protecting them. The law of 1829 was adopted: it puts them, in every respect, save one, on the footing of white persons, entitled to all the benefits and subject to all the penalties of civil and criminal laws. The laws and ordinances of the Cherokee tribe are necessarily annulled. This annulment, the learned Senator calls, by a strange perversion of the word, an outlawry of the Cherokees. The substitution of bad for good laws is certainly censurable; but I do not understand the Senator as pronouncing judgment of condemnation upon our code. We enjoy a comfortable state of society under it. Our friends from the North and East—from Jersey, too—find protection under it for their persons and their property, grow rich, and enjoy themselves, although outlawed, like the Cherokees. The gentleman complains that it is, in Georgia, an offence punishable by an imprisonment in the penitentiary, for any person to prevent, by threats, menaces, or other means, or endeavor to prevent, any Cherokee Indian from emigrating or enrolling as an emigrant; and an offence, punishable in like manner, if any person shall deter, or offer to deter, any Indian, head man, chief, or warrior of said nation, from selling or ceding to the United States, for the use of Georgia, the whole or any part of their land; or prevent, or offer to prevent, any such persons from meeting in council, &c. any commissioner of the United States, for any purpose whatsoever. Now, sir, this is not so: no such crime is known to the law of Georgia. To fulfil their compact of 1802, the United States, by act of Congress, offered to the Cherokees in Georgia inducements to emigrate. Among others, payment for improvements on the land occupied by them was promised to all who enrolled their names, and commissioners were appointed to fix a value upon those improvements. The Cherokee government having forbidden, under the penalty of death, any Indian from selling land to the United States, and ordered a confiscation of the property of those who should enrol themselves for emigration, the act of Georgia was intended to counteract these provisions; to secure to the head men the right to meet the commissioners of the United States whenever they think proper, and to secure to the individual Indians the right to consult their own will, the right inherent to every freeman, of choosing the place of his residence, and changing it at his pleasure. The sections of the act of which the Senator complained as offensive are in these words:

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any person, or body of persons, by arbitrary power, or by virtue of any pretended rule, ordinance, law, or custom, of said Cherokee nation, to prevent, by threats, menaces, or other means, to endeavor to prevent any Indian of said nation, residing within the chartered limits of this State, from enrolling as an emigrant, or actually emigrating, or removing from said nation; nor shall it be lawful for any person or body of persons, by arbitrary power, or by virtue of any pretended rule, ordinance, law, or custom, of said nation, to punish in any manner, or to molest either the person or property, or to abridge the rights or privileges of any Indian for enrolling his or her name as an emigrant, or for emigrating, or intending to emigrate from said nation.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That any person, or body of persons, offending against the provisions of the foregoing section, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, subject to indictment, and, on conviction, shall be punished by confinement in the common gaol of any county of this State, or by confinement at hard labor in the penitentiary, for a term not exceeding four years, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any person or body of persons, by arbitrary power, or under color of any pretended rule, ordinance, law, or custom, of said nation, to prevent, or offer to prevent, or deter any Indian, head man, chief, or warrior, of said nation, residing within the chartered limits of this State, from selling or ceding to the United States, for the use of Georgia, the whole or any part of said territory, or to prevent, or offer to prevent, any Indian, head man, chief, or warrior, of said nation, residing as aforesaid, from meeting in council or treaty, any commissioner or commissioners on the part of the United States, for any purpose whatever.

"SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That any person or body of persons offending against the provisions of the foregoing section, shall be guilty of high misdemeanor, subject to indictment, and, on conviction, shall be confined at hard labor in the penitentiary, for not less than four, nor longer than six years, at the discretion of the court."

With due deference to the gentleman, I must be permitted to say, that he gives color to his complaint of this part of our act, by omitting in his quotation, all the words necessary to a true description of the offences denounced. The threats, or other means, used to prevent emigration, the prevention, or offer to prevent, or deter, any chief, &c. from selling land to the United States, for the use of Georgia, or meeting commissioners to hold a treaty, or for any other purpose, must be by arbitrary power, or by virtue of some pretended rule, ordinance, law, or custom, of the Cherokee nation. Indictments must contain these words as descriptive of the offences charged, and if the proof does not correspond with the allegations, the acquittal of persons accused necessarily follows. A profligate attorney, anxious to extend the sphere of profitable prosecutions, might attempt to put the gentleman's construction on the act: no judicial tribunal could sustain it—every statesman must condemn it.

One of the complaints of the Senator is founded in fact. The law of Georgia does not admit the testimony of Indians against white persons, except those white persons who reside amongst them. This is the head and front of our offending. The exclusion of Indian testimony against whites is a rule of the Virginia law—a rule adopted by North Carolina and Tennessee. The principle upon which it rests, is found in the laws of Massachusetts and Connecticut; they permit a white man to purge himself, by his own oath, from a charge made against him by Indians. But, sir, this act of Georgia was not necessary to exclude Indians as witnesses from our courts of justice. By the common law of the States they are not witnesses. Prior to 1770, the testimony of an Indian was not admitted against a slave. By a statute of that date they were. As witnesses against even free persons of color, they could not be heard, from the settlement of Georgia to the present hour. Nor is this the prejudice of Georgia only. Indians not converted to Christianity are not witnesses in any court of justice in either of the States, unless specially admitted as such by statute.

I hazard this assertion on the presumption that the rule of the English common law prevails in all the States. The rule of the common law is, any person who believes in a future state of rewards and punishments, understands the nature of an oath, knows the temporal, and believes in the future punishment of perjury, and to whom an oath can be administered, is a competent witness in a court of justice in causes civil and criminal. I will suppose a case to illustrate the application of this rule to Indians, and will, with the permission of the Senator, lay the scene in New Jersey. Imagine, sir, a crime of the deepest dye committed in sight of Trenton or Princeton. The perpetrator is unseen by mortal eye—is about to escape suspicion, when Providence brings upon him one hundred Cherokees, who seize and deliver him up to justice. His criminality can be established by the Cherokees, and by them only. He is indicted—arraigned—pleads—and a jury is charged with his cause. The Cherokees, in succession, are presented to testify. The counsel for the accused demands the previous inquiry into their religious opinions. The judge interrogates each: "Do you believe that you will be punished or rewarded after you die, for the acts done in this life?" "I don't know—I hope so." "Do you understand the obligations of an oath?" "I don't know any thing about an oath—what is it?" "Do you know that you will be punished by us if you do not tell the truth about that man?" "I do not understand your customs." Admitting the examination to be sufficient, the creed of the party, his belief in a Great Spirit, and his hope of future life strong enough to permit him to testify, by what sign will you require him to call down upon him the vengeance of Heaven, if he swears from the truth? He must be sworn. The manner of pledging himself to Heaven is indifferent, but it must be done in some form. Desire the Cherokee to raise his hand before God and affirm—he is unconscious of your meaning, and feels no solemnity in the act. Present him the sacred volume; he does not believe in it. Offer him the cross: he has no veneration for it. Lay before him the Koran: he sees it for the first time. Even the oath of the Highlander, upon the naked dirk, has no power over the savage mind. With some diligence I have sought to learn how the sanction of the wild belief of the Indians could be obtained to the statements made by them. The late Colonel Hawkins gave all the information he possessed—it was imperfect and unsatisfactory to his own mind. When Indian councils are to be held, the chiefs who are called to it prepare themselves by fasting, and the use of the black drink, for the solemn meeting. After due preparation, the council fire is lit up, and the business of the meeting is transacted. What is said in council is supposed to be in the immediate presence of the Great Spirit, who will punish those who forget their obligations to truth and to the tribe. No Indian council fire can be lit up in our courts of justice: no purification be ordered to prepare Indians to testify under the sanctions of their wild belief. Their testimony must be rejected, because it is impossible to present to them any symbol by which they feel themselves devoted to eternal punishment,

The Indians.

if their evidence should be falsely given. The one hundred Cherokees, in the case supposed, present when the crime was committed in New Jersey, would, in succession, be rejected, and the criminal acquitted for want of evidence of his guilt. Yet, sir, the Senator from New Jersey considers the Georgia law as the ne plus ultra of injustice—as oppressive and grinding, and intended to drive the Cherokees from the State. That we desire the Indians to remove, is certain. We believe their removal will be beneficial to us and to themselves. That we design to compel them by unjust legislation is not true—there is not a shadow of evidence of such intention. This provision of our law, as it now stands, proves the contrary. Excluded by the existing law of the State from being witnesses, when the act of 1829 was passed, abrogating the Cherokee government and usages, it was thought just to protect the Indians by changing that law. As little apprehension was entertained of the necessity of Indian testimony against any white persons, but those residing amongst them, the excluding law was altered only as it related to the white residents in the nation. The law, as it is, is a relaxation of the former rule. As such, it demonstrates the folly of the charge, that it was intended to oppress the Indians. Horrible sufferings by the Indians from the atrocities of the whites, without the possibility of punishing the offenders, are anticipated from this law. These gloomy anticipations need not torture the Senator's mind. Such atrocities have not been committed by the whites upon their red neighbors under the old, there is not the most remote danger to the Indians under the new rule.

The honorable Senator professes to believe, and no doubt is sincere, that the preservation of the Cherokee government is important to the improvement of the tribe, and that the advancement of the Indians in the arts of civilized life will be more rapid under their own usages than under the laws of a State. The present condition of the tribe is not well understood. All agree that, by the combined effect of intermarriages with the whites and of slavery, the Cherokees in the South and those in the West are in advance of all the other tribes in their progress towards refinement. The Arkansas Cherokees claim to be first. That claim is contested by their brethren. The great man of the tribe, the inventor of their alphabet, Guess—the Calamus of his day—and people, have emigrated to the West. So strong is the desire of other Cherokees to follow, that expatriation is forbidden under severe penalties, by the new government of Echota. These circumstances must create some doubts in the mind of the Senator of the prudence of his efforts to keep the Cherokees on this side of the Mississippi. By what process of reasoning he persuades himself that the Cherokee laws are more civilizing than the laws of a State he has not explained.

His zeal cannot be exerted in favor of the Indian government: it is for the benefit of the race. Their government is of no consequence, except as it operates to improve their condition—moral, physical, and intellectual. But, sir, the gentleman is deceived by the too favorable representations of the missionaries, and other interested persons, as to the true condition of the Indians, and as to the effects of their new government. He believes every thing stated by the persons favorable to the Cherokees, and distrusts all statements, by whom or whenever made, unfavorable to them. In addition to the printed evidence that the flattering accounts of the civilization of the tribe are exaggerated, and too highly colored, I hold in my hand a letter from a most respectable citizen of Alabama, to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I will not read it; it is too strong to be read aloud before this assembly. I will send it to the Senator, with this warning: if he is determined, in defiance of reason, to hold fast to his faith in Cherokee civilization and Christianity, he must cover his eyes with an Indian flap. Independent of this evidence, the Cherokee usages, laws, and ordinances, with which the Senator seems to be so desperately enamoured, for the preservation of which he is ready to hazard the safety of the Union, by a trial of strength between the United States and all the Southern and some of the Western States, where there are Indians, might serve to give him clear views of the civilization of the Indians, and the wisdom of the Cherokee government. Some of these usages, laws, and ordinances, merit a brief notice.

Polygamy is allowed by usage—by ordinance, white men are forbidden to have but one wife, and it is recommended that all others should also have but one. A prohibition to an Indian of more than one wife would have shocked their prejudices too much; a recommendation was, therefore, substituted. Does the usage, corrected as it is, meet the Senator's approbation?

"If a man overtakes a horse thief, and his anger is very great, he may put the thief to death—the death is to remain on the conscience of the murderer—no satisfaction is to be claimed for the offence." Is this provision suited to the gentleman's ideas of the regular administration of public justice?

"An assault, with intent to commit murder, rape, or robbery, is punished by such fine as shall be assessed by a jury, not exceeding fifty dollars, and by such corporeal punishment as the jury may inflict, not exceeding fifty stripes, on the bare back." Are the penalties awarded adequate to the atrocity of these offences?

The moral discriminations in the Cherokee laws will be fully understood, by comparing these with ordinances of a recent date.

All persons who shall leave their houses, farms, or other improvements, and bind themselves to emigrate, by enrolment or otherwise, with intent to remove out of the nation, as emigrants to another country, forfeit all right to the houses, farms, or other improvements, so left.

All persons who enrol for emigration, under the authority of the United States, forfeit their citizenship. The sale of improvements to any person so enrolled, is punished by fine, not less than one, or more than two thousand dollars, and by one hundred lashes; the convicted person being thereafter ineligible to any office of honor, profit, or trust, in the nation. Indians enrolled for emigration, were declared to be intruders, and liable to punishment, at the discretion of the principal Chief, if they did not remove within fifteen days after the 31st of October, 1829.

For the preservation of ordinances, thus marked, the honorable gentleman invokes the agency of the Senate; condemns the State of Georgia, and, without having clearly comprehended, censures her laws. It is for a Government interfering, by severe penalties, with the personal rights of its people, to remain or to remove at their pleasure; to sell or to retain their improvements at discretion, that his unabated zeal has been exerted. It is for this Government, he desires to compel the President to make war upon a State. For disputing its authority and annulling its laws, he calls down upon Georgia the thunders of Divine wrath. Verily, sir, it requires the exercise of some forbearance, to dismiss this subject without further remarks upon the opinions and sentiments which the gentleman has expressed. For his misapplied, and, if successful, mischievous efforts, I trust he will receive the appropriate reward; that not the poor Cherokees who remove to the West, only, may look back to bless him, but that he may receive the blessings of all the Cherokees, of those who remain and those who remove. For his prejudiced examination, and unjust condemnation of our cause, our curses will not follow him. Charitably believing in the purity of his motives, giving him credit for honest but mistaken zeal, if unable to correct, we can at least pardon his errors.

FRIDAY, APRIL 16, 1830.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for examinations and surveys, and also for certain works of internal improvement, with the amendments.

Mr. MCKINLEY then moved to amend the amendment in the first section, in the following words: "For completing the surveys for a canal, to connect the waters of the Atlantic with the Gulf of Mexico, ten thousand dollars," by adding the following words: "And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, to cause a detailed report to be made, showing the practicability or impracticability of making a ship or other canal, and the reasons for either, with an estimate showing the probable expense and advantage of such canal as may be considered practicable."

Mr. MCKINLEY said his object in moving this amendment, was to obtain some practical results from the making of these surveys; and that the Secretary of War and the Engineer officers might be given to understand, that, when surveys were made, something was to be done in consequence. He wished to know whether any practical good was to result from all the expense of making examinations and surveys.

Mr. MCKINLEY'S amendment to the amendment having been agreed to;

After some remarks from Mr. JOHNSTON, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; when, the first and second amendments having been concurred in,

Mr. McLEAN moved to amend the third amendment by adding an appropriation of thirty-two thousand dollars for the purpose of opening, grading, and bridging the continuation of the Cumberland road from St. Louis to Jefferson city, in the State of Missouri; and an appropriation of forty thousand dollars, instead of twenty thousand dollars for the purpose of opening, grading, and bridging the same road in the State of Illinois.

On the question to concur in the third amendment, as amended, as follows:

At the end of the bill insert—

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of opening, grading, and making the Cumberland road, westwardly of Zanesville, in the State of Ohio; and that the sum of sixty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of opening, grading, and bridging the Cumberland road, in the State of Indiana, commencing at Indianapolis, and progressing with the work to the eastern and western boundaries of said State; and that the sum of forty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of opening, grading, and bridging the Cumberland road, in the State of Illinois; that the sum of thirty-two thousand four hundred dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of opening, grading, and bridging the continuation of the same road from St. Louis to Jefferson city, in the State of Missouri; which said sums shall be paid out of any money not otherwise appropriated, and replaced out of the fund reserved for laying out and making roads, under the direction of Congress, for the several acts passed for the admission of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the immediate accomplishment of these objects, the superintendents heretofore appointed, or hereafter to be appointed, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, shall, under the direction of the President of the United States, faithfully execute the work, and disburse the money, giving bond and security as he shall direct, and receiving such compensation as, in his opinion, shall be equitable and just, not exceeding to each that heretofore allowed by law to the superintendent of the Cumberland road, in the State of Ohio."

It was determined in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Bibb, Burnett, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dudley, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Knight, McKinley, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, and Willey.—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bell, Brown, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Hayne, Iredell, King, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White, and Woodbury.—16.

Mr. DICKERSON moved further to amend the bill, by striking out in the first section, the words, "for completing the survey and estimate of a canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic with the Gulf of Mexico, ten thousand four hundred dollars. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause a detailed report to be made out, showing the practicability of making a ship or other canal, and the reasons for either, with an estimate of the probable expense and advantages of such canal as may be considered practicable." He thought it would be entirely useless; that it would be an unnecessary expense; because it would be recollected that, on this very subject a report had already been presented through the Secretary of War, from the board of engineers, on the subject of this survey; and it appeared to him, from this report, that the work would prove utterly impracticable. His objection then was, that though this survey had already been made, at a very great expense and with very great care he had no doubt, still we had not yet obtained the opinion of the engineers that the experiment would prove successful. Until such opinion was obtained; until the board of engineers should say whether the work was practicable or not practicable, he must vote for the amendment to strike out this section.

Mr. JOHNSTON said that the appropriation now asked was for the express purpose of ascertaining the fact of the practicability or impracticability of the contemplated canal. The object of the bill [said Mr. J.] was to get information; and how then could information be obtained, unless the bill passed making an appropriation to ascertain the practicability of opening a ship channel or a canal? Some progress had already been made. The engineers had gone on the route; had ascertained the impracticability of making a channel through the St. Mary's, and had then proceeded to the St. John's, where he was satisfied that the project would be successful. The information we now have [said Mr. J.] is, that a channel is practicable, though we have no information of the cost or of the character of the soil to be excavated. The character of the soil itself might be such as to render the attempt impracticable. It was on these last points that information was desirable. When the reports were made, the subject would arise before Congress, whether the work would or would not be worthy of cost.

Mr. HOLMES considered the part of the bill proposed to be stricken out the best part of it. All the rest of the bill was framed for the benefit of the West, while this part was intended to benefit the South and the East as well as the West. He looked upon the measure contemplated to be one of the utmost importance to the Eastern States, and indeed to the commerce of the whole Union: he would do almost any thing to avoid that dangerous passage round Cape Florida; and he hoped this part of the bill, promising so desirable a result, would be permitted to remain.

Mr. CLAYTON said he was anxious to retain the clause of the bill which this amendment proposed to strike out. He was satisfied that the work was one of great national importance. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] wishes information as to its practicability. Mr. C.

said, for his own part, he was perfectly satisfied of its practicability; and the only question presented to his mind then was, is it expedient to carry the work into effect? On this point he agreed perfectly with the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES] it would connect us with our Western brethren; it would afford important facilities for the transportation of our troops and munitions in time of war; it would prove a source of wealth in times of peace. The question now was, is it valuable? Is it practicable? He was entirely willing to appropriate ten thousand dollars to ascertain its practicability; of its value he had no doubt.

Mr. FORSYTH had always been in favor of the project of a canal through the Territory of Florida, and, did he believe that the passage of this bill would accomplish so desirable a result, he would give it his cordial support. He had had the honor to present a petition on the subject to the National Legislature, from the town of St. Mary's in Georgia, in which the importance and utility of a canal through the Territory of Florida to the Gulf of Mexico were fully developed. In this bill the appropriation was not for ascertaining the practicability of making a canal, but for its location; for a former appropriation had been expended in ascertaining its practicability. The reports already received sustained one or the other of two facts; whether it were practicable or impracticable to make a canal. Of the two routes examined by the engineers, one had been pronounced suitable for a canal, the other not so. Now, notwithstanding the reports of the officers of the engineer corps, he [Mr. F.] was satisfied, from the information he had received, that there was no possibility of making a canal through either of the routes that had been examined. The first route, by the St. Mary's river, had been abandoned by the engineers; and the practicability of the second route, the one recommended by them, to say nothing as to distance, depended upon the solving of the problem whether water for a canal could be supplied by filtration. He, for his part, did not think this could be depended on; he would prefer cutting the canal a little higher up, where a more plentiful supply of water could be obtained, though the route would be somewhat longer. Respecting the cost, the board of engineers was not now prepared to make an estimate; the appropriation heretofore made by Congress had been exhausted in examinations as to the practicability of cutting a canal through a country as yet but partially known; and, in their own opinions, the practicability of the question had been settled. If the Senate agreed with them, they ought to go on: for after an expenditure of so much money, the Senate ought not to stop, because Congress was in a manner pledged to perform the work. As he, however, seriously doubted whether a canal, of twenty-five miles in length, could be supplied with water by filtration, he should vote against that part of the bill; though he trusted that the Senate would make the appropriation, if it coincided in opinion with the corps of engineers.

Mr. DICKERSON said he would be as glad to vote for any appropriation that would prove advantageous to the country at large, as any other gentleman in that Senate; but, even if the canal should be found practicable, he doubted the expediency of cutting it, because [said Mr. D.] we all know that, when piracy raged on our southern coast to the greatest extent, insurances could be effected at New York, at one and a half per cent. But, sir, [said Mr. D.] the engineers who had already surveyed the route of this canal, in their report to the Secretary at War, say, that twenty-five miles in one route, and forty-five miles in another, must depend entirely, for that all-important element, water, on filtration. Why, sir, [said Mr. D.] from the information already obtained, I am fully and thoroughly convinced of the impracticability, or rather the uselessness, of the contemplated canal; but if gentlemen are disposed to make another appropriation: for another experiment, let them select another route.

Mr. HENDRICKS thought it would be admitted by every Senator that the practicability of constructing this canal was not doubted by the corps of engineers. They stated the data on which they had made their calculations, and gave the character of the substrata of earth it would be necessary to operate on. One route, the one proposed by them, required, for twenty-five miles, a supply of water by the process of filtration, but this was for the canal, and not for lockage; the ponds at the summit level being amply sufficient for that purpose. The engineers say, in a page of the report not read by the gentleman from Georgia, that there were two ponds sufficient to furnish a supply of water for the locks, and that filtration must be depended on for water for the bed of the canal; and that the foundation being of a rocky and sandy nature, the process of filtration will be greatly facilitated. They moreover state that, by the sinking of shafts, it can easily be ascertained whether filtration will be successful. Now, in his [Mr. HENDRICKS'] opinion, the sinking of shafts was absolutely necessary for ascertaining the practicability of procuring the requisite supply of water. The engineers say they may be mistaken; but, if they are mistaken, we cannot know that they are so, without making the appropriation; for the shafts must be sunk for the purpose of determining the substrata, and otherwise testing the practicability of the scheme. He should vote for a farther experiment, as he was satisfied of the vast importance and utility of the measure.

Mr. JOHNSTON said, if this were an appropriation for commencing a canal, then the inquiry alluded to by the gentleman from New Jersey would be highly proper and necessary; but, sir, said he, we have such information as is necessary to justify the appropriation, which this amendment proposes to strike out. A farther reconnaissance of the ground, through which this canal is to pass, is absolutely necessary, in order to ascertain the permanent utility of the work, after it shall have been carried into effect. We are not [said Mr. J.] asking an appropriation for the purpose of finding out the practicability of the canal: nor yet for commencing the work; the one has already been ascertained, and the other is not, at this time, desired; but we want to ascertain a fact, involved in a contingency set forth in the report of the Board of Engineers, and this fact was necessary before Congress would incur the great expense of engaging in the work. He was not particular about the location of the canal, whether higher up or lower down; but, for his own part, he was satisfied of the great importance of the work, and the money already expended in making surveys would be thrown away, unless another summer was devoted to a more general reconnaissance, and a more minute examination of the soil. He thought that the information to be derived from these examinations extremely desirable, before any steps were taken to commence the work. He was of opinion, from the facts stated in the report of the survey that has already been made, that the work was not only practicable, but would be found of the highest utility. The great difficulty arose from the character of the soil; upon this, entirely, the permanent utility of the canal depended. We have seen, in the Delaware and Chesapeake, and some other canals, the injurious consequences of a want of information as to the character of the soil through which they pass. It was therefore necessary to ascertain the nature of the soil of the different substrata through which this canal is to run.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said that when the Senate came to consider the question of striking out this part of the bill, they were to determine whether they will or will not carry on a system of canals most important to our national defence in time of war. When the system was first proposed, it was argued that, for the important points of defence and internal commerce, in time of war, canals ought to commence at New York, and end at the Mississippi, securing the transportation of troops and stores, with a safe commercial intercourse, without the possibility of interruption from an enemy. Part of the system was now already in operation. We have a commerce from the Delaware to Norfolk, which no enemy can molest. He thought that, having already spent ten thousand dollars in ascertaining the practicability of the measure proposed in the bill, Congress ought not now to hesitate, but to go on, regardless of the paltry expense to be farther incurred. In reply to some remarks of Mr. DICKERSON, that, although filtration might be depended on for a supply of water during some seasons of the year, yet, in the dry seasons, the supply would fail from evaporation, Mr. L. would make one or two remarks. He lived in a country similar to the one through which the canal is to run, and in that country, (Louisiana) water was always to be obtained by filtration. The water was found never lower than two feet from the surface. But Mr. L. did not rely on his own information, solely; he had formed his opinion from the report of the head of the engineer corps, [General Barnard] whom Mr. L. eulogised as one of the most able and scientific men in this or any country. Mr. L. deprecated the idea of abandoning an object that promised to be of such vast utility, on account of the trifling expense to be incurred. Talk of a breakwater [said he] at the mouth of the Delaware, and no objection is made to the appropriation of millions; but for the South comparatively nothing was done. When this, the greatest of all national works, calculated to be of the greatest benefit to the commerce of the North and East, as well as of the South, and unequalled for the purposes of commercial safety and cheapness of defence in time of war, the cost of a few thousand dollars is to be counted.

Mr. FOOT thought it a little remarkable that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] should say that the East were opposed to the appropriation of money for the improvement of the South.

[Here Mr. LIVINGSTON explained: he did not charge the East particularly with opposition to improvements in the South.]

Mr. FOOT continued. The Senator from Louisiana did say that we freely gave two millions for the erection of a breakwater at the mouth of the Delaware, but objected to expend ten thousand in the Southern States; and that such a work was as advantageous to the people of the East as to those of the South. If [said Mr. F.] it be as advantageous to the East as to the South, he could see no reason why the East should oppose it. For his own part, he would vote against striking out the section. He was willing to make the experiment, though he did not believe that the work would turn out practicable; it depended entirely on an isolated contingency—alluvial soil.

Mr. LIVINGSTON asked for the ayes and noes on the question, which were ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON said the question now to be decided was, whether we will appropriate ten thousand dollars for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of the contemplated canal. The gentleman from Louisiana says that nothing will be done for the Southern States. Mr. C. repelled this assertion, and observed that, as he understood the gentleman from New-Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON] his objection to the appropriation was founded upon the soil, or rather the supposed impracticability of the undertaking, and not from sectional motives. Mr. C. made no such objections. He thought it a work of great national importance to the East, South, and West, and exceeded by none in the Union.

Mr. FORSYTH said, the gentleman from Delaware seemed to think that the practicability of making the canal depended upon the cost. Now, the practicability of making a canal depended upon the nature of the country; the propriety of making the appropriation was a question of amount. No one doubted that the canal could be made, if an adequate supply of water could be obtained. He regretted that he did not agree in opinion with the Board of Engineers, as he was decidedly friendly to the work; but he was convinced that the hope of obtaining water by filtration was futile in the extreme. In the beginning of the year, water could be obtained by that process in abundance: but when the dry season commenced, the evaporation was such that water could only be found at a distance of sixteen feet; even the wells were left dry. Mr. F. was not going to place his opinion in opposition to that of the gentleman at the head of the engineer corps: he had the highest respect for his talents and scientific attainments; and, so far as that gentleman's professional knowledge extended, he would yield to him; but, in matters where his own observation was sufficient to form an opinion, he would yield to no one. Besides, the chief engineer did not go on the ground; he was obliged, in making up his reports, to get the principal part of his information, as to the face of the country, from an ignorant and sparse population. In answer to the remarks as to the money expended on Internal Improvements in the South, he would say that the South had been hardly dealt with. It was well known that the gentlemen who represented that section of the country had constitutional scruples, which prevented them from voting for appropriations for works of Internal Improvement. The gentlemen in the majority, who advocate such measures, had no such scruples. Why, then, did they not sometimes extend their bounty to the South? Of all the various works of Internal Improvement, on which millions had been expended, where were any for the benefit of the South? The money of the Government had been poured in one continued stream on more favored sections of the Union, while the South had been entirely neglected. All the gentlemen who were in favor of such measures professed their willingness to vote for appropriations for Internal Improvements in the South, but they waited to be solicited to do so by the Southern members, and they will consider solicitation as an abandonment of principle. How many appropriations, he would ask, had been made for the South? For the State of Georgia, not a dollar. An application was made to the General Government for the expenditure of a small sum in Georgia, for an object deemed of importance to her, and the President refused, on the ground that no officer of the engineer corps could be spared, and that the money had already been expended on objects of greater importance. Mr. F. trusted that the time would come when the Southern States would see their true interests, and demand of Congress, if the principle must be carried on, their full share of the money expended.

Mr. JOHNSTON said, it was true, little was done for the South, by way of appropriations for Internal Improvements; but that did not arise from any hostility on the part of the East to the South, but from the fact that the South would not only not ask, but even not receive, appropriations for Internal Improvements. He observed that appropriations had been made for every object in the South, for which they had been asked; and the East expressed pleasure in making such appropriations; but it was well known that Congress never made appropriations, unless on the application of a State, a Committee, or a Representative. When an appropriation is asked by the South, it will be cheerfully granted. There is, at present, [said Mr. J.] a proposition before Congress for a subscription to stock in a rail-road company in the South; but, when it comes up for consideration, we may perhaps be told that it is unconstitutional and unjust to grant it.

Mr. KING observed, that no one could have a greater inclination than himself to favor the plan of a canal from the Atlantic to the Gulf of Mexico, by which a most dangerous navigation would be avoided. He had voted for the survey, under the hope that a channel might be made for vessels which navigate the ocean; but, from examination of the report, his mind had been brought to the conclusion that this was wholly impracticable. The country proposed to be canalised was not like that bordering on the Mississippi, where, if a hole is sunk two feet deep, it is immediately filled with water; but the canal is to be one hundred and thirty feet above the level of the sea, the water to be supplied by filtration, and that in such small quantities as to make a navigation but for boats of small burthen. Was any gentleman willing to make an appropriation to ascertain the practicability of cutting a canal through which sea vessels cannot pass? For his part, he was most favorably disposed towards the measure; the section of country he immediately represented was deeply interested in the subject; and, could he believe that any practical good would result from making the appropriation, he should unhesitatingly vote for it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON deprecated the opposition which arose from the dimensions of the canal. He thought that, in times of war, vessels drawing seven feet water would be as useful as those drawing fifteen. Some wanted a canal ten feet deep, some seven, and some five; and, unless they obtained such as they wanted, they would vote against all. This [said Mr. L.] is not my plan. One gentleman says he will vote against this question, though he would not vote for it in a different shape. But how is it to be known whether that other will be presented us? And, if another question were presented us, those who voted for this would, perhaps, object to vote for the other. If the friends of Internal Improvement wished that system to prosper; if they wished it to become the permanent policy of the country, they must make the benefits resulting from it reciprocal; otherwise, it must fail; he predicted that it would be utterly abandoned.

After some further observations from Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. CHAMBERS said he had paid some attention to this subject, and it appeared to him that the objections urged to the section under debate were groundless. He would beg leave to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia, and others who objected to the appropriation, to the report of the Secretary at War on this subject, from which it appeared, that, in order to complete the survey, it was necessary to sink shafts in part of the route of the canal, and some other measures adopted, in order to ascertain if twenty-five miles could be supplied with water by percolation. On this point the scientific gentlemen who had made the survey, appeared to doubt, and he thought that means ought to be afforded for solving these doubts. He was willing to make the experiment, and to suffer the bill to pass in its present shape.

The question was then taken on striking out the amendment, and it was decided in the negative—Yeas 15, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, King, Smith, of S. C., Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Burnett, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dudley, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Knight, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Webster, Willey—31.

Mr. TYLER then said that he did not rise to make a speech against the bill. The time for that had, he feared, gone by. He rose to state a fact, to show how this Government acted. Commencing with a principle narrow and restricted, it served as an apology for unlimited and unrestrained action; let it put out once to sea, and whatever port it held in view at the time, it very soon found itself at large upon the ocean, and visited in its course every coast and harbor. So in reference to this road. The Government started upon the principle of devoting to the construction of this road three per cent. arising out of the sales of the public lands lying in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and in what had it terminated? He desired to call the attention of the Senate to the facts. The whole amount of sales of the public lands lying in the State of Indiana, amounted the last year to four hundred and ninety-two thousand dollars. Now this bill appropriated two hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred dollars, and that of last year amounted to two hundred and twenty thousand dollars; adding these two sums together, with the commissions chargeable on the sales, and there is left the paltry sum of fifteen thousand dollars to flow into the treasury. Thus then it appeared that, for this single road, two years of appropriations have nearly consumed the amount arising from the last year's sales of land in one of the most flourishing of the new States. He had made this statement, and submitted it to the Senate without comment.

Mr. HENDRICKS replied, that the gentleman from Virginia had made an estimate showing that the sales of lands in Indiana had amounted in the last year to four hundred and ninety-two thousand dollars, the appropriation of this year to two hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred dollars, and the appropriations of the last year to two hundred and twenty thousand dollars. Now, he would only remark, how obviously unfair this statement was. The gentleman contrasted the receipts from the sales of public lands for one year in one State, with the amount expended on works of internal improvement in four States in two years.

The question was then taken, and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

THE INDIANS.

The Senate resumed, as the unfinished business, the bill providing for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in the United States, and their removal beyond the Mississippi, when

Mr. SPRAGUE addressed the Senate at length against the bill, and in reply to Mr. FORSYTH; and occupied the floor to a late hour.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1830.

The Senate having resumed the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians;

Mr. SPRAGUE concluded his remarks in reply to Mr. FORSYTH and Mr. WHITE, as follows:

The gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. FORSYTH) has indulged in a wide range of remark in defence of his State, against imputations which he supposed to have been elsewhere cast upon her. This course may have been very proper in him—I fully appreciate the motive which induced it. But I have no occasion to follow him; I have no wish to derogate in the least from the character of Georgia, but rather that it should be as elevated as her most devoted sons can desire. I shall speak of her so far only as may seem necessary to the free discussion of the subject before us.

This bill and amendment, and the discussion which they have produced, [said Mr. S.] involve the question of the rights and duties of the United States, with respect to the Indian tribes generally, but more especially the Cherokees. With that people we have not less than fifteen treaties; the first made in the year 1785, and the last in 1819.

By several of these treaties, we have unequivocally guaranteed to them that they shall forever enjoy—

1st. Their separate existence, as a political community.
2d. Undisturbed possession and full enjoyment of their lands, within certain boundaries, which are duly defined and fully described.

3d. The protection of the United States against all interference with, or encroachments upon, their rights, by any people, State, or nation.

For these promises, on our part, we received ample consideration—

By the restoration and establishing of peace.

By large cessions of territory.

By the promise on their part to treat with no other State or nation, and other important stipulations.

These treaties were made with all the forms and solemnities which could give them force and efficacy; by commissioners, duly appointed with full power; ratified by the Senate; confirmed by the President; and announced to the world, by his proclamation, as the binding compact of the nation, and the supreme law of the land.

The Cherokees now come to us, and say that their rights are in danger of invasion from the States of Georgia and Alabama; and they ask if we will extend to them the protection we have promised, and perform the engagements we have made. This is the question which they distinctly propound, and which we must unequivocally answer; and we are now discussing what our response shall be. There is a broad line of distinction between the claims of Georgia, and those of Alabama and Mississippi, which seems heretofore to have been unobserved, but which I shall endeavor to keep in view. Let us first inquire what our duties are with respect to Georgia; for if her pretensions are unfounded, those of Alabama and Mississippi fall of course. It is not necessary to determine whether the Indians have just grounds for their apprehensions or not, because the question is whether, if the rights secured to them by our treaties should, at some future day, be invaded, we will perform our engagements? But have they not some cause for their present alarm? In December, 1827, a committee of the Legislature of Georgia made a report, accompanied by sundry resolutions, which were accepted by both branches, and the resolutions also received the approval of the Governor. In the report we find the following language, respecting the territory of the Cherokees: "The lands in question belong to Georgia—she must and she will have them." And in the resolutions, the following:

"Resolved, That all the lands appropriated and unappropriated, which lie within the conventional limits of Georgia, belong to her absolutely; that the title is in her; that the Indians are tenants at her will; that she may at any time she pleases, determine that tenancy by taking possession of the premises, and Georgia has the right to extend her own authority and laws over the whole territory.

"Resolved, That Georgia entertains for the General Government so high a regard, and is so solicitous to do no act that can disturb or tend to disturb the public tranquillity, that she will not attempt to enforce her rights by violence, until all other means of redress fail."

"Resolved, That, to avoid a catastrophe which none would more sincerely deplore than ourselves, we make this solemn appeal to the United States, &c.

It is thus asserted as the right, and avowed as the determination, of Georgia, to exercise absolute power over the Cherokees, and to take their land at all hazards—even by violence, if other means should fail. The gentleman from that State [Mr. FORSYTH] observed, in the commencement of his speech, that he felt himself bound in conscience to relieve his friend from New Jersey from all apprehensions of a violation of the faith of the nation, by demonstrating that the claims of Georgia were supported by treaties. And he proceeded to do so in language so strong, and in tones so triumphant, as to make an evident impression upon members of the Senate. Let us deliberately examine his argument.

The first treaty referred to was that of Galphinton, in 1785, by which certain concessions were made to Georgia. But that was by the Creeks, and by them only, and had no relation to the Cherokees.

Mr. FORSYTH explained, he had remarked upon that treaty in answer to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN] and not as bearing upon the rights of the Cherokees.

Mr. SPRAGUE resumed, he was glad to receive the gentleman's explanation; it precluded the necessity of any further remark upon that topic.

The treaty next cited was that of Dewitt's corner, A. D. 1777, between South Carolina, Georgia, and the Cherokees, by which the latter acknowledged that a portion of their country, extending as far as the Unacaye mountain had been conquered, and they made a cession of the same by defined boundaries, to South Carolina, and to her only. The conquered and ceded territory lies wholly within that State; and it is not now, and has not been for at least one generation, either claimed or occupied by the Indians. What right can that confer on Georgia, to lands now owned and possessed by the Cherokees?

The next position was, that the right of his State was derived under the ninth article of the treaty of Hopewell, made between the United States and the Cherokees, in November, 1785; by which they gave to the United States the right of managing all their affairs. To this Georgia was no party. But the gentleman contends that the United States transferred all their power and claims, under the treaty, to that State, by virtue of the compact of 1802; and that we now cannot interfere with her pretensions. The clause in the compact, which is relied upon, is this: the United States "cede whatever claim, right, or title, they may have to the jurisdiction or soil of any lands lying" within the limits of Georgia.

Does this relinquishment of the right of the United States to the soil and jurisdiction of the lands purport to transfer a pre-existing treaty with the Indians? Was it so intended? And if it had been, is the power which the treaty confers to legislate for their benefit, in its nature transferable? The article is in these words: "For the benefit and comfort of the Indians, and for the prevention of injuries and oppressions on the part of the citizens or Indians, the United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the trade with the Indians and managing all their affairs, in such manner as they think proper." The power given is strictly personal and fiduciary; to be exercised according to our judgment upon future events, and for their benefit. Can even a guardian transfer his rights and duties at pleasure? By the constitution, the fundamental compact, Georgia has given to the United States the right to legislate, in certain cases, over her citizens, for their benefit; for example, to organize, arm, discipline, and call forth her militia. Can the United States transfer this right to South Carolina, or any other sovereign?

The express words of the article require this right to be exercised by the United States "in Congress assembled." Can we, without the consent of the other party, strike out these words, and insert the Legislature of Georgia?

Again, in order to see that this power is properly exercised, the thirteenth article secures to the Cherokees "the right to send a deputy of their choice, whenever they think fit, to Congress." Shall he come here to watch over the legislation at Milledgeville?

But, if this power was in its nature transferable, it must be so subject to the restrictions and limitations in the treaty contained; among which are the following:

1st. The Cherokees shall continue to exist as a distinct political community, under the protection of the United States.

2d. That they shall enjoy the undisturbed possession of their lands.

3d. That the power to manage "their affairs" shall be exercised "for the benefit and comfort of the Indians, and for the prevention of injuries and oppressions."

Did this give to the United States the right to drive them from all their lands? or to destroy the Cherokee nation, to strike it out of existence; and, instead of managing for their "benefit," to annihilate "their affairs" as a body politic? Or could we convey a greater right than we ourselves possessed?

But this is not all. The gentleman passed over, in utter silence, a most important event which intervened between the treaty of Hopewell and the compact of 1802. It is the treaty of Holsten, made in 1791; by which the United States again promised the Cherokees to protect them in their rights as a nation; and the seventh article holds the following language: "The United States solemnly guarantee to the Cherokee nation all their lands not hereby ceded." If any right was transferred to Georgia, it would be such only as existed at the time, and subject, of course, to the stipulations of that pre-existing treaty.

The Indians.

There is still another view of this subject. Are we not bound to see that our treaties are fulfilled? The Indians say that their very existence was threatened, and inquire of us, whether we will perform our solemn promise of protection. What shall we answer? That we have conveyed that promise to another! That we have transferred our obligation to Georgia! have given her a license to violate our treaties! May they not reply, that the very purpose for which they purchased our guarantee, and the protection of the strong arm of our Government, was to secure them against the encroachments of their white neighbors in that State?

The compact of 1802, which has been so much insisted upon, was made between the United States and Georgia. The Cherokees were not parties, nor even assented to it. Of course it could not impair their rights, or confer upon others any claim against them. If I [said Mr. S.] should promise the gentleman that I would obtain your farm and convey it to him, would that divest your title, or authorize either of us to wrest it from you by force? The compact itself expressly recognized "the Indian title," and the United States were to extinguish it only when it could be done "peaceably" and on "reasonable terms."

The gentleman having, as he supposed, fully sustained the treaty claims of Georgia, by the arguments upon which I have remarked, triumphantly exclaimed, "I will have my bond; I will have my pound of flesh." A most unfortunate allusion, sir, and one which I should not have been unkind enough to make. He will have his pound of quivering flesh, taken from nearest the heart of the living man! But he will take it without one drop of blood;

—"Ay—there's the rub,"

For, in the cutting of that pound of flesh,
What human blood shall flow—"must give us pause."

The fend-like Shylock himself could not take the penalty of his bond, because "no jot of blood" was given. And none is given here, but the express contrary—"peaceably"—"peaceably"—and "upon reasonable terms," too, is the emphatic language. But against whom does the gentleman make his claim—the Indians? Does he hold their bond? No, they hold ours: they now present it to us, and demand its performance; and, "till he can rail the seal from off that bond," he cannot absolve us from its obligations. He declares that he will have the terms of his compact fulfilled to "the twentieth part of one poor scruple," and to the division of a hair. So be it; and let the Indians too have their guarantied rights maintained with equal scrupulosity.

The honorable Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. WILKINSON] conceded that the United States had repeatedly pledged their faith to the Cherokees to interfere for their protection, but contended that we ought not to perform these stipulations of our treaties because of the conflicting claims of Georgia. He laid down this proposition, that if the United States had come into engagements inconsistent with each other, so that it was impossible to keep both, that that which was prior in point of time should be specifically performed, and ample compensation be made for the breach of the other. To this position I freely assent; and upon this basis will rest the argument. It is incumbent, then, upon the honorable chairman to show, in the first place, that our obligations to Georgia are incompatible with our treaties; and in the next place, that they are of prior date. This he, and two gentlemen who followed him in the debate, [Messrs. McKINLEY and FORTY] have attempted to do. Their argument is, that, before the Revolution, Great Britain had jurisdiction over the aborigines, and the sole right of treating with them, and that this power was wrested from her by conquest during the war, and forever abandoned by the treaty of peace, in 1783.

I would first observe that, if it was obtained by conquest, it belonged to the conquerors. And who were the conquerors? The United States; who were also a party to the treaty of peace. Upon this ground it was, that New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and other States, so strongly insisted that the Crown lands, which had been acquired by the common arm and at the common expense, belonged of right to the common fund. Their demand, to a great extent, succeeded. The several States yielded to their pretensions by successive cessions; Virginia magnanimously taking the lead. But I shall not dwell upon this; for I mean, as far as possible, to avoid all debatable ground. Concede, then, for the present, that when Georgia became independent, in 1776, she at once succeeded to all the pre-existing rights of Great Britain over the unmeasured forests within her chartered limits. What was that right? Gentlemen say it was the right of discovery. Discovery, sir, confers no claim or right against the natives, the persons discovered, but only as between discoverers. It is said that the rights derived from this source were established and defined in Europe, upon the first discovery of this country. True, but it was by the mutual understanding and agreement of the nations of that continent only, in order to regulate their conduct among themselves. To prevent conflict and collision, it was tacitly agreed that the Sovereign who should find a country theretofore unknown should have the exclusive right to the benefits of the discovery, and should be permitted, without interference, to conduct toward the aboriginal inhabitants according to his conscience and his ability. He had, therefore, as against discovering nations who had assented to the arrangement, a conventional right to wage war and conquer the natives, and subject them to his sway. It is this right to which it is contended that Georgia succeeded upon the declaration of independence. Let it be so considered; and that in the war which she should wage to subjugate the Indians, no other state or nation could rightfully interfere. But the people attacked had a right to resist. They surely were under no obligation to acquiesce in the proposed subjugation. Suppose, then, that they should happen to be too strong for their assailants; that they should roll back the tide of war—the hunters should be hunted—that those who came to conquer should be in danger of being conquered; and, in such an emergency, the people of Georgia should call upon another State, Virginia, for example, for protection and defence. Georgia would thus have waived her conventional right to exclude all others from her limits, and Virginia would, at her request, become a party to the war. Would not Virginia, then, have the right to make peace for the security of her own citizens, and must she not be bound by its terms? Was France bound by her treaty of alliance with us during the Revolution? Yet her interference was without the consent of Great Britain, the discoverer. Are the United States now bound by their treaties with the States of South America?

But further: what if Georgia, in order to induce her neighbors to come in for her defence, had expressly agreed, beforehand, that Virginia should have the sole power of conducting the war, and concluding the peace; would not both States be bound by the treaty of peace thereupon made by Virginia? To proceed one step farther; suppose that this arrangement between the two States, instead of being occasional, should be established by a permanent compact; and that, in order to obtain the aid and protection of Virginia, at all times, against the attacks of the Indians, Georgia should agree that she never would herself provoke such attacks by making war upon them; and that if it should arise, her more powerful ally should have the entire management of the war, and the exclusive right of agreeing upon the terms of peace and making the treaty; would not such terms be obligatory?

Now, sir, such a compact was actually made by Georgia with Virginia and eleven other States, by the articles of confederation. By the third article, the United States are bound to assist the several States "against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them." And by the ninth article, the U. States have "the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article," and also of "entering into treaties." Here is the express grant. What answer can be given to it? What reason can be assigned, why each State should not be bound by the stipulations of a treaty of peace? Will it be said that we could not have the relations of peace and war with the Indian tribes? Ask the relatives of Braddock and Butler, of Wayne, Harmar, and St. Clair, if Indians can wage war? Consult the crimsoned pages of your history, and they will answer you. Nay, to banish such a suggestion forever, the same ninth article of confederation expressly declares, that by war it means to include contests with Indians; for, by reference, it incorporates into it the 6th article, which is in these words:

"ART. 6. No State shall engage in any war without the consent of the United States, in Congress assembled, unless such State be actually invaded by enemies, or shall have received certain advice of a resolution formed by some nation of Indians to invade such State, and the danger is so imminent as not to admit of a delay till the United States, in Congress assembled, can be consulted."

Here is, also, an unequivocal relinquishment by each State, of the right to make war upon the natives.

During the Revolution, war actually existed between the United States and the Cherokees: it continued to rage after the acknowledgment of our independence by Great Britain. Georgia needed our aid, and received it. The Indians were then powerful and terrific. The United States were desirous of peace; they sought it, and it was established, in 1785, by the treaty of Hopewell, which has been already referred to. It secured to the Cherokees their previous right to exist as a community upon the territory in their previous possession. Such a treaty would have been obligatory upon any State, if the articles of Confederation had never existed; but by that compact a right was expressly given by Georgia herself, to make it, and the United States were in duty bound to exercise that power.

And now I ask, what prior incompatible obligations to Georgia absolve us from its stipulations, or render it impossible to fulfil them?

Such was the power, and such the practice of the Confederation, up to the time of the formation of our present constitution, in September, 1787. No longer previous than the preceding month, we find a committee of Congress, in an able and elaborate report, declaring that the United States cannot interfere in behalf of a State against a tribe of Indians, "but on the principle that Congress shall have the sole direction of the war, and the settling of all the terms of peace with such Indian tribe." And this language was addressed particularly to Georgia, by name, and with respect to the Indians within her limits. This was in August.

The constitution was formed in the following September. The sixth article declares, that "treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land," "any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." This was an express confirmation of the treaty of Hopewell, which had been made in November, 1785, less than two years before, and was then in full force. The State of Georgia, with full knowledge that it had been so made, and that it was considered by the United States to be valid and obligatory, voluntarily adopted the constitution, thereby herself most solemnly affirming and establishing that treaty; and, whatever may have been said before, never since that time, until recently, when the present controversy arose, has she in any manner denied its validity, or objected to its being carried into effect. Such is the argument in support of the treaty of Hopewell. I shall leave it by adducing but one other proof of its validity, in the opinion of General Washington, and the Congress of 1778, and their determination to enforce it with scrupulous fidelity. It is the proclamation of September 1, 1778; which declares it to be "the firm determination of Congress to protect the said Cherokees in their rights, according to the true intent and meaning of the said treaty;" and a resolution was adopted, to hold in readiness a sufficient number of troops to enforce that declaration. Under our present constitution, many treaties have been regularly made with the Cherokees. The first was at Holsten, in 1791. The reasons which have been adduced in support of the power to make the treaty of Hopewell are applicable to this with increased force.

The constitution was formed because the Confederation was too weak to answer the purposes of the Union. It substituted a Government in place of a mere Confederacy; conferring upon it additional powers, and farther limiting those of the individual States. By the articles of Confederation, the power of Congress to regulate the trade and manage affairs with the Indians, was subject to a proviso, that "the legislative right of any State, within its own limits, should not be infringed." This restriction is the only ground upon which doubts could ever have been suggested, of the power of the Confederation to enter into treaty stipulations; it gave no countenance, however, to such suggestions, because it was a limitation upon another grant of power, distinct from that of establishing peace and making treaties. But even this restriction is omitted in the constitution, and Congress are empowered to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes in unqualified terms.

The constitution vests in the United States the sole and exclusive power of making war and concluding peace. It expressly provides, that "no State shall engage in war," or, "enter into any treaty." Here is an unequivocal relinquishment of the right of Georgia to make war upon or treat with the Indians. And what is the right which it is said devolved upon her as successor to the sovereignty of Great Britain? The right of a discoverer; that is, a right, as against others, and without their interposition, to attack, and by force subdue the natives; to make war for the purpose of conquest. But Georgia covenants, by our fundamental compact, not to engage in war, for that or any other purpose; to attack no nation or political community.

The United States have the sole power of making peace; this can be done only by treaty. At Hopewell, in 1785, we made a treaty of peace. Open war had raged between the United States and the Cherokees up to that time. They had been the allies of Great Britain, but never had been ours; or in any manner contracted with us. Was not that treaty rightfully made and obligatory?

At Holsten, in 1791, we made a treaty of peace and friendship. It is so denominated on the face of it. It was the termination of an actually existing war; of this there is no doubt. The chairman of the Committee of Indian Affairs, in his written opinion of 1824, states the fact, that war was raging. The gentleman from Georgia says that his State applied to the United States for aid and protection in that war. The report of the Committee of Indian Affairs now before us, declares that the Cherokees waged war against the citizens of the United States. At Holsten we then undeniably made a treaty of peace to terminate an existing war. The authority was express and exclusive.

The Indians.

[SENATE.]

Are not the United States bound—will they abide by it?

The first article is, "There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America, and all the individuals composing the whole Cherokee nation of Indians."

"Article 7. The United States solemnly guarantee to the Cherokee nation all their lands not hereby ceded."

"Article 15. All animosities for past grievances shall henceforth cease, and the contracting parties will carry the foregoing treaty into full execution with all good faith and sincerity."

The question now is, shall we carry these articles into effect with any good faith or sincerity?

Will it be pretended that the United States might make peace, but had no authority to insert such stipulations as those I have quoted. Sir, the substance of these articles are of the essence of a treaty of peace. In every contract each party recognizes the separate existence of the other; and a treaty of peace—not a truce, not an armistice, not a temporary cessation of hostilities, but a treaty of peace—in its nature a permanent, enduring contract, must bind each party to respect the existence of the other, and never to assail or attempt its destruction: must obligate each also to permit the other to continue that existence upon its own territory without attack or violence. To attempt to expel them by force, or subjugate or destroy their separate being, is a violation of the compact of peace, and a renewal of the war. In terminating hostilities, therefore, by the undoubted constitutional power, the United States not only rightfully, but of necessity, embrace such terms as these. Are they not obligatory? I am not contending, [said Mr. S.] that the United States can cede away a part of any State to a foreign nation, as France or Great Britain, for example. That question I do not mean to touch; it is wholly unnecessary. I only say, that they may agree that the other party may continue to exist upon the lands which they have always occupied; may retain that which has ever been their own.

But this is not all. The constitution proceeds still farther, and gives to the United States the general right to make treaties, not merely of peace, but all others. This power is not only clearly and positively conferred on the Union, but expressly inhibited to its several members. It has been repeatedly and continually exercised in relation to the Indian tribes within the United States, and that by the acquiescence and assent of Georgia herself.

I know it is said Georgia protested; and this has been repeated, reiterated, and insisted upon, in every variety of form, as applicable to both the treaties, and all the questions which have been presented. Let us examine: The first alleged protest was in February, 1786, prior to the treaty of Holsten. It is the report of a committee, accepted by the House of Representatives only. The objections urged therein apply exclusively to the treaty of Hopewell, and must have rested only on the ground of the reservation before mentioned, in one of the articles of confederation, and which was omitted in the constitution.

The next protest was in February, 1797. It makes no objection whatever to the treaty of Holsten, and thereby impliedly approves and assents to it. It protests against two treaties with the Creeks made at New York, and Colerain, and the intercourse law of the United States. The grounds of objection insisted on are, that the intercourse law places the military above the civil authority, and prohibits pursuit and retaliation for Indian outrages. That the Creeks, by the treaty of Galphinton, in 1785, confirmed by a subsequent treaty at Shoulderbone, had submitted themselves to Georgia, and become members of the State, and ceded to her a tract of land, which had been actually organized into a county by the name of Tallassee. And the State protests, "because the treaty of New York in 1790, after the said cession being acted on constitutionally, erected and laid out into a county, and the lands appropriated, did sever, cut, and lop off the land so ceded before the power of the Federal constitution existed, and ex post facto declared they were vested in, and belonging to, the Creek nation of Indians; and because the said intercourse law and treaty of Colerain have confirmed the same.

Their complaint is, substantially, that the United States had taken from Georgia, lands which had "been duly ceded, fairly paid for, and legally and constitutionally laid out into a county." In conclusion, they "most fervently solicit a revision of the intercourse law and the New York and Colerain treaties, and requiring a confirmation of the county of Tallassee to the State." And "they most earnestly solicit the assistance of the United States to attain the cession of land the treaty of Colerain, they trust, was intended to establish." These protestations insist that the treaties of Galphinton and Shoulderbone were valid by reason of the before named reservation in the articles of confederation; but no where deny, and, by implication, admit, the general right of the United States to make treaties with the Indian tribes, and guarantee to them the possession of their lands. They do not breathe a whisper of objection to the treaty of Holsten, of 1791, or to any of the powers involved in making it, but acquiesce therein.

In February, 1796, by an act of her Legislature, to which I shall hereafter recur, she expressly declared that the United States had the right to make treaties with the Indians; a right which they have continually exercised, and which she has never questioned, until this recent controversy arose. Not less than fourteen treaties have been entered into with this same Cherokee nation since the adoption of the constitution: in 1791, 1792, and 1794, by General Washington; in 1798, by Mr. Adams; one in 1804, two in 1805, one in 1806, and one in 1807, by Mr. Jefferson; three in 1816, by Mr. Madison; one in 1817, by Mr. Monroe, General Jackson being the negotiator; and one in 1819, by the same President, Mr. Calhoun being the negotiator. By more than half these treaties large cessions of land were obtained, boundaries defined, and the remaining territory, and the protection of the United States again and again guaranteed to the Indians.

Shall Georgia now be permitted to deny their validity? If a man seeing another in the act of making a deed of his land to a third person, shall stand by in silence, until the conveyance is completed, and the grantee has parted with his money, paid the consideration, would any chancellor, that ever sat in a court of equity, permit that man to reclaim his property, and thus consummate a fraud on the fair purchaser? But suppose that he shall not only thus witness the conveyance perfected and the money paid, but himself receive the consideration, can he, with the fruits of the contract in his pocket, lay his hand upon the property and wrest it from the innocent grantee? Georgia not only acquiesced but actually received all the lands ceded by the Indians, and for which they obtained our promise of protection. I have in my hand some of her laws disposing of the acquisitions.

The title of one is: "An act to dispose of and distribute the cession of land obtained from the Creek and Cherokee nations of Indians by the United States, in the several treaties of 10th August, 1814, 8th July, 1817, and 22d January, 1818."

And of another: "An act to dispose of the territory lately acquired of the Cherokee Indians by a treaty held by the honorable John C. Calhoun, at the City of Washington, on the 27th day of February, 1819." There are others of similar tenor.

And now retaining these acquisitions, holding the proceeds of these treaties in her hands, she declares that they are invalid, thus, at the same moment, binding the Indians by their stipulations, and denying them the benefit of ours. She has not only thus declared the right of the United States to make treaties, and assented to them when made, but has repeatedly urged that they should be entered into for the purpose of obtaining farther acquisitions for her benefit; and even as late as the year 1825, contended that the treaty of the Indian Springs with the Creeks was obligatory, and should be carried into effect. And it was not until the Indians had firmly refused to assent to farther cessions, and it was perceived that no more lands could be acquired, by negotiation, that the doctrine arose which denies to the United States their right to make these compacts. What have the Senate heard to obviate the force of the facts and arguments which I have adduced? What answers have been given? I will advert to them all.

And, first, as to the acts and acquiescence of Georgia, we have the reply in the report of the committee, that, as she protested against the treaty of Hopewell, made in 1785, "no inference can be drawn to her disadvantage, from her silence, or from any thing she may have said in relation to any subsequent treaty, because in each of them a change was made, by which a portion of her territory and jurisdiction was restored to her, and thus her condition rendered better," &c. Who does not perceive that, under this form of words restoring—what she never possessed, but which belonged to the Cherokees, before she had a being—the substantial, real cause of her assent is alleged to be the benefits which she received! Yes, sir; she did receive the fruits of these solemn contracts: by the establishing of peace and additions to her territories, in 1791; by the cessions of 1798, 1804, 1805, 1806, 1807, 1816, 1817, and 1819. And shall we be told that, because it was for her interest to be silent, because she was receiving the consideration of the compacts, therefore she now, after twenty years assent, is under no obligation to abide by them?

The honorable chairman, in his opening speech, assigned several reasons why the United States could not constitutionally form such treaties. The first was, that "the creature could not possess power to destroy its creator." This expression is calculated to mislead the judgment, because it refers the mind at once to the relation in which we frail and feeble mortals stand to our Omnipotent Maker; and it would seem to be just as true to say, the creature cannot diminish the power of its creator. The gentleman applies it to the General Government, as the work of the several States. Is it true that it cannot, that it does not take any power from its several members? The argument is, that if the Union can secure to the Indians any portion of her territory by treaty, they may cede away a whole State. This would, indeed, as the gentleman must admit, be a gross and palpable abuse of the authority. His reasoning, then, must be, that the United States cannot possess any power which, by perversion, may be exerted to the destruction of one of its members. Can they, then, make any treaty with a foreign nation? If so, there is the same danger of wrongfully transferring a State. Can they make war? It would be the readiest means of lopping off a member by leaving it defenceless. Can they organize, discipline, and call forth the militia, and control the whole physical strength? Sir, these are powers expressly inserted in the constitution, and they are not to be argued out of it by apprehensions of extravagant possible abuses.

The General Government was formed by the States, and the creature, says the gentleman, cannot have power to destroy any one of its creators. The State Governments, sir, were formed by individuals. If any of these should be guilty of a capital offence, might he not say, in the language of the chairman, you cannot take my life—it is impossible, in the nature of things, that the creature can have power to destroy one of its creators.

It is argued that the existence of an Indian community, within the chartered limits of a State, is inconsistent with "a republican form of government," as guaranteed by the constitution to every State. This argument has been much relied on. It was advanced by the Secretary of War, repeated by the committee, and reiterated in the speech of the chairman. If this be so, a most unexpected result follows: it is, that Georgia has never yet had a republican form of Government: for there has never been a moment when such tribes did not exist within her borders. At the time of the adoption of the constitution, this same Cherokee nation was much more numerous, and held sway over a much wider region than at the present time. Nay, the constitution itself confirms the pre-existing treaty of Hopewell, which recognized and guaranteed the separate existence of the tribe; and which is now contended to be incompatible with that fundamental compact. Is the existence of a body politic, which the Legislature cannot destroy, necessarily incompatible with a republican form of government? How is it with Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, or the chartered cities of other States?

Another proposition, derived from the same elevated source, and urged with equal vehemence here, is, that these treaties cannot be valid, because the constitution declares that "no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, without the consent of the Legislature" thereof. Sir, no one proposes to create a new State, but to continue an old tribe, or State, if you so please to denominate it. It is to keep faith with a political community more ancient than Georgia herself; it is to preserve, not to form anew. Here, again, I would observe, that this nation of Cherokees was as much a State at the time of the adoption of the constitution as now, and had much greater power and more extensive dominion; and that the treaty of Hopewell, which, this argument insists, formed a new State since the constitution, and in violation thereof, was made two years before its adoption, and was confirmed and sanctioned by it.

We are next told that the constitution recognizes the right of the respective State Legislatures to pass their laws over, and annihilate these communities, by that clause in the first article, which provides that an enumeration of inhabitants, as a basis for representation, shall be made, "excluding Indians not taxed." This provision undoubtedly implies that there could be individual Indians subject to taxation, and therefore to be counted; it also expressly declares that there might be those within a State "not taxed." There may have been, nay, there were, in some of the States, individual natives voluntarily residing within the white settlements, separate from any tribe, and freely subjecting themselves to the local laws. There were those, too, whose nation, as a body, had disappeared; and because these persons had, of their own accord, thus sought the State jurisdiction, does it follow that it could be extended ever Indian nations, who had always resisted it, and with whom, at the moment this clause was written, and the constitution formed, the United States had a treaty guaranteeing them against such taxation, and every other exercise of State authority over them? By what imaginable process could these words, "Indians not taxed," produce the magical effect of annulling the treaty of Hopewell, then existing in full force? Let us substitute the word aliens for Indians. The clause would then exclude "aliens not taxed." Will it be contended that foreigners existing as a nation, with whom we had treaties as such, would be subject to the laws of a State? Would it not apply exclusively to the aliens, who had separated themselves from the nation and mingled with our citizens?

As a last resort, and to me it seems a desperate one, it has been earnestly contended by the gentlemen from Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia, (Messrs. WHITE, McKINLEY, and FOSYTH,) that we cannot constitutionally make any treaty with any Indian nation within the United States; that the express power to make "treaties" does not embrace compacts or agreements with such communities.

Wherever, sir, the relation of peace and war can exist, the United States must, of necessity, possess the right to make a treaty of peace. That this relation may exist with these native tribes has never yet been doubted, and will not at this day be questioned. No one will have the assurance, in the face of all history, in defiance of what is known by the whole world, to declare that our contests with the aboriginal nations are, on their part, insurrections, rebellions, subjecting them to be tried and executed as traitors. The Secretary of War will not say so: for he told the Cherokees, in April last, "your people were at enmity with the United States, and waged a war upon our frontier settlements; a durable peace was next entered into with you until 1791." The committee and its chairman [Mr. WURRE] will not tell us so: for their report, accompanying this bill, declares that the Cherokees waged "a war against the citizens of these States prior to the treaty of Holsten, in 1791." Rebellion! by those who never owed allegiance, and with whom, ever since our national existence, we have either had open war or subsisting treaties! But, independent of this power of peace and war, why does not the general authority to make treaties embrace those with the Indians? Gentlemen content themselves with a positive and earnest denial.

The word treaties, say they, in the constitution, does not mean compacts or contracts with Indian tribes. Why not? Did not those who formed and adopted the constitution so understand it? To answer this question we must ascertain how that word was used, and what were the ideas attached to it, at the time and anterior to its insertion in that instrument. This rule of construction is the foundation of all science. When any term is used by an author, it is understood to carry with it the ideas which he has previously affixed to it; that he denotes by it what he always has done. Hence, in the science of law, when the student has ascertained what the writer means by the words fee simple, or larceny, if he subsequently finds those words used by the same author, he attaches to them the same meaning.

These contracts with aboriginal communities have been denominated treaties from the first settlement of this country. It has been their peculiar and appropriate name, without even an abus dictus. Great Britain made treaties with the Indians; the several colonies formed many, and gave them the same appellation. The Continental Congress, from the time it first assembled until it was merged in the present national Government, uniformly called them treaties. They did so in 1775, 1776, 1778, 1783, 1784, 1785, 1786, 1787, 1788, and even to the day of the formation and adoption of the constitution. We find them repeatedly and particularly mentioned in July, August, and October, 1787; the constitution being formed in September of the same year.

Nor is this all. In the articles of confederation, power was given to make treaties. It had been repeatedly exercised in establishing our relations with Indian tribes; particularly the Delawares, the Six Nations, the Cherokees, the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, and the Shawnees; and, on the first of September, 1778, was issued the proclamation of Congress and of General Washington, to enforce the treaty of Hopewell.

The word treaties, thus invariably known and used, and which had received a practical construction under the confederation, was inserted by the same great men in the constitution of the United States. Could any one doubt its meaning? Did Georgia misunderstand it? She had herself made treaties with all the forms of negotiation, through commissioners fully empowered, in 1773, 1783, and 1785, they were so denominated by her at the time and ever afterwards. On the 3d of August, 1787, a motion was made by Mr. Few, delegate in Congress from Georgia, seconded by Mr. Blount, from North Carolina, to take measures to "explain and confirm all former treaties" with the Creek Indians. There is as much evidence that this word was intended to embrace conventions with such communities as the Creeks and Cherokees, as those with transatlantic nations, such as France and Spain.

Contemporary exposition has always been deemed of great force in settling even the most difficult questions of constitutional law. Practice and precedent, too, have often been considered as decisive authority. Mr. Madison, who has, with so much justice, been denominated the great constitutional lawyer of this country, declared, in a message to Congress, that the question of the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States, had been so settled by the sanction of the different departments of the Government, that it was no longer to be agitated; and yet only one bank had then been chartered. If his argument had, in that instance, any force, it is here irresistible.

From the organization of the Government down to this very session of Congress, the practice has been unbroken and invariable. We find these treaties made in 1789, 1790, 1791, 1792, 1794, 1795, 1796, 1797, 1798, and almost, if not quite, every year since. I have counted no less than one hundred and twenty-four Indian treaties, formed under the present constitution, being more than three for each year. If authority and practice can settle any question, this is at an end.

In 1790, General Washington delivered a speech to the Seneca Indians, some extracts from which I will now read:

"I, the President of the United States, by my own mouth, and by a written speech signed with my own hand, and sealed with the seal of the United States, speak to the Seneca nation.

"The General Government only has the power to treat with the Indian nations, and any treaty formed and held without its authority will not be binding.

"Here, then, is the security for the remainder of your lands. No state nor person can purchase your lands, unless at some public treaty held under the authority of the United States. The General Government will never consent to your being defrauded; but it will protect you in all your just rights.

"Hear well, and let it be heard by every person in your nation, that the President of the United States declares, that the General Government considers itself bound to protect you in all the lands secured to you by the treaty of Fort Stanwix, the 22d of October, 1784, excepting such parts as you may since have fairly sold to persons properly authorized to purchase of you."

Again—

"But your great object seems to be the security of your remaining lands, and I have, therefore, upon this point, meant to be sufficiently strong and clear.

"That in future you cannot be defrauded of your lands. That you possess the right to sell, and the right of refusing to sell your lands.

"That therefore the sale of your lands in future will depend entirely upon yourselves.

"But that when you may find it for your interest, to sell any parts of your lands, the United States must be present by their agent, and will be your security that you shall not be defrauded in the bargain you shall make.

"You now know that all the lands secured to you by the treaty of Fort Stanwix, excepting such parts as you may since have fairly sold, are yours, and that only your own acts can convey them away. Speak, therefore, your wishes on the subject of tilling the ground. The United States will be happy to afford you every assistance in the only business which will add to your numbers and happiness.

"The United States will be true and faithful to their engagements.

"Given at Philadelphia, 29th December, 1790.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

"By the President:

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

"By command of the President of the United States.

"H. Knox, Secretary for the Department of War."

"The United States will be true and faithful to their engagement." Such was the solemn declaration of the Father of this Country in the infancy of this republic. Heaven grant that his sacred promises may be kept and his confident prediction verified. The question is now before us. No sophistry can evade, no ingenuity can elude it. Will "the United States be true and faithful to their engagement," or false and treacherous?

The Cherokees present this solemn interrogatory, and we must return a deliberate response. It seems almost as if their case had been formed for the purpose of determining whether it be possible to bind this nation by its plighted faith.

I have already referred to our repeated and reiterated engagements by the sages of the Revolution, in the Congress of 1785; by Washington and the constellation of brilliant names around him, in 1791, 1792, and 1794; by the elder Adams and his cabinet in 1798; by Mr. Jefferson, in four successive treaties, in 1804, 1805, 1806, and 1807; by Mr. Madison, in several formed in 1816; by Mr. Monroe, in 1817, General Jackson himself subscribing it with his own hand as commissioner; and by another in 1819, to which Mr. Calhoun affixed his name, as negotiator. All these treaties were ratified by the Senate, and sanctioned by every department of the Government.

In 1794, that greatest and best of men, whose name we profess so much to venerate, and which should be, of all others, the highest authority to this Senate, and to the nation, delivered a speech to the chiefs and warriors of the Cherokee nation, in which, speaking of the lands upon Cumberland, he says: "These have been confirmed by two treaties, of Hopewell, in 1785, and Holsten in 1791." Again—"The treaties which have been made cannot be altered. The boundaries which have been mentioned must be marked and established, so that no dispute shall happen or any white people cross over it."

In 1795, the Governor of Tennessee, upon which State it is now asserted these treaties are not obligatory, wrote a letter to President Washington, in order to "prevent infractions of them," by encroachments upon the lands of the Indians. And as late as 1824, the gentleman from Tennessee, who reported this bill, [Mr. WHITE] gave an able and elaborate opinion in writing, in which he strenuously asserts and maintains their validity and the rights of the Indians. He says "the Cherokees are to be considered as a nation, a community having a country distinctly marked out, and set apart for their use; that their interest is as permanent and fixed in it, as the pledge and the faith of the United States can make it; inasmuch as they have solemnly guarantied it to them as a nation, without any limitation of time." With reference to the treaty of Holsten, he says they are "to be viewed as a nation possessing all the powers of other independent nations, which are not expressly, or by necessary implication, surrendered up by that treaty." And again, "they have not surrendered the power of making municipal regulations for their own internal government."

But now that we, the United States, are called upon to "be true and faithful to these engagements," it is contended that they are not obligatory; and, in order to sustain that position, it is insisted that the constitution gives no power to make treaties with Indian nations, within the United States. Although every President of the United States and the members of his cabinet, every administration and all the great men by whom it was surrounded and sustained, have formed and established such Indian treaties.

Every Senate of the United States, and I believe every member of every Senate, have ratified and confirmed such Indian treaties. Every House of Representatives of the United States, and I believe every member thereof, have affirmed and sanctioned them, by passing laws for their due execution, paying from year to year the annuities secured by them, and making appropriations to enable the President to hold others. At this very session, the Senate has ratified new treaties: and during the present month, we have made an appropriation to enable the President to form another, with the tribes in Indiana. While that bill was under discussion, an amendment was proposed, prohibiting the use of any part of the money therein granted in secret presents to the chiefs; and it was insisted by the gentlemen from Tennessee, Louisiana, and Illinois, [Messrs GAUCHY, LIVINGSTON, and KANE,] that such a proviso, merely restricting the use of money which Congress was granting, would trench upon the high, independent, constitutional power of the President in negotiating treaties. Nay, the second section of the bill now under consideration, provides for the removal of "any tribe or nation of Indians, now residing within the limits of any of the States or territories, and with which the United States have existing treaties;" and now we are told by the chairman that such treaties cannot exist—that they are no treaties.

It is in effect asserted, that every President and every Senate have been guilty of usurpation, in extending the treaty-making power beyond its legitimate objects: for if these contracts are not treaties, within the true meaning of the constitution, they could be made only by the authority of Congress. But the President and Senate alone—the treaty-making power—have always negotiated them, ratified them, and by proclamation announced them to the nation, as the supreme law of the land. Every State Legislature, and the whole people, have heard these annunciations, and looked on, during all these proceedings, in silent acquiescence.

Even in 1798, when all the acts of the General Government, and particularly those of the Executive, were scrutinized with the utmost rigor, it was never suggested, even in Virginia, where the discussions were most animated, that there had, in this respect, been any irregularity. But now, upon the pressure of an exigency, it is discovered, for the first time, that all has been wrong. The present occasion has brought with it new and peculiar lights, by which gentlemen now perceive what was in the minds and intentions of the framers of the constitution better than they did themselves. They were ignorant of their own work. The venerated fathers of the republic, and all the high and honored names who have presided over its destinies, have been involved in deep darkness, and wandered in gross error!

I have thus, [said Mr. S.] endeavored to present my views with respect to the claims of the State of Georgia. Whether we regard original principles of international law, as applicable to the right of discovery; or the express powers conferred by the articles of the confederation; or the confirmation of pre-existing treaties, by the adoption of the constitution; or the authority vested by that instrument in the General Government, and the renunciation of powers by the respective States; the invariable practice and usage of the Union, and the acts, acquiescence, and assent of Georgia herself; it is manifest that we are bound to perform our engagements to the Indians, and are under no incompatible and paramount obligations to that State.

But let us now, for the sake of the argument, make the violent supposition, that the pretensions of Georgia are well founded, and that the United States cannot rightfully fulfil their stipulations as against her. In that case the States of Alabama and Mississippi would stand on very different ground. Their claims have been mingled and blended with those of the elder sister, as if they were precisely the same, and hers have been put forward as the only subjects of discussion, when in truth there is a broad line of distinction which ought to be marked and remembered. For the sake of distinctness and brevity I shall speak of Alabama alone. It is conceded on all hands, as a fundamental proposition, that the United States are bound to fulfil their engagements to the Cherokees specifically, except when prevented by incompatible obligations, prior in point of time. Now, sir, the State of Alabama did not exist until the year 1819; when she voluntarily came into the Union after the fifteen treaties with this nation had been previously established and proclaimed as the supreme law of the land. But it is said that Alabama was formed from territory once belonging to Georgia, and succeeded to all her rights. Without stopping to examine the difficulties attending such a supposed transmission of a right to resist treaties, it is sufficient to say that, by the compact of 1802, Georgia ceded to the United States all her "right, title, and claim," "to the jurisdiction and soil" of all the territory now constituting Alabama and Mississippi. The whole right of Georgia, whatever it was, thus became vested in the General Government, and so remained until 1819; during which time not less than eight of these treaties were made. Who could then contest their validity? Are our treaties valid with the nations in Florida, Arkansas, and Michigan? Can we enter into engagements with any tribes within the boundaries of the United States, even beyond the Rocky mountains, or any where upon this continent? Can we make the solemn guarantee proposed by this bill? If so, we are legally constrained by our promises to the Indians of Alabama, made before the existence of that State.

But this is not all. Still another insuperable difficulty presents itself to her claims to legislate over and destroy the Indian nations. The following article is a part of the fundamental law to which Alabama owes her being, and without which she cannot exist: "The utmost good faith shall always be observed towards the Indians; their lands and property shall never be taken from them without their consent; and in their property, rights, and liberty, they never shall be invaded or disturbed, unless in just and lawful wars authorized by Congress; but laws founded in justice and humanity shall, from time to time, be made, for preventing wrongs being done to them, and for preserving peace and friendship with them." This was originally a part of the fourth article of the ordinance respecting the Northwestern territory: and was, by express reference, incorporated into the first article of the compact of 1802, and made a fundamental and perpetual condition in the act of Congress which provided for the admission of Alabama.

What is the answer to all this? We have it from the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. McKINLEY.] The compact of 1802 [says he] was unconstitutional; Georgia could not transfer to the United States either soil or jurisdiction. If this be so, the first consequence is that the dispute between that State and the General Government, respecting the ownership of the Crown lands obtained by conquest, which that compact was supposed to have happily put to rest forever, by mutual and reciprocal cessions, could never be settled! In the next place: that the combined powers of the State and of the Union cannot do that, under the constitution, which the members individually might have done without the constitution. It is an attribute of complete sovereignty to be able to convey and receive territory. It is insisted that this attribute, as between the States, is annihilated; although all powers not granted are reserved to the members. I will not say that such an effect could not be produced by the constitution; but it is at least so extremely improbable, that those who contend for it, in any particular instance, should be required to show it clearly, which has not been done.

It is insisted by the gentleman that no State can be subject to the restraining condition of the ordinance referred to, because it is inconsistent with her constitutional equality with the other members of the Union. That ordinance was established in July, 1787. It declares that "the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States of said territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent." Then succeeds an article embracing the clause before read, and which was incorporated into the compact of 1802. The ordinance subsequently declares, "That the said territory, and the States which may be formed therein, shall forever remain a part of this confederacy." This ordinance, with all its provisions, was affirmed and established by the adoption of the constitution, and thus that instrument itself contemplated that all the States to be thereafter formed northwest of the Ohio, should be forever subject to those conditions, by which it is now contended no one could ever be constitutionally restrained. It is insisted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McKINLEY] that Georgia could not transfer soil and jurisdiction to the United States; that the compact of 1802, attempting to do so, was unconstitutional and void; and that the tract of country which it was intended to convey remained a part of that State until the year 1819. If the gentleman's doctrine is correct it remains so still, she having never conveyed it. Another consequence would flow from this doctrine, which I should exceedingly deplore; it is, sir, that Alabama is not a member of this Union! By the constitution no new State can be formed or admitted into the Union within the limits of an old one, without the consent of the latter. Now, sir, Georgia has never consented to the admission of Alabama, except by the transfer of soil and jurisdiction, by virtue of the compact of 1802. If that conveyance was inoperative, no consent has been given. If that compact was absolutely void, as the gentleman contends, it is a legal nullity, and he can hold no rights under it. Congress, too, have never given their consent, except upon the basis of the binding efficacy of that compact, and upon the express condition that its requisitions should be the fundamental law of the new State. But, says the gentleman, Congress had no power to pass such a law. If so, the act respecting the admission of Alabama was unconstitutional and void, and neither created nor admitted any new State. The ingenious gentleman has reasoned so profoundly upon constitutional law that he has argued himself and his colleague out of their seats in this Senate! Now, sir, against this I most seriously protest; they cannot be spared; we need the aid of their talents and experience.

How will the gentleman escape from the consequences which I have deduced? Will he contend that the compact and the law were valid and invalid at the same time? That they conferred rights, but could not impose obligations upon his State? Even if such an extraordinary position were assumed, how would it affect the present question? If he can infuse any degree of vitality into that which was dead before its birth; if he can make that compact efficacious, as the consent of Georgia to Alabama's becoming a State, would it not also be effectual as her consent that the United States should exercise jurisdiction over the territory, so far as to make treaties with the Indian tribes? If, then, the gentleman will admit that Georgia assented to any thing, by virtue of that compact, she consented to the formation of these treaties, and thus they were valid by her authority before Alabama was brought into being. As a dernier resort, the gentleman insists that the true construction of the language of the ordinance gives all the right over the Indians for which his State contends, because the latter clause requires that "laws shall, from time to time, be made for preventing wrongs being done to them, and for preserving peace and friendship with them." That is, laws restraining the whites, our own citizens, from encroaching upon the natives, and thereby endangering the public tranquillity. If Maine or New York should pass laws for "preventing wrongs being done to" the Canadians, "and for preserving peace and friendship with them," would that give jurisdiction over the British provinces? But let us read the whole clause, the true construction of which confers this unlimited power: "The utmost good faith shall always be observed towards the Indians," which means that we may violate all our engagements at pleasure; "their lands and property shall never be taken from them without their consent;" that is, both may be taken by violence, against their utmost resistance! "In their property, rights, and liberty, they shall never be invaded or disturbed, unless in just and lawful wars, authorized by Congress." "There shall be laws for preventing wrongs being done to them, and for preserving peace and friendship with them;" the true construction of all which is, that a State may make war upon them at pleasure, deprive them of their lands, and annihilate their nation! To such arguments are gentlemen of great ability compelled to resort! The rights of the natives, both natural and conventional, have been strenuously denied. What right, it is asked, have the Indians to the lands they occupy? I ask, in reply, what right have the English or the French, the Spaniards or the Russians, to the countries they inhabit?

But it is insisted that the original claim of the natives has been divested by the superior right of discovery. I have already shown that this gives no ground of claim as against the discovered; that it is a mutual understanding or conventional arrangement, entered into by the nations of Europe, amongst themselves, to define and regulate their respective claims as discoveries, in order to prevent interference and contests with each other, all agreeing that the sovereign who should first find a new country should be left without interference from them to deal with it and its inhabitants according to his ability and his conscience. But, we are told, that grants from the King are the highest title, and have always been relied upon as such. True, as against other grantees from the Crown, or against the Government itself; but not as to the natives. If such a title gives any just claim as against them, then they are bound to yield to it: for to every right appertains a corresponding obligation.

Were the aborigines bound to yield to such pretensions? Suppose that, more than two centuries ago, when in unbroken strength they held resistless sway over this whole Western world, a royal patentee, with his handful of followers, just landed on these shores, should have found himself in the midst of a powerful Indian nation—the council fire is lighted up, and sachems and warriors are assembled around it—he presents himself, and says to them:

"This country is no longer yours. You must leave the forests where you hunt, and the valleys where you live. All the land which you can see from the highest mountain is mine. It has been given me by the King of the white men across the waters. Here is his grant—how can you resist so fair a title?"

If they deigned any other reply than the war-whoop, their chief might say—

"The Great Spirit, who causeth the trees to rise from the ground towards the heavens, and maketh the rivers to descend from the mountains to the valleys; who created the earth itself and made both the red man and white man to dwell thereon; gave this land to us and to our ancestors. You say you have a grant from your King beyond the waters; we have a grant from the King of Kings, who reigns in heaven: by this title our fathers have held it for uncounted generations, and by this title their sons will defend it."

It has been strenuously argued that the overflowing nations of Europe had a just claim to the occupancy of some portion of the vacant lands of the aborigines for their own subsistence. The excessive population of China, and of Holland, have, at this day, the same ground of claim against the United States. May they, therefore, drive us even from our cities and villages, and take all our territory by force? We permit them to come and possess, if they submit to our laws, and pay us for the soil. The Indians have been more liberal, having ceded both soil and sovereignty to hundreds of millions of acres. The Cherokees have no more to spare; they need the residue for themselves. Shall they be permitted to retain it? That is now the question.

To avoid, as far as possible, all questionable ground, I at present contend only that the Indians have a right to exist as a community, and to possess some spot of earth upon which to sustain that existence. That spot is their native land. If they have no claim there, they have no right any where. Georgia asserts that the lands belong to her—she must and she will have them—even by violence, if other means fail. This is a declaration of right to drive the Cherokees from the face of the earth; for if she is not bound to permit them to remain, no nation or people are bound to receive them. To that for which I now contend the Indians possess not only a natural, but also a legal and conventional right. These two grounds of claim have been blended and confounded.

The rights which the United States have claimed with respect to the territory of the aborigines have been twofold—pre-emptive and reversionary; a right to purchase, to the exclusion of all others; and to succeed the natives, should they voluntarily leave the country or become extinct. It will at once be perceived that this is a right to exclude others from interference, but not to coerce the Indians. It leaves to them the perpetual undisturbed occupancy. They cannot indeed transfer their country to others, but this does not impair their title, although it may diminish its value in the market. It still belongs to them and their heirs forever. If a State should, by law, prohibit its citizens from making sale of their lands without the assent of the Executive, would it destroy every man's title? Nay, the laws do now prevent conveyances to aliens. The right claimed is merely to exclude all others from purchasing of the aborigines. It will be divested of much of its appearance of harshness towards them by recurring to its origin. It was the primitive agreement or mutual understanding between exploring nations, that whichever should first find a new country, should alone possess the privilege of dealing with the natives; and upon this ground the discoverer excluded others from becoming purchasers. He had the right of pre-emption. This agreement trenchanted not upon the title of the aborigines; and as to its affecting the value of their lands, by preventing competition in the purchase, there would have been no purchaser but for the discovery.

There is no mystery in the international law of discovery. So far as it relates to this subject, it is the same as if five or six persons, being about to go in search of sugar lands in South America, should mutually engage that they would not interfere with each other in their purchases. Such agreement would do no wrong to the original owner.

The reversionary claim, as it may be denominated, although in strictness that cannot revert to another which always belonged to the present possessor, is the necessary consequence of the exclusion of others from purchasing. It is merely a right of succession of lands of the Indians when they shall have become extinct, or have voluntarily abandoned them by emigration; as the property of individuals sometimes escheats to the Government for the want of heirs.

The right of the aborigines to the perpetual and exclusive occupancy of all their lands has been always recognized and affirmed by the United States. It was respected by Great Britain before the Revolution, as appears by the royal proclamation of 1763, in which all persons are commanded "forthwith to remove themselves" from lands, "which not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are still reserved to the said Indians;" and after reciting that individuals had practised fraud upon the natives, forbids private persons from making purchases, "to the end that the Indians may be convinced of our justice," and provides that, if "the said Indians should be inclined to dispose of the said lands, the same shall be purchased only for us, in our name, at some public meeting or assembly of the said Indians, to be held for that purpose."

The Indians.

That right was recognized by the Confederation, as appears by the whole tenor of their proceedings, particularly their treaties, by which they purchased a part, and guaranteed the remainder; by the report of a committee in August, 1787, which declares that the Indians have "just claims to all occupied by, and not purchased of, them;" and the proclamation of Congress, in September, 1788, which has been already referred to.

That, under our present constitution, the rights of the natives, and the relation in which they stand to the United States, are such as I have described, is clearly manifested by the speech of President Washington to the Senecas in 1790, from which I have already presented some extracts; and by the following explicit and deliberate letter of Mr. Jefferson, written to the Secretary of War in 1791—"I am of opinion that Government should firmly maintain this ground; that the Indians have a right to the occupation of their lands, independent of the States within whose chartered lines they happen to be; that until they cede them by treaty, or other transactions equivalent to a treaty, no act of a State can give a right to such lands; that neither under the present constitution, nor the ancient confederation, had any State, or persons, a right to treat with the Indians, without the consent of the General Government; that that consent has never been given to any treaty for the cession of the lands in question; that the Government is determined to exert all its energy for the patronage and protection of the rights of the Indians, and the preservation of peace between the United States and them; and that if any settlements are made on lands not ceded by them, without the previous consent of the United States, the Government will think itself bound, not only to declare to the Indians that such settlements are without the authority or protection of the United States, but to remove them also by the public force." Also, by the intercourse law of 1790—prohibiting all encroachments by citizens of the United States, upon the "territory belonging to any tribe or nation of Indians;" by many other statutes, particularly that of March, 1805—by all the treaties of purchase and cession—all the laws to carry them into effect and pay the consideration—and all the acts for enabling the Executive to "extinguish Indian titles."

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FOSTER] has referred to the correspondence at Ghent to sustain his denial of rights to the Indian tribes. He relied upon the views of the American Commissioners, in repelling the claims of the British. As it is sometimes more satisfactory to read for ourselves, than to take the construction of others, permit me, sir, to present to you an extract from that correspondence. "Under this system, the Indians residing within the United States are so far independent that they live under their own customs, and not under the laws of the United States: that their rights upon the lands where they inhabit, or hunt, are secured to them by boundaries defined in amicable treaties between the United States and themselves; and when these boundaries are varied, it is also by amicable and voluntary treaties, by which they receive from the United States ample compensation for every right they have to the lands ceded." "Such is the relation between them and the United States: that relation is not now created for the first time, nor did it originate with the treaty of Grenville." And subsequently, "the treaty of Grenville was merely declaratory of the public law, on principles previously and universally recognized."

To this, sir, were subscribed the names of Adams and Gallatin, of Clay, and Bayard, and Russell.

The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. M'KINLEY] to show that the natives had no title to the soil, cited the case of Johnson and McIntosh, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and reported in the 8th of Wheaton.

To see how precisely that case sustains my positions, let me read a few very short extracts from the opinion of the court, as delivered by Chief Justice Marshall. It declares that the right of the United States, or the several States, is "subject to the Indian right of occupancy." That "the original inhabitants are the rightful occupants of the soil, with a legal, as well as a just, claim to retain possession of it, and to use it according to their own discretion." And again, "it has never been contended that the Indian title amounted to nothing." Their right of possession has never been questioned."

Georgia herself has recognized those established rights of the natives, and the relation they bear to the General Government. By a law passed in 1796, respecting the vacant lands within her chartered limits, she held the following language: "The territory therein mentioned is hereby declared to be the sole property of the State, subject only to the right of treaty of the United States, to enable the State to purchase, under its pre-emption right, the Indian title to the same." A most pregnant act of legislation. It expressly admits "the Indian title;" that the claim of the State is only "to purchase" under its pre-emption "right;" that even this she could not do, unless "enabled" by the United States; that the United States had "the right of treaty" with the Indians, and that the claims of Georgia were "subject to" that right.

In the compact of 1802, she stipulated, by reference to an article of the ordinance before mentioned, for the inviolability of the lands, property, rights, and liberty of the Indians, upon the territory relinquished; and recognized their just claim to lands, in that which was retained, by the article which binds the United States, "at their own expense," to extinguish "the Indian title" thereto, as early as it could be done "peaceably, and upon reasonable terms."

The titles of the acts which I read, and several others, speak of the lands therein disposed of, as "acquired," "obtained," from the "Creek and Cherokee nations," by the treaties held by the United States.

Even the act of December last contains a plenary admission that the lands in question were never before subject to her jurisdiction. A part of the title is "to extend the laws of the State over"—"the territory now occupied by the Cherokees." The sixth section expressly extends the laws of the State over the same and the inhabitants thereof. Sir, does not the legislation of every State, of itself, operate upon all the country within its jurisdiction? The laws of Georgia were not before limited to any parts of the State; they were general; they covered the whole; and are now—extended over the residue!

We have heard a great deal, in this debate, of the rights of conquest; and are told, that it is always recognized as valid by the judicial tribunals. True, sir, by those of the conqueror. How can they do otherwise? Suppose that Congress should now declare a war for the sole purpose of wresting Canada from Great Britain, and should succeed; could our own courts question this exercise of political power, and refuse to sustain our jurisdiction over the country, however iniquitous the acquisition? And if in this Government, where the political sovereign is under the restraints of the constitution, the courts cannot interfere, how could they in Europe, where this doctrine had its origin? There, the legislative and political powers are unlimited. Even in England, the Parliament is legally omnipotent; and who ever heard of a judicial court undertaking to annul any of its enactments? Whatever may be the acquiescence of other nations in the exercise of power by a conqueror, it is no ground of just claim as against the conquered. They, surely, are not bound to submit, if new means of resistance can be found. To give to conquest—to mere force—the name of right, is to sanction all the enormities of avarice and ambition. Alexander and Bonaparte are justified! Britain has done no wrong in sweeping India with the hand of rapine, and holding fifty millions of people in thralldom! All the cruelties of the Spaniards in South America; the crimes of Pizarro and Cortez, tracking the fugitive natives in terror and dismay with bloodhounds, to the caves of the mountains, and stretching their wretched monarch upon burning coals to extort from him the secret of his treasures, are sanctified by the name of right! This right of conquest, gentlemen contend, is the legitimate offspring of the right of discovery. Sir, the pirates on the coast of Barbary and Barataria exercise both. They find a ship alone on the ocean; this is discovery. They capture her, and murder or enslave the crew; this is conquest. Both these rights are thus combined and consummated, and their validity will not, I presume, be questioned either by the courts of Barataria, or other bands of similar conquerors.

But even this miserable argument of conquest is not applicable to the Cherokees. They were not subjugated. The Southern Indians had sixteen thousand warriors with arms in their hands. They were powerful; their trade was war; they did not solicit peace. We sought for it, as appears by the resolutions of Congress, of May, 1783, and March, 1785. We obtained the treaty of Hopewell, in which gentlemen find the expressions, the "United States give peace" to the Indians, and "allot boundaries;" and, by a philological criticism upon the English terms which we used, they logically deduce the rights of conquest! What did the unlettered Indian understand by those expressions, but that there was to be an end of war, and that his territory was to be sacred? The treaty contains many reciprocal stipulations of the "contracting parties." Will it still be contended that we are not bound by them, because the other party was conquered—in other words, because we were the strongest? If the United States made terms of peace, should they not abide by them? If a besieged town capitulates, are not the articles of capitulation obligatory? When Bonaparte dictated treaties of peace in the capitals of the nations which he had overrun, was he not morally bound to observe them? They, indeed, might complain that the contract was made by constraint, when they were not free agents; but who ever heard of the stronger party claiming to be absolved from his engagements, because the other was subject to his coercion?

It has been repeatedly asked, why not leave the Indians to the legislation of the States? I answer, because they protest against it, and they, alone, have the right to judge. They demand of us the protection which we solemnly promised.

Much has been said of their being untutored savages, as if that could dissolve our treaties! No one pretends that they are less cultivated now than when those treaties were made. Indeed, it is certain that they have greatly advanced in civilization; we see it in the very proofs introduced by the gentleman from Georgia to show their barbarism. He produced to the Senate a printed code of Cherokee laws, and a newspaper issued from a Cherokee press! Is there another instance of such productions from any Indian nation? I was surprised that, with all his scrutiny, he could find no more remnants of savage customs. I shall not dwell upon his selections from their laws. The first was, that, if a horse should be stolen, and the owner, finding the thief in possession, should immediately kill him, in the excess of passion, it should rest upon his own conscience. It is to be observed that the person slain must have been guilty; and for such an offence life is now taken by the laws of England. But this provision, inserted in the Cherokee code more than twenty years ago, has yielded to further light, and been since repealed. Time will not permit me to dwell upon their advances in the arts of civilized life. It is known to have been great. They till the ground, manufacture for themselves, have workshops, a printing press, schools, churches, and a regularly organized Government. Indeed, the gentleman from Tennessee himself told us, that some individuals of that nation were qualified for a seat in this august assembly.

What danger, it is asked, have the Indians to apprehend from the laws of the State? What danger? Is it not here avowed that their presence is a nuisance from which Georgia wishes to be relieved? Has not her Legislature declared that she is determined to have their lands at all hazards, even by violence, in the last resort? And, if left to her unrestrained power, can it be doubted that she will find the means of carrying that determination into effect? If the laws heretofore enacted are not sufficient, may not others be resorted to? Let us, for a moment, look at the measures already adopted, and see if they have not some adaptation to the accomplishment of her wishes.

By the ninth section of the act of 1828, no Indian in the Creek or Cherokee nations can be a party or a witness in any suit to which a white man may be a party. It is said that this has been repealed by the statute of 1829. I think otherwise. The latter contains no repealing clause, nor any incompatible provisions. Both may well stand together, and both would be enforced according to the usual construction of statutes in pari materia. It is true, that a part of the title of the act is, to repeal that ninth section of the former. This is easily accounted for. The act, as first reported by the committee, probably contained a repealing clause, which was stricken out by the more zealous majority; the original title remaining unchanged.

But suppose that only the law of 1829 is now in force. What is to be its effect? All the laws, usages, and customs of the Cherokees are abrogated, and severe punishments denounced against those who shall presume to act under them. Their Government is dissolved—their political existence is at an end—their nation is destroyed—it is resolved into its original elements. We know that their lands are not holden by individual ownership; the title is in the nation. To annihilate the tribe, therefore, as a political community, is to destroy the owner; and the State is then to take the whole by her claim of succession. By this statute, no Cherokee, or descendant of a Cherokee, can be a witness against any white man, who does not reside within the "nation." This devotes their property to the cupidity of their neighbors; it leaves them exposed to every outrage, which lawless passions can inflict. Even robbery and murder may be committed with impunity, at noonday, if not in the presence of such whites as will become prosecutors or witnesses.

This, the gentleman from Georgia asserts, creates no new disability; that Indians are not competent to testify, by the common law, either in England or in this country. That I deny. They are good witnesses in both, and have been so, without question, ever since the case of the Genito, in the time of Lord Mansfield. Several were recently admitted by the courts of New York, in a very important question of title to real estate near the falls of Niagara; and I have myself seen a person convicted of larceny, to a large amount, in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, upon the testimony of an Indian.

But the gentleman assigned, as a reason for his assertion, that a belief in a future state of rewards and punishments was essential to their admissibility as witnesses. True, sir, and so it is with respect to all others. The objection is as valid against a white as a red man. If this act creates no new disability, why was it passed? Why not leave them to the provisions of the common law? But, sir, we learn from an intelligent missionary, that there are a thousand members of Christian churches. These, and all other true believers are excluded. Even those who are so distinguished for their knowledge, integrity, and ability, that the honorable Chairman would be willing himself to be represented by them in the Congress of the United States, are not permitted to testify in a court of justice.

Under these enactments, the Cherokees are aliens in their native land: trespassers upon their own soil: outlaws in the bosom of their own nation!

But why should I dwell upon the laws already passed, when the same power can, at will, produce others to effectuate their avowed determination? Who will pretend that the Indians can live under the legislation of the State? The head of the bureau of Indian affairs, in a communication transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of War, declares that it will "seal their destruction, as admitted by their chiefs," and the honorable chairman has frankly declared in this debate, that it will reduce them to the last degree of wretchedness. His words were: "You cannot make a full blooded Indian more miserable" than by such subjection; and, in his written opinion of 1824, he emphatically says, if "the protection of the United States is withdrawn," "the Cherokee nation cannot exist twelve months."

The question now proposed by this amendment is, shall that protection be withdrawn; and the Indians be compelled to leave their country, under the penalty of certain destruction if they remain?

The interogatory has been often repeated, why should not Georgia extend her laws over the natives as well as other States?

Again, sir, I reply—our treaties—our treaties. The Indians object, and the United States have solemnly promised, to interpose at their request. In no other instances have they opposed State legislation, and demanded our interposition. This is a sufficient answer.

But this topic has been so much urged, and the effort has been so great to find shelter under the precedents of other States, that I will bestow upon them a moment's attention. That principally relied upon, and the only one specified, is a law of New York passed four or five years ago. The occasion was this. In one of the little reduced tribes, within that State, a female had been executed as a witch. The executioner was indicted in the State court before one judge and convicted. The question of jurisdiction was carried to the Superior Court, who never came to a decision, but advised a pardoning act; whereupon this law was passed, which punishes certain high crimes committed within the tribe. Its sole object was the protection of the Indians, and it seemed to have been by their consent. They have never objected, much less claimed our interposition. Does this bear any analogy to the case of Georgia and the Cherokees? When another tribe, the Oneidas, formed a constitution or Government similar to that of the Cherokees, did New York interfere to destroy it and dissolve the nation? Far otherwise; they protected them in its enjoyment. And such has been the general character of the legislation of other States. I shall not go back to the early days of colonial vassalage, although it is surprising that so little color of precedent is to be found, even when the weakness of infancy was struggling for existence against the power of the savages. I speak of the States, since they became such, under the confederation, or the Federal Constitution; and say that their general legislation has been—not over the Indians, and acting upon the individuals within the territory of their tribe; but protecting and preserving them as a distinct community—operating upon the whites, and restraining them from inflicting wrongs and injuries. The legislation of Georgia has thrown over them a net, which binds every limb in fetters, but is no shield of defence against assaults; whilst that of other States has erected around them a wall of defence, guarding them against encroachments.

This bill [said Mr. S.] provides for the removal of the Indians to distant regions, beyond the Mississippi; and it is proposed to place no less than half a million of dollars in the hands of the Secretary of War for that purpose. The amendment, now under consideration, declares that they shall be protected, in the enjoyment of their rights, until they shall choose to remove. The necessity for such a provision is apparent. Without it, they have no option. Without it, this bill will add to the pressure of the torrent that is sweeping them away.

It is not known that acts for holding Indian treaties have been used as instruments of coercion! When our commissioners have met the chiefs in council to obtain farther acquisitions of territory, have they not sometimes asked only, what will you reserve? And when the answer has been, we have no lands to spare—we will cede nothing; this question is repeated—what will you reserve? Congress have passed a law for the purpose of obtaining a portion of your soil—the United States are strong—their arms now sleep in peace; beware how you arouse them from their slumbers!

Not only has terror been inspired, but other means have been resorted to, to cause the women to influence their husbands; the children to beseech their parents; the warriors to urge the chiefs; until their firmness is overcome. It is related of a venerable chief, that, yielding at last to this irresistible pressure, he signed the fatal parchment in tears; declaring at the time that it was the death warrant of his nation.

Apprehending that our object is to obtain further cessions, the Indians have met us in council with fear and trembling. In one instance, five or six tribes being assembled, our commissioners announced to them that our only desire was to establish and preserve peace among themselves; that we asked for no lands: they instantly rent the air with acclamations of joy. No difficulties, no delays intervened—the treaties were accomplished at once.

Is it uncharitable to suppose that agents, to be appointed under the direction of those who are now concerned in our Indian affairs, may resort to force or terror? Sir, the officer now at the head of the Indian Bureau, in his official report of a treaty of cession, made by him with the Creeks, states the fact, that in two successive councils he met only a firm denial; and in the third, he says, one individual being most prominent in his opposition, it was not until he "broke him upon the spot" that the treaty was obtained! Yes, sir, that officer avows that he "broke" one of the prominent chiefs in their own council, as the only means of accomplishing his purposes. And in an official communication sent to us by the Secretary of War at the commencement of this session, the same officer recommends that the Government should send an "armed force" to the Cherokee country, to further the objects of this bill—the removal of the natives. He says, indeed, that he would make a solemn declaration that the military were not to be used to compel them to leave their country; but only to give security to those that were willing to go. And would such a declaration, even if made, do away the effect of the presence of our bayonets? What is the avowed purpose? To protect, against their own Government and people, the individuals who may choose to emigrate; but not to afford any aid or countenance to those that may choose to remain. The chiefs may inquire—will these soldiers give us protection against the power of Georgia, if she shall attempt to force her laws upon us? The reply must be, Oh no, the President has decided that she has a right to govern you; and if you should resist, the United States are bound to assist her in the execution of her laws against all opposition. When the British minister remonstrated against the Emperor Alexander's annexing a part of Poland to his dominions, he replied: I have three hundred thousand soldiers in that country. The argument was conclusive. If the Cherokees should hesitate, they might, in significant silence, be pointed to our glittering bayonets!

It is recommended to send an armed force to enable the Cherokees to deliberate freely. When the Roman orator appeared in defence of Milo, he found the forum surrounded by an armed force, accompanied, no doubt, by the declaration that it was only to preserve tranquillity. But even the tongue of Cicero was palsied by the formidable array, and his friend and client was abandoned to his fate. We know, sir, how the deliberations of the Parliament of Great Britain, and the National Conventions of France, have been aided by the presence of an armed force; and history abounds with similar examples.

I confess, sir, that I cannot but indulge fears of the use which may be made by the War Department, of the half million of dollars, to be appropriated by this bill. We do know, that, in making Indian treaties, there have been instances of valuable reservations of lands, and large sums of money being secretly given to individual chiefs, by confidential arrangements, to induce them to yield to our wishes, and betray the confidence reposed in them by their nation. Is it uncharitable to apprehend that such things may happen under the directions of the present Secretary of War? Towards that high officer I have no feeling of unkindness. I seek no imputation upon his motives; but his official acts I am bound, by the duties of my station, to examine. Look at the instructions given by him in May last to General Carroll, who was sent as an agent of the Government to induce the Cherokees to a removal. They express throughout much solicitude for the welfare of the Indians, and profess to consult their best interests. But I am constrained to look at the acts to be done—the course of conduct prescribed. He is directed not to meet the Cherokees in “General Council” for “the consequence would be, what it has been, a firm refusal to acquiesce;” but to “appeal to the chiefs and influential men—not together, but apart, at their own houses; and to make offers to them of extensive reservations in fee simple, and other rewards” to obtain “their acquiescence.” He is further told, “the more careful you are to secure from even the chiefs the official character you bear, the better”—and again: “go to them not as a negotiator, but friend.” “Open to each a view of his danger. Again: “enlarge on their comparative degradation as a people, and the total impossibility of their ever attaining to higher privileges, while they retain their present relations to a people who seek to get rid of them”—that their laws “will be superseded and trodden under foot.” Again: “enlarge upon the advantage of their condition in the West—there the General Government would protect them—improve them by instruction.” They would become our equals in privileges, civil and religious, and that “by refusing” to remove, “they must, necessarily, entail destruction on their race.”

I cannot but remark the parallel between the course here prescribed and that which expelled our first parents from Paradise. When the Arch Tempter sought their removal, he assailed them “not together,” lest their joint “council” should have baffled his arts; but he found feeble woman “apart” from her husband, deprived of the aid of her natural adviser, and carefully concealing his “official character” of Satanic majesty; assuming the guise of a “friend”—a kind instructor; he told her—pursue the course which I advise, and the evils which have been predicted shall not follow!—“ye shall not surely die”—but you shall be enlightened and elevated—“your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.” She listened and yielded—

“Earth felt the wound, and nature, from her seat, “Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe
“That all was lost.”

She was made the instrument of seducing the man also; and both were driven from the garden of Eden, where the Creator had placed them, to the unsubdued wilderness of the world—and a flaming sword forever barred their return.

The adoption of such measures is, in the language of the military Secretary, to “move upon them in the line of their prejudices.” And upon whom is it that we thus move? Those whom we have most solemnly promised to protect as faithful guardians; whom we have called brothers; whom we have taught to look up to the President as their great father. Yes, we have endeavored to obtain over them the influence of a parent; but do we perform towards them the duties of that sacred relation?

It is said we must resort to such measures; they are unavoidable. The plea of state necessity is advanced. And is this great country, with peace in all its borders, now controlled by an irresistible power, that knows no rule and consults no law? Does this measure wear the garb of state necessity? That, sir, is a high-handed tyrant—not a smooth-tongued seducer. It is a lion, seizing its prey with open and resistless strength—not a serpent winding its sinuous way in secret to its victim.

Without the adoption of this amendment, the Cherokees have no choice; but between the miseries of emigration, and destruction where they are, it is contended that it is for their best interest to remove. Leave that, sir, to their own decision. Our judgment may be too much guided by our own convenience. We undertook to judge for the Seminoles in Florida. We asked for their fertile lands; they objected, asserting that the residue would not support existence. We persisted; and found means at last to obtain a reluctant cession. They departed in the deepest sorrow from their homes of comfort and plenty, to encounter want and misery upon a barren waste. Nineteen-twentieths of the territory which we left to them consisted of sands where no verdure quickened, and of swamps upon which human life could not be sustained. The dreary description officially given by Governor Duval can hardly be exceeded. The consequence was—what the Seminoles foresaw—want, suffering, and starvation. The Government was forthwith compelled to give twenty thousand dollars for food to preserve life, and to retrocede a portion of their territory.

Whither are the Cherokees to go? What are the benefits of the change? What system has been matured for their security? What laws for their government? These questions are answered only by gilded promises in general terms; they are to become enlightened and civilized husbandmen.

They now live by the cultivation of the soil, and the mechanic arts. It is proposed to send them from their cotton fields, their farms, and their gardens, to a distant and an unsubdued wilderness—to make them tillers of the earth; to remove them from their looms, their workshops, their printing press, their schools, and churches, near the white settlements, to frowning forests, surrounded with naked savages—that they may become enlightened and civilized! We have pledged to them our protection; and, instead of shielding them where they now are, within our reach, under our own arm, we send these natives of a southern clime to northern regions, amongst fierce and warlike barbarians. And what security do we propose to them? A new guarantee!! Who can look an Indian in the face, and say to him, we and our fathers, for more than forty years, have made to you the most solemn promises: we now violate and trample upon them all; but offer you, in their stead, another guarantee!

Will they be in no danger of attack, from the primitive inhabitants of the regions to which they emigrate? How can it be otherwise? The official documents show us the fact, that some of the few who have already gone, were involved in conflicts with the native tribes, and compelled to a second removal.

How are they to subsist? Has not that country now, as great an Indian population as it can sustain? What has become of the original occupants? Have we not already caused accessions to their numbers, and been compressing them more and more? Is not the consequence inevitable, that some must be stinted in the means of subsistence? Here, too, we have the light of experience. By an official communication from Governor Clark, the superintendent of Indian affairs, we learn that the most powerful tribes, west of the Mississippi, are, every year, so distressed by famine, that many die for want of food. The scenes of their suffering are hardly exceeded by the sieges of Jerusalem and Samaria. There might be seen the miserable mother, in all the tortures which hunger can inflict, giving her last morsel for the sustenance of her child, and then fainting, sinking, and actually dying of starvation! And the orphan! no one can spare it food—it is put alive into the grave of the parent, which thus closes over the quick and the dead! And this not in a solitary instance only, but repeatedly and frequently. “The living child is often buried with the dead mother.”*

Massachusetts' Claim.

I am aware [said Mr. S.] that their white neighbors desire the absence of the Indians; and if they can find safety and subsistence beyond the Mississippi, I should rejoice exceedingly at their removal, because it would relieve the States of their presence. I would do much to effect a consummation so devoutly to be wished. But let it be by their own free choice, unawed by fear, unseduced by bribes. Let us not compel them, by withdrawing the protection which we have pledged. Theirs must be the pain of departure, and the hazard of the change. They are men, and have the feelings and attachments of men; and if all the ties which bind them to their country and their homes are to be rent asunder, let it be by their own free hand. If they are to leave forever the streams in which they have drank, and the trees under which they have reclined; if the fires are never more to be lighted up in the council house of their chiefs, and must be quenched forever upon the domestic hearth, by the tears of the inmates, who have there joined the nuptial feast, and the funeral wail—if they are to look for the last time upon the land of their birth, which drank up the blood of their fathers, shed in its defence—and is mingled with the sacred dust of children and friends—to turn their aching vision to distant regions enveloped in darkness and surrounded by strangers—let it be by their own free choice, not by the coercion or a withdrawal of the protection of our pledged faith. They can best appreciate the dangers and difficulties which beset their path. It is their fate which is impending; and it is their right to judge, while we have no warrant to falsify our promise.

It is said that their existence cannot be preserved; that it is the doom of Providence that they must perish. So, indeed, must we all; but let it be in the course of nature, not by the hand of violence. If, in truth, they are now in the decrepitude of age, let us permit them to live out all their days, and die in peace; not bring down their grey hairs in blood to a foreign grave.

I know, sir, to what I expose myself. To feel any solicitude for the fate of the Indians may be ridiculed as false philanthropy and morbid sensibility. Others may boldly say, “their blood be upon us,” and sneer at scruples, as a weakness unbecoming the stern character of a politician. If, sir, in order to become such, it be necessary to divest the mind of the principles of good faith and moral obligation, and harden the heart against every touch of humanity, I confess that I am not, and, by the blessing of Heaven, will never be—a politician.

Sir, we cannot wholly silence the monitor within. It may not be heard amidst the clashing of the arena, in the tempest and convulsions of political contentions; but its “still small voice” will speak to us—when we meditate alone at eventide—in the silent watches of the night—when we lie down and when we rise up from a solitary pillow—and, in that dread hour, when, “not what we have done for ourselves, but what we have done for others” will be our joy and our strength; when—to have secured, even to the poor and despised Indian a spot of earth upon which to rest his aching head—to have given him but a cup of a cold water, in charity, will be a greater treasure than to have been the conquerors of kingdoms, and lived in luxury upon their spoils.

FUNERAL HONORS TO GEN. SMYTH.

After the sitting was opened:—

A message having been received from the House of Representatives, by their clerk, announcing the demise of the honorable ALEXANDER SMYTH, one of the Representatives in Congress from the State of Virginia:—

Mr. TYLER, of Virginia, rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

The death of ALEXANDER SMYTH, just announced to us, leaves a considerable void in society. For the long period of probably forty years, he has been engaged in public life. His services in the Virginia Legislature will long be remembered, while his career in the House of Representatives will best attest his character. Possessing fine talents, with a mind logical and precise, his manners were retiring and unobtrusive. If he did not possess the suaviter in modo, he undeniably possessed the fortiter in re. His speeches, delivered in the various stations which he has filled, will survive as the best monument of his virtue, industry, and his intellectual firmness and strength. With high claims to public preferment, he preferred to rest for his support upon the people of the district in the service of which he has died, and that people have over and over again awarded to him the highest meed of their approbation, and know best how to estimate his services. As a mark of respect to his memory, I move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the honorable ALEXANDER SMYTH, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia, this day, at twelve o'clock; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning, and wear crape round the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; and then,

On motion of Mr. TAZEWELL, of Virginia, the Senate adjourned.

MASSACHUSETTS' CLAIM.

The bill to authorize the payment of the claim of the State of Massachusetts, for militia services during the late war, having been taken up—

Mr. BENTON, as Chairman of the Military Committee, by which the bill had been reported, rose to explain it. He said the claim was founded on militia services rendered during the late war, and had been thirteen years before the Federal Government for payment. It had been in a continued state of examination, either by Executive officers or by committees of Congress, during all that time; and the results of these examinations had been uniformly the same, namely, that a part of the claims rest on the same principles on which claims from other States rested which have been paid, and of course ought to be paid also. The brief history of these examinations and results, is this: these claims were first presented at the War Office in 1817, and filed for examination. In 1822, the delegations in Congress from Massachusetts and Maine presented a memorial to the President, asking an examination and settlement of them. In 1823, the third auditor of the Treasury was directed to audit them, and to proceed on the same principles which had governed the settlement of like claims from other States. In 1824, the President [Mr. MONROE] having carefully examined the proceedings of the auditor, brought the claims before Congress in a special message, and recommended that provision should be made for their payment, to the extent that like claims had been paid from other States. This message went to the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, which reported favorably; but as their report did not ripen into a law, the subject was referred again to the same committee in 1826, and a favorable report again made. That payment of the claims, to a certain extent, ought to be made, seemed then to be agreed on all hands; but the accounts were numerous, complex, and depending upon variety of testimony, as well as on different principles. A body so numerous as the House of Representatives, found it difficult to examine particulars and liquidate a long account; and they did what every public body ought to do under the like circumstances: they referred it to the accounting officers to make the examination, and report the amount which ought to be paid. The reference was to the War Department, and the third auditor was charged with the business. He occupied himself about it for nearly eighteen months, a period of time which I mention particularly, to show the degree of care which a most careful officer bestowed upon the examination, and reported in favor of about one half of the amount of these claims. The entire claim was for eight hundred and forty-three thousand six hundred and one dollars and thirty-four cents; the report is for four hundred and thirty thousand seven hundred and forty-eight dollars and twenty-six cents. To the amount thus allowed, the bill now before the Senate is limited. It proposes to pay what the third auditor has found to be due under the reference made to him. I consider this bill in the light of an appropriation, to meet a liquidated demand. The third auditor is the officer of the Government; he has adjusted the account under the instructions of the House of Representatives; and the payment, unless his settlement can be impeached, would seem to follow as a matter of course. I have seen no reason to impeach his settlement. The committee to whom it was referred saw none. References to the opinions of a committee may not be strictly regular; but, in this case, it may be allowable, and I can say that our opinion was unanimous in reporting this bill. Prejudices have prevailed against these claims. I have felt these prejudices. I have seen the time when I never expected to vote for their payment. These prejudices continued until it became my duty to examine them; and that examination has resulted with me, as with all others who made it, in the conviction that a large part of them ought to be paid.

* Extract from an official report of Governor Clark, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, dated March 1, 1820.

“The condition of many tribes west of the Mississippi is the most pitiable that can be imagined. During several seasons, in every year, they are distressed by famine, in which many die for want of food, and, during which, the living child is often buried with the dead mother, because no one can spare it as much food as would sustain it through its helpless infancy. This description applies to Sioux, Ojegas and many others, but I mention those because they are powerful tribes, and live near our borders, and my official station enables me to know the exact truth. It is in vain to talk to people in this condition about learning and religion.”

Mr. SILSBEE said, that after the satisfactory explanation of this case, which had been given by the Senator from Missouri, who presides over the committee which had just investigated it, he should be much more brief in his remarks upon it than he might otherwise have been. But as the bill was introduced by me, [said Mr. S.] in the discharge of what I conceived to be my duty to the State which I have the honor in part to represent in this body, it may be expected of me, in pursuance of that duty, to say a few words in its support.

This Massachusetts' claim [said Mr. S.] is a claim not only of one, but of two sovereign States of the Union—Massachusetts and Maine; for military expenditures by the people of those States, (then forming but one State,) for the defence of the State against a foreign and common enemy. This claim has been over thirteen years under the scrutiny of the different branches of this Government. In February, 1817, it was presented for payment to the executive branch of the Government; and at the succeeding session of Congress of 1817-18, it was presented to the consideration of the House of Representatives, and it has been before that branch of the Legislature, or the Executive branch of the Government, or travelling by the side of Presidential messages, or Congressional resolutions, from one to the other, from that time to this, receiving favorable reports from each, and from all, but no payment yet from either. Under these circumstances, and aware of the just complaints of the Government and people of Massachusetts of such delay, I considered it to be my duty, after consultation with the other Representatives of that State in Congress, to present this claim, for the first time, to the consideration of the Senate, where, it was hoped, a prompt and just decision would be obtained upon it.

This claim has been presented and urged for payment, as a fair and just one, not only by the administration of Massachusetts, under which it originated, but by every succeeding administration of that State, from that time to the present moment; in the course of which time we have had four different Chief Magistrates in Massachusetts, all of whom were perfectly acquainted with the whole history of this claim; and two of them (the late Governor Eustis and the present Governor Lincoln,) ardent supporters of the late war and of the measures of the General Government connected with it. We have also, had, in the course of this time, sixteen different Legislatures in Massachusetts, coming annually from the people, and possessing their views upon the subject; and every one of these Legislatures have, I believe, united with the different Executives of the State, in support of this claim.

Although ready and willing, sir, to go into a full investigation of this claim, I shall avoid trespassing so far upon the time of the Senate as would be requisite for that purpose, unless it becomes necessary, for the present, at least, to a few remarks in relation to it. Although the enemy was on our coast, capturing our shipping and other property, and occasionally committing depredations upon some of our most exposed towns, in the course of the years 1812 and 1813, yet it was not until 1814, and after the peace in Europe, that we became seriously apprehensive of invasion. And the expenditures embraced by this claim, with the exception of two or three thousand dollars, accrued after April, 1814, and the bill now under consideration embraces only such parts of the claim as, after the most rigid and prolonged scrutiny, by every branch of the Government, have been found to come within the rules and principles which have been observed in the settlement of similar claims of other States—not what has been asked by the creditor, but what the debtor admits to be due. Sir, but for these expenditures, the State of Massachusetts must, and would have been invaded, and much of its property captured or destroyed; for, as is shown by one of your own officers then in command there, there were not a sufficient number of United States troops within the State of Massachusetts, if they had all been drawn to one point, to man the guns of one of its fortifications; and, sir, here let me add, that by a portion of these expenditures, the property of the United States was prevented falling into the hands of the enemy. Yes, sir, your navy yards at Charlestown and Portsmouth, and the public ships then lying at them, were defended, and successfully defended, by the militia of Massachusetts, as can be shown by the correspondence of your own officers. [Here Mr. SILSBEE read extracts of letters from General Dearborn, from Commodore Bainbridge, from the Adjutant General of Massachusetts, and from the then Secretary of the Navy.]

The Indians.

[SENATE.]

Sir, [continued Mr. S.] during the whole summer of 1814, the whole seacoast of Massachusetts was kept in a constant state of alarm, so much so, that but little else was thought of by any one but the defence of his person, his property, and his country: the enemy was not only on our coast, but often in our harbors; invasion and the destruction of property were daily and nightly apprehended, during the whole season; to prevent which, guards were established on the whole extent of the coast; many of the militia constantly on duty, not only the militia on the seaboard, but that of the interior, were often marched to the coast and kept on duty, for the protection of the public, as well as private property, which was there located, and the whole militia of the State under orders to march at the shortest notice. A large portion of these services were rendered on sudden and pressing occasions, to meet "invasion, or well founded apprehensions of invasion," and are such as come clearly within the class of claims which has been allowed and paid to other States. Sir, no one who has examined the documents appertaining to this claim, can, I think, have failed to be convinced, that during the summer of 1814, the State of Massachusetts was in constant and imminent danger of invasion, and without any other means of defence than its own militia, acting, some under United States' officers, some under their own officers, and all acting in concert and upon plans of operation, mutually agreed upon by the officers of the United States, (both military and naval) and the officers of the State. By this union of council and operation, the State was protected from invasion by the people of the State, at their own expense, and at less expense than it could otherwise have been done, for which they ask such remuneration, and only such, as has been made for the like services, rendered by their fellow-citizens of other States; they expect no less, they ask no more; but, sir, they have been asking for this a long time.

[Mr. SILSBEE here gave a statement of the proceedings upon this claim, by the executive and legislative branches of the General Government, from its first presentation in February, 1817, to the present time, and read extracts from the reports of the different committees of the House of Representatives, to which it had been referred in 1818, in 1824, and in 1826; also from the special messages of the late President Monroe, of 1823, 1824, and 1825, and from the resolution of the House of Representatives of December, 1826, under the authority of which the report of the Third Auditor was made, upon which the bill before the Senate was founded.]

It is shown by these documents, [said Mr. S.] which have been furnished by the Government of the United States, in relation to this claim, that the late President Monroe, (than whom no one knew more of its history, and who had no reason to entertain predilections for it) in three special messages to Congress, recommended its settlement and payment, according to the rules by which similar claims of other States had been adjusted and paid. And every committee of Congress, to whom it has been referred, (and it has now been under the consideration of four different committees) have been led to the same conclusion, and have reported that it ought to be paid to that extent. The amount specified in the bill now under consideration, is that which has been found to be due, by an investigation of the most scrutinizing officer of this Government, under a resolution of the House of Representatives, founded upon the recommendations and reports just mentioned. And it is now before the Senate with these high testimonials in its support. Such testimonials, emanating from such sources of information in relation to this claim, seem to be sufficient to show that it needs only to be examined, to be approved by all, of which, if any doubt remained, that doubt must be considered as entirely removed by the frank and honorable avowal of the Chairman of the Committee; that the examination which he has been called to make of it, has removed the unfavorable impressions which he had previously entertained towards it, so far, at least, as to satisfy him of the justice of passing this bill. Deeming it needless at present to trouble the Senate with a more detailed representation of this claim, I shall forbear doing so, unless it should hereafter become necessary. I shall, however, willingly meet any questions that may be proposed, and afford any and every information I possess in relation to it, which may be asked.

Mr. HOLMES made also a few remarks in explanation and support of the claim; after which

The question was put, and the bill ordered to a third reading without a division.

THE INDIANS.

The consideration of the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi, was resumed.

Mr. ADAMS said he was sure that all must feel embarrassment in addressing, for the first time, the Senate of the United States; and, especially, on a subject of so much importance as that now under consideration. But mine [said he] is greatly increased from never before having been a member of a legislative assembly. But I feel great encouragement, from a knowledge that this circumstance will increase towards me the generous indulgence and courtesy for which this body is so distinguished; and I feel that it will be owing to that indulgence that I will be able to lay before the Senate the few imperfect observations which occur to me on the subject before us.

The question, which is submitted to us by the bill itself, as reported to the Senate by the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, is this: whether Congress will authorize the President of the United States to exchange territory belonging to the United States west of the river Mississippi, and not within the limits of any State or organized Territory, with any tribe of Indians, or the individuals of such tribe, now residing within the limits of any State or Territory, and with whom the United States have any existing treaties, who may voluntarily choose to make such exchange for the lands which such tribe of Indians, or the individuals of such tribe, at present occupy; to compensate individuals of those tribes for improvements made upon the lands they now occupy; to pay the expenses of their removal and settlement in the country west of the Mississippi, and provide them necessary subsistence for one year thereafter.

The authority contemplated by the bill is, to make the exchange of territory with those Indians, and with those only, who are willing to make it. The friends of this measure do not wish to vest power in the President of the United States to assign a district of country west of the Mississippi, and, by strong arm, to drive these unfortunate people from their present abode, and compel them to take up their residence in the country assigned to them. On the contrary, it is their wish that this exchange should be left to the free and voluntary choice of the Indians themselves.

Is there any thing alarming in this proposition? any thing to cause that fear and trembling for the fate of the unfortunate Indian, which have been manifested in the opposition to this bill? Is there any thing to call forth those animated denunciations against those who disregard and violate the faith of treaties? As if those who support this measure were ready to prostrate at the foot of their own sordid interest the honor of the nation, and inflict a stain upon her escutcheon that all the waters of the Mississippi could not wash out. I confess, for my own part, I can see nothing in the provisions of the bill before us unbecoming the character of a great, just, and magnanimous nation. And, indeed, if I had heard only so much of the eloquent speeches of those who oppose the passage of the bill as enjoined upon us the strictest good faith in the observance of treaties, I would have concluded that they were the warmest advocates of the proposed measure.

As early as the year 1802, the United States entered into a compact with the State of Georgia, which compact was ratified in the most solemn manner, being approved by the Congress of the United States and by the Legislature of the State of Georgia. By this agreement, the United States obtained from the State of Georgia a cession of territory sufficient, in extent, to form two large States, and in part consideration for such an immense acquisition of territory, agreed, on their part, in the most solemn manner, to extinguish, for the use of Georgia, the Indian title to all the lands situated within the limits of that State, "as soon as the same could be done peaceably and upon reasonable terms." Although this is not, in the technical sense of the term, a treaty entered into by the United States with the State of Georgia, yet it is an agreement upon a full and valuable consideration; and good faith on the part of the United States requires its fulfilment, according to its true spirit and intent. The bill under consideration proposes a mode by which this agreement may be performed; by which the Indian title to all the lands within the boundaries of that State may be extinguished, peaceably, and upon reasonable terms. Peaceably, because it is only to operate upon those Indians who are willing to remove. And upon reasonable terms, because they are to receive other lands in exchange for those which they give up; just compensation for improvements made by them; the expense of their removal and settlement paid, and subsistence for one year furnished them. Would it not, therefore, have been reasonable to suppose, that those who have said so much about the high and sacred obligation of treaties, and how essentially the great name of every nation depends upon their strict observance, would be amongst the foremost and warmest supporters of the bill under consideration? And certainly it was matter of astonishment to me to find that all their mighty efforts had another aim. And, as an excuse for that, we are told, that although this bill appears harmless on the face of it; that although all its exterior seems well ordered, and no objection can be urged against it in the abstract, yet there are facts and circumstances so connected with it as to make it in the highest degree objectionable, and to justify the unsparing animadversions which have been bestowed upon it.

The following portion of the message of the President of the United States to the present Congress, has been read, and urged as one of the causes of alarm.

[Here Mr. A. read several paragraphs from the message to which he had alluded.]

The principle insisted on in this part of the message, denying to the Indian tribes within the limits of the States the rights of separate government; recommending to them to remove beyond the Mississippi, and declaring to them distinctly, that, if they remain within the limits of the States, they must submit to the laws of the States within whose limits they reside, is contrary to the provisions of the treaties made by the United States with several of those tribes, and now existing in full force—particularly with the Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees; that the acts of the Legislatures of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, extending the laws of those several States over the Indians residing within their respective limits, are also in violation of those treaties; that they are calculated to compel the emigration of those tribes: and, to counteract and defeat the operation of the opinion expressed by the President of the United States, and this improper legislation, as it is called, of those States, an amendment has been offered. The amendment is in these words: "Provided, always, that, until the said tribes or nations shall choose to remove, as by this act is contemplated, they shall be protected in their present possessions, and in the enjoyment of all their rights of territory and government, as heretofore exercised and enjoyed, from all interruption and encroachments."

This is, perhaps, the first attempt, by an act of Congress, to operate directly on the legislation of the States, which has been made since the institution of this Government, and it is to be hoped it will be the last. The avowed intention is, to interpose the power of the Federal Government to prevent the action of the laws of the States in question, within their own acknowledged boundaries, and to exempt from the influence of those laws a portion of the population. It has sometimes happened to States that acts of their Legislatures have been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, and, consequently, inoperative and void in the particular case in question. The Supreme Court, however, act on a single statute at a time; but, in the mode proposed by the amendment in question, Congress may sweep off whole codes in a moment by a single clause. It is plain, then, if the bill pass with this amendment, that the laws of the States and of the Federal Government must come into collision. The bill speaks of tribes residing within any State or Territory, and with whom the United States have existing treaties. Treaties exist between the United States and Indians residing within the States of New York, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, and the Legislatures of all these States have extended all, or a part of their laws, over those Indian tribes respectively. The collision which will arise between the laws of the Federal Government and of the States will extend to four of the States of the Union. And if the federal law be constitutional, the President of the United States will be bound by his oath of office to see that it shall be faithfully executed. And gentlemen have told us that, if milder means will not answer the purpose, the strong arm of the Government must be employed; by which I understand that a military force must be arrayed against the contumacious States, to bring them into subjection, and to compel them to acknowledge the right of the Indian tribes to live under their own usages, government, and laws.

Let us see what will be the practical operation of this Indian protective system. According to the usages and laws of the nations of Indians residing within the State of New York, witchcraft is declared to be a crime, and capital punishment is to be inflicted upon those who are found guilty. But, by the laws of the State of New York, extended over those tribes, the infliction of such punishment by any one of the tribe, for such supposed offence, is declared to be murder, and the offender is liable to be convicted, and to suffer the penalty of the law in such cases. Here is a conflict of laws, and under the proviso in question, the Indian tribe, upon complaint made to the Executive of the United States, to see that they should be protected in the enjoyment of their own government, usages, and laws, and upon the refusal of the State of New York to yield to the persuasion of the President of the United States, and to surrender all claim to govern the people within her limits—the strong arm of this Government—its military force must be interposed to protect the Indian tribes, and to see that they enjoy the usage of punishing their own witches in their own way.

By a law of the Cherokee republic, a plurality of wives is authorized: but, by the laws of Georgia or Alabama, this is regarded as a crime, and those who are guilty are liable to severe punishment. But, by the guarantee contemplated in this proviso, if the laws of Georgia or Alabama were to interpose between the privileged Cherokee, and the enjoyment of his fifty wives, all that would be necessary to ensure that enjoyment, would be to call on the Executive Department of this Government, point to the guarantee, claim its execution, and, if nothing else will do, the claims of Georgia and Alabama must be silenced by the military force of the nation.

The Indians.

By a usage of the Choctaws, homicide is punishable with death in all cases, with a single exception, which exception is when one man kills another in a ball play. But, by the laws of Mississippi, it is excusable when done in self-defence, and to save the life of the person attacked. But if the laws of that State were to interfere to prevent the life of an innocent man from falling a sacrifice to this absurd and barbarous usage, the laws of the Union would be violated, and the State must submit to chastisement for an act of humanity.

But the argument on the other side shows this proviso to be unnecessary. For, it is insisted that, by virtue of treaties now existing, the separate existence as nations, of the several Indian tribes within the limits of those States, is acknowledged, and that, in their character of nations, the United States have promised them protection; and that, by virtue of the obligation of treaties, this protection ought to be extended to them. If such treaties exist, and they are the supreme law of the land, then no additional supremacy can be conferred by the proviso, and no additional obligation can be imposed on the Executive Department of the Government, to do that which is already enjoined by treaties. The argument, therefore, shows all further legislation to be unnecessary.

The Cherokee tribe of Indians having erected an independent Government within the limits of the States of Georgia and Alabama, and those two States claiming the rights of exclusive sovereignty within their respective limits, extended their laws over those Indians. Under these circumstances, an appeal was made to the Executive of the United States by those Indians, claiming to be protected in the enjoyment of the Government which they had established for themselves. The question was then submitted for the decision of the President of the United States, and, under the oath which he had taken to support the constitution, he determined that no such Government could be erected without the consent of the States within which it was formed. The question is, therefore, decided as to them. If it was unconstitutional, under the state of things which then existed, it would continue to be unconstitutional under the proposed amendment; and it would never do for Congress to reconsider a question of constitutional law, decided by either of the other distinct and independent departments of the Government, upon a question properly submitted to such departments, and reverse that decision. If they can do so in regard to the Executive, why not in regard to the Judiciary? For both the Executive and Judiciary derive the power of decision from the same source, not because it is expressly said in the constitution, that the Judiciary or the Executive shall disregard a law not made in conformity to that instrument, but because each is required to take an oath to support the constitution as the paramount law; and when any statute or any treaty is made or passed contrary to its provisions, each of those departments before which the question may arise, is bound to declare it a nullity. The Executive has, then, upon the matter fairly submitted to it, decided the constitutional question, as to the Government erected by the tribe of Cherokees, and no law which we can pass can possibly change the principle of that decision. It rests upon the authority of the constitution itself.

But it seems that, for the sake of doing justice to Indian rights, all things are to be resolved into their original elements, and we are called upon to decide the subject before us according to principles of abstract justice.

The vast country which now forms the United States, with the exception of Louisiana, was, at one time, subject to the jurisdiction and sovereign dominion of Great Britain. She claimed it by right of discovery and conquest, and, added to this, the superior claims of an agricultural over a savage and barbarous people. This title has always heretofore been considered sufficient by the jurist and the statesman, and no inquiry beyond it has been thought necessary, or even tolerable; and it has been left to the sympathies—the mistaken sympathies, as I must call them—of the present day, to call up this title of the savage from its sleep of ages, and urge it on this floor and elsewhere, as prior and paramount to that of civilized nations.

If gentlemen are really in earnest in the opinions which they have expressed; if the remonstrants who have loaded your table with their petitions, are really in earnest; if the pamphleteers who have inundated the country with abuse upon the present administration, and poured out the phials of their unsparing wrath upon Georgia, are really in earnest; if they really believe that civilized man has lawlessly usurped the territory and dominion of the barbarian, then let them show their sincerity and consistency, by asking for this much injured and almost exterminated race, that ample measure of justice which the magnanimity of their professions purport; let them not only ask, but do justice; call them back from the deep wilderness to which they have been driven; restore to them this fair and happy land, from which they have been cruelly expelled; give them up your fields, houses, cities, temples of justice, and halls of legislation. All I have to ask is, that those whose sense of justice is with them a principle so prevailing, shall begin this retrograde to barbarism at home; that they shall first surrender that which more immediately concerns themselves, and over which they would seem to have a more direct control, and then call upon us to follow an example so worthy. But I think it is not difficult to foresee that this work of restoration would not proceed far before the pretended philanthropist would quarrel with his own rule of abstract justice, and content himself with permitting things to remain as they are.

But, it is said, it was the policy of Great Britain, and most of her colonies, to procure cessions of territory from the Indians by treaty; and, of course, in the settlement of this great account of domain and empire with the red man, credit should be allowed for all that was thus acquired. But, according to the rule of hard morality and abstract justice, which we have been taught on this occasion by the advocates of Indian rights, there is but slight difference in the title to that which has been acquired by conquest in the strictest sense of the term, and that which has been acquired by treaty and cession: for I am sure that, if the history of those transactions could be truly known, it would appear, that, if the one originated in force, the other was obtained by fraud. In the one case, the physical strength of the Indian, his daring courage, and his knowledge of his own terrible mode of war, placed him upon something like terms of equality with the white man; whilst, in the other, his ignorance of negotiation, and the arts, and stratagems, and deceptions, always used upon such occasions, rendered him a blind and easy victim. In the rotunda there are two alto relievos intended to commemorate important events in the history of this unfortunate people, and which, in some degree, illustrate the truth of what I have said. In the one, 1682, the great founder of Pennsylvania is represented in the act of presenting a treaty to his red brethren; with his right hand he grasps that of the chief, with his left he unrolls the treaty. The pipe is withdrawn from the lips of the old Indian, and he is all attention to the earnest talk of the younger. You can see that the whole savage is tamed, and his terrible spirit, the only power with which nature had endowed him, to preserve unmolested the ancient possessions of his fathers, is subdued and conquered by the irresistible superiority of the white man, and that he is ready to subscribe whatever terms may be dictated. And we cannot help thinking, that, without much violence to historical truth, another figure might have been introduced into the group, and we almost expect to see, half concealed behind the lofty elm which overshadows them, the well trained pedestrian ready to set off and measure, with the velocity of a bird, the day's journey which was to bound the ceded territory.*

In the other, we behold that immortal hunter of Kentucky, Daniel Boone, not only immortal from his own deeds and the monument here erected to him, but married to a more enduring immortality in the verse of Byron. We behold him engaged in mortal combat against fearful odds. Having planted his foot on one of the enemy who had fallen before his rifle, he fearlessly braves the uplifted tomahawk that gleams in the hand of the surviving savage; and we tremble lest the deadly weapon should descend ere the intrepid Boon can strike. And thus it is with the poor ill-fated Indian. In the one case, he is subdued, and blindly compelled to yield up his country by the superiority of mental strength. In the other, it is the issue of more doubtful controversy. But the melancholy truth is established, "that the day on which the white man set his foot on these shores, the destiny of the red man was fixed forever."

But how has title derived from Indian tribes been regarded, when urged by individuals in courts of justice? Has it not been considered utterly worthless? How has it been regarded by States, when they were interested in insisting on it? Have they not held it in such low estimate, that not one has ever relied on it as conferring even a shadow of right? A few facts will show this. Disputes with respect to territory and territorial jurisdiction have at various times arisen between different States of this Union. Pennsylvania and Virginia, Pennsylvania and Connecticut, Virginia and North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia, have contested questions of this kind with each other. And controversies of this kind are always conducted with the greatest possible care. The best talents are employed; the greatest research takes place; every color of claim which promises the least avail is set up, and every reason and every argument are urged. Is it known, that, upon any such controversy, a treaty or cession from an Indian tribe, however ancient, has ever been set up to turn the scale even in a case of doubt? I confess that, if such a case has happened, I have not heard of it. On the contrary, those disputes have always turned upon the terms and dates of the charters from the crown, and the external objects called for as designating their locality, and show the opinions of all those concerned, that the title, and the only title, originated with those charters. For surely, in some of those many disputes, priority of Indian cession might have been made a question, if it had not been for the universal opinion that it would be unavailing.

But how did Great Britain regard the rights of Indians? And before I enter upon this part of the subject more particularly, it would be well to state the question which arises out of the acts of the State Legislatures, by which the Indians within their limits are subjected to the laws of the State. Those States do not claim the right of depriving the Indians of any title which they may have to the land or territory they occupy, or of disturbing them in the possession or enjoyment of any other property which belongs to them. Those States only claim the right to legislate over them, as a part of the population subject to their laws. With this question in view, let us inquire what was their situation whilst this country was subject to the jurisdiction of Great Britain. By the proclamation of the 7th of October, 1763, the following provision is made on this subject: "And whereas, it is just and reasonable, and essential to our interest, and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories, as not having been ceded to, or purchased by us, are reserved to them, or any of them, as their hunting ground.

"And we do, hereby, strictly forbid, on pain of our displeasure, all our loving subjects from making any purchases or settlements whatever, or taking possession of any of the lands above reserved, without our special leave and license for that purpose, first obtained."

The first remark which occurs on the provision in this proclamation with regard to the Indians, and the reservation to them of hunting grounds is, that those very hunting grounds are regarded in the instrument itself as the "dominion and territories" of the crown; and the Indian right as an emanation from the crown; and the power to grant "leave and license" to any person to purchase or to take possession of the reserved lands, is clearly and distinctly recognized. Then the question occurs, could Great Britain, consistently with the principle expressed in the proclamation of 1763, legislate over those Indians? or, in other words, could she legislate over every individual of whatever color, habits, or nation, resident within her acknowledged "dominions and territories?" I believe that no one who has any knowledge of the theory of the British constitution will say that she could not so legislate.

Lord Mansfield, in delivering the opinion of the Court in the case of Campbell vs. Hall, reported by Cowper, lays down the following propositions: "That the law and legislative government of every dominion equally affects all persons and all property within the limits thereof, and is the rule of decision for all questions which arise there. Whoever purchases, lives, or sues there, puts himself under the law of the place. An Englishman in Ireland, Minorca, the Isle of Man, or the Plantations, has no privilege distinct from the natives."

The sixth and last proposition is, that if the King (and when I say the King, I always mean the King without the concurrence of Parliament) has a power to alter the old and to introduce new laws, in a conquered country, this legislation being subordinate, that is, subordinate to his own authority in Parliament, he cannot make any new change contrary to fundamental principles. He cannot exempt an inhabitant from that particular dominion, as, for instance, from the laws of trade, or from the power of Parliament, or give him privileges exclusive of his other subjects, and so in many other instances that might be put.

The question in the case in which these propositions are laid down, arose out of the proclamation of 1763, in regard to the inhabitants of Grenada, the government of which was erected by that proclamation. And here the principle is not only asserted, that the law and legislative government of every dominion is supreme over all persons and property within its limits, but that the King himself cannot exempt any inhabitant from the power of Parliament.

In regard to the other colonies in America, the power to legislate was conferred by the charters from the crown; and, I believe, no doubt was ever entertained, during the existence of the colonial government, that the Legislatures thereof had full power to enact laws for the government of the Indians within their respective limits; and if a question arose at all, it could not have been a question of power, but a question as to what kind of law was proper and expedient in the particular case. And, accordingly, we find that Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, all legislated on the subject of Indian affairs, and no exception seems ever to have been taken to the exercise of that power.

*I have heard it said, that, in one of the treaties negotiated in early times with a tribe of Indians residing in Pennsylvania, and by which a large tract of country, situate on the Delaware river, was acquired, the agreement was, that the Indians ceded to the proprietor of the colony so much territory as lay on the river above a certain point, and as far up as a man could walk in a day. The fact was, that, between the points, the river made a great bend, and much could be gained to the proprietor by walking in a direct line. This was the course pursued. But this was not all. The most expeditious pedestrian was procured to walk the boundary. The Indians set off with him, but long before night they were tired out, and he was left to determine the distance as he pleased.—Note by Mr. A.

The Indians.

[SENATE.]

Thus stood the matter as to the power to legislate over Indians within the limits of the colonial governments prior to the Revolution. A power undisputed and indisputable.

The United States declared themselves independent on the 4th day of July, 1776. The arms of the Union were victorious. Great Britain was conquered. This conquest was followed by a definitive treaty of peace in 1783. This treaty acknowledged the independence of the United States. And all our statesmen and jurists consider that the independent sovereignty of each State in the Union, respectively, commenced, and must be dated, to all legal purposes, on the 4th day of July, 1776. But it has been said, that whatever was gained by conquest belonged to the conqueror: that the United States were the conqueror, and that all acquisitions accrued to them. I know that this argument was once urged by some of the small States, who had no unpatented lands, as a reason why they should participate equally in the vast regions of ungranted lands, situated within the chartered limits of the larger States. But I never knew it to be urged as a reason to show that sovereignty and legislation were a joint acquisition, and belonged, by right of conquest, to the United States, and not to the States respectively. On the contrary, I believe it has never been doubted, much less denied, that the States, respectively, from the declaration of independence, possessed every attribute of sovereignty. That each State was sovereign within her own limits, to the same extent that Great Britain was before the declaration of independence. The capacity to affect, by her legislative government, all persons and all property within her limits, is an essential attribute of that sovereignty which belongs to every State. I must conclude, therefore, that the Indians within the limits of the States did not form an exception, and that, subsequent to the declaration of independence, the States had the power to legislate over them.

But it is insisted that, by the articles of confederation, the States surrendered up this power to Congress, and that any exercise of such power by the States after that was void. One of the clauses of that instrument relied on in support of this argument, is in these words: "That Congress shall have power to regulate the trade and manage all affairs with the Indians not members of any of the States; provided that the legislative rights of any State within its own limits are not infringed or violated."

During the continuance of the articles of confederation in the years 1785 and 1786, the treaties of Hopewell with the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, were entered into. And, without going into the particular stipulations of those treaties, which is unnecessary in the examination of the power vested in Congress under the clause of the articles of confederation in question, it may be taken for granted, that the treaties either infringe the legislative rights of the States, within the limits of which the tribes with whom the treaties were made, resided, or that they do not so infringe those rights. If the latter, the States are left free to legislate as if no such treaties had been made. If the former, then Congress had no power to enter into any stipulation with the Indian tribes, by which the legislative rights of the States within their own limits would be infringed or violated; and such stipulations are without authority, and, as regards the States affected by them, are absolutely void. What are the legislative rights of a State? Are they not those rights, or rather that power, by which a State dictates the rule of civil conduct to every rational being within her territorial limits? This power is expressly reserved by the clause in question—not in regard to a particular district, and to a particular description of people, but throughout her whole boundaries, and over every subject within them. The proposition, therefore, for which I insist, is, that, if the treaties referred to abridge this legislative power in regard to any description of people residing within the limits of the States, as to the States themselves, these limitations of power are void, and the States may legislate as if no such limitation had been imposed; and the whole argument on the other side against State legislation over the Indians, which is made to depend upon the stipulations of the treaties of Hopewell, goes upon the very ground, that by those treaties the legislative power of the States is limited; which, as I have endeavored to show, is a self-destroying argument.

But the question arises,—Were those treaties binding on the United States? I answer, unquestionably they were. That the United States were bound, either to execute the treaty specifically, or, if they had not power to do that, they were bound to give compensation. And it has been admitted, that, if the United States were under two obligations, that which was first in point of time must be specifically executed, if both cannot be so executed; and that the subsequent obligation can only be discharged by indemnity, and that good faith requires no more. Apply this rule to the present question. Was not the obligation on the United States, commencing with the articles of confederation themselves, to preserve from all violation and infringement the legislative rights of the States within their limits, prior to any stipulation inconsistent with such obligation in the treaties above referred to? and, therefore, according to the rule as admitted, the States must be preserved in their right and power to legislate; and from any injury arising from this cause to the Indians, they can only call on the United States to indemnify them.

It is insisted that those tribes of Indians are nations capable of making treaties. If so, surely it would be proper for the States to say, in this controversy, to those tribes of Indians—you were bound, when you entered into treaty stipulations with the United States, to know the limits of their power; and if in those stipulations they have exceeded their power, you are properly chargeable with the knowledge that they did so exceed their power. In a case of this kind, compensation is complete justice. If A covenant to convey to B a certain house and land, to which A has no title, and cannot procure one, so as to comply with his covenant, the only satisfaction which B could obtain would be damages for the breach of the contract. If B, in the case supposed, had no notice of the want of power on the part of A to make the conveyance, it might be considered as a hard case that he could not obtain specific performance; but if he was chargeable with such notice, then ample justice would be done him by compensation in damages.

But it is said, according to the articles of confederation, that "the United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war;" and that, in the constitution of the United States, power is also given to the United States to declare war, and that the treaties in question are valid under these powers.

I admit, that, whenever the relation of war arises between the United States and any other party, whether it be a tribe of Indians, the leaders of an insurrection—for insurrection might be so formidable as to create the relation of war—or an independent nation, the United States may conclude such war by a treaty of peace. But surely this is a limited power, and the United States could not, constitutionally, agree to every kind of condition which might be proposed; otherwise it would follow, that, whenever war existed, the President and Senate would have the constitutional power to destroy the rights of any or every State in the Union. And yet all will agree, that all the departments of the Government of the United States combined could not take away any of the reserved rights of the States. Thus, if in a treaty of peace made with an Indian tribe residing within the limits of the State of Georgia, the right of that State to legislate over those Indians could be taken away, what would prevent the treaty-making power, if so disposed, from taking away the power of that State to legislate over the Dutch, or Irish, or slaves, within the State. If the power of abridging the legislative rights of the States is once admitted to exist in the General Government, under any circumstances of fact, those circumstances may always be brought about, and the States would, ere long, hold all their powers at the will of the United States. Suppose that, in the treaty concluded by our commissioners at Ghent, a condition had been inserted that the State of Pennsylvania should not exercise the power of legislation over the English resident within the limits of that State. A state of things might have existed which would have rendered it imprudent and impolitic for Pennsylvania to assert and exercise the power. But, as soon as that state of things passed away, and she was relieved from the necessity which might have induced her to abstain from the exercise of that power, could any one contend that the treaty could have any legal and binding force upon her? On the contrary, would it not be void, as to the State, from the beginning? And if any obligation arose out of such a treaty, would it not be a matter to be adjusted by the United States, and in which Pennsylvania would have no concern, any more than any other State in the Union?

Suppose the United States were to conclude a war with an Indian tribe, by which they would stipulate, that, notwithstanding the tribe resided within the limits of a State, that State should not legislate over them, but that they should be governed exclusively by their own laws and usages? This would be a case of express stipulation: and while the nation were formidable; while they were capable of exciting terror and alarm among the people of the State within whose limits they were situated; the State, out of motives of policy, would not attempt to exert her legislative power over them; not because the constitutional power could be surrendered by the treaty; not because the constitutional power to legislate did not exist; but because safety required that it should not be exercised. But if the tribe, from being formidable, were reduced to insignificance, as so many tribes, once so terrible, have been, surely the State could assert her power over them, and compel them to submit to her laws, and that too without any release by the remnant of the nation or tribe to the United States. Whatever obligation rested on the United States would be a matter for them to settle, in which the State would have no more than a common interest with the other States. I know that this reasoning is unsatisfactory to those who refer the decision of this question to their feelings, to their magnanimity, and to principles of abstract justice. But I believe the history of Indian relations will show that this has always been the case. Whilst the tribes were warlike and powerful, no matter what were the stipulations of treaties; no matter how much those treaties infringed the legislative rights of the States; all acquiesced: all submitted. But as soon as they became reduced to a handful; as soon as their power was lost, and they were no longer formidable, they fell from the cognizance of the General Government, and became subject to the control and legislation of the States. What was the situation of the country with regard to Indian tribes before and after the adoption of the constitution, when the policy of treating with them commenced? The whole frontier, from the northern lakes to the southern boundary of Georgia, enclosed by numerous tribes of warlike savages, terrible, not only from their numbers, but from their mode of warfare; sparing neither age, nor sex, nor condition. Under these circumstances, it was not to be wondered at, that the whole population who were exposed to their ravages, and who had suffered from the tomahawk and scalping knife, should send up to the Government of the United States one universal cry for peace. These were not times for scrupulous examination of constitutional questions. And under such circumstances, if treaties were made, which, by their letter, infringed the legislative rights of the States, whatever claim they may give to the Indian tribes for compensation or indemnity as to the United States, they cannot be obligatory on the States. And the time has now arrived when the forbearance of the States is no longer necessary in their opinion, and when it has become worse than visionary to look upon those tribes as independent nations. They have, therefore, extended their laws over them, which is nothing more than the exercise of a power which they always had, and which the United States could not take away, and which the States could not lose by not using.

But, it is said, that the treaties with the several tribes, concluded at Hopewell, and all subsequent treaties, are valid and binding under the following clause of the constitution: "All treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." A treaty cannot be said to be made under the authority of the United States, when its provisions are contrary to the constitution. But when it is consistent with the constitution, then it is under the authority of the United States, and valid. I have endeavored to show that the treaties in question, so far as they affect the legislative sovereignty of the States, are not consistent with the constitution; and as respects the States, they are not binding on them.

But, it is said, that the following clause in the constitution of the United States, "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes," contains no such reservation in favor of the legislative rights of the States. I know that such is the doctrine of those who learn the thousand articles of the constitution from the precedents with which the records of Congress abound. And I know, too, that its sure and inevitable tendency is to unlimited power; and the day is not far distant, when the omnipotence of an American Congress will be as little startling, even to our ears, as the omnipotence of a British Parliament. I tell you, sir, this doctrine is rapidly gaining ground, and if there exist on the part of the States, respectively, no original, ungranted, constitutional power, to interpose for the purpose of arresting the progress of the evil, its march will be triumphant; not because it addresses itself to our patriotism, or our love of the true honor and glory of our country, which consists in the government of a written constitution, but because its patrons carry in both hands the purse of this nation, and buy up the disciples of their faith. And how is that purse supplied? By a levy of two-thirds of all the revenue of the United States, not directly, but indirectly, upon the industry of the South and the Southwest; and thus is the fund created by which this war against her most sacred rights is carried on. And by whom and by what power is this enormous exaction made? By an interested majority in Congress, acting on this express principle, that they have all power, and are every thing; and that the States respectively have no power and are nothing. And the latter have even become familiar with the cry of treason, sounded from these walls against them, because they have dared to say that the majority in Congress had trespassed upon the sacred powers which they had never granted away. Is not this consolidation? Is not this unlimited power? Is it not tyranny? What is the relation which is thus created? Is it not the most odious which can possibly exist? That which exists between the majority who demand and receive, and the oppressed minority who are compelled to pay. Was not this the relation which existed between the colonies and the Parliament of Great Britain? Was not that the subject of complaint in those manly remonstrances which our ancestors presented at the foot of the British throne? Did they not complain that Parliament claimed the right to tax them in all cases whatsoever? Did they not remonstrate against that power? And what answer did they receive? And what answer has the injured South received from this majority in Congress? Are they not the same? An unqualified denial, almost without a hearing. But I have heard gentlemen say the majority will relent; seeing that their measures operate oppressively on a particular portion of the people, they will repeal them. Not until their interest changes: for "when self the wavering balance shake, 'tis never right adjusted." And the marble columns which surround us, compared to a drop of water, is but a feeble comparison to show the unyielding character of an interested majority to the petitions, and prayers, and remonstrances of the oppressed minority; and, unless that interest change, the drop may fall; and fall until eternity's sun shall go down, and not one particle of that human marble will dissolve. No; the power being once gained, the precedent being once established, that majority will claim the right to tax us in all cases whatsoever! The purse which we are every day emptying will be filled again, and from the same source. And with a few miserable dollars of the millions wrung from the cultivators of the soil, judiciously laid out, friends enough will be obtained, even amongst those who are plundered, to preserve this system.

But, to return to the argument, from which, I confess, I have wandered too far. The argument is, that, in the clause of the constitution conferring upon Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with Indian tribes, contains no reservation in favor of the legislative rights of the States. And is it indeed true that the States have no powers but such as are expressly reserved in the constitution of the United States? Is it true that the States, respectively, possessing all the power, all the sovereignty, and granting away a portion of it to another, that the grant will carry the whole, without an express reservation in the instrument as to the residue? Surely this was not the understanding of those who framed or those who adopted the constitution. On the contrary, did they not say, the States have now all the power and sovereignty, and that which they do not give up remains where it is, in the States respectively? If the friends of the constitution had said anything else, if they had said what is now insisted on, that instrument, instead of being adopted by small majorities, would have been rejected by all. The constitution of the United States was not made by the people of the United States, in mass, each one of all that mass having individually the same voice, the same power and influence to make, to adopt, or to reject. On the contrary, it was the work of the States, in their sovereign capacity, and in which capacity the small numbers of the least State in the Union had as much power as the large numbers of the most populous State. Each one was sovereign; no one was more than sovereign. I will be excused for resorting to these first principles of our Government; for it is the duty of those who stand in the minority with respect to the powers claimed and exercised by the Federal Government, whenever a question of that kind arises, to resort to the constitution itself, and to the principles upon which it rests; for this is their only safety. It was, emphatically, for the benefit of the minority it was made. The majority can take care of themselves.

The grant of power in question to Congress is to regulate trade with the Indian tribes; and every power not necessary for the regulation of trade, so far as the Indians are concerned, remains with the States, not only upon the principles which I have mentioned, but by an express reservation, adopted from the most jealous caution, that all "the powers not delegated by the constitution to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." And is it any more necessary, in the regulation of trade with the Indian tribes, that the power of the States to legislate over those residing within their acknowledged limits should be taken away, than that the power to regulate trade with Great Britain and France should take away from the States the power to legislate over Englishmen or Frenchmen residing within the limits of any of the States? But the constitution expressly recognizes the power of the States to legislate over the Indians within their limits.

The second section of the first article of the constitution provides, that "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

The intention of this section of the constitution is to apportion direct taxes and representatives among the several States, and the standard by which that apportionment is to be regulated, is the amount of the population of the States. If the section had stopped thus, "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers," then all Indians, and all other persons within the States, would have been included as a part of the numerable population; otherwise, why exclude "Indians not taxed," and two-fifths of the slaves? If these had not been included in the general expression, the exception was not necessary. Indians being, therefore, a portion of the population of the State, would it not be a strange and absurd proposition to say that the State could not legislate over her own population? But by what power is the tax which is to make the distinction in regard to Indians to be imposed? It must be either by act of Congress or the State Legislature. It cannot be by act of Congress, because Congress, in the following clause, is prevented from imposing any such tax: "No capitation or direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration heretofore directed to be taken." The taxings, therefore, by which Indians are embraced in the enumeration must necessarily precede any capitation imposed by Congress, and must necessarily be by State legislation. From these clauses of the constitution, Indians within the States are regarded as a part of the population of those States, and a tax is contemplated which can only be imposed by State legislation over them.

But there is another reason which shows that the tax to be imposed was not a tax to be imposed by act of Congress, but by act of the State legislation; and that is this, if Congress had the power to impose the tax, they might choose not to exercise the power, so that they could increase or diminish the numbers of the States at pleasure. And they might increase it for the purpose of direct taxes, and reduce it for the purpose of representation.

The Indian resident within the State of New York, with whom the United States have held frequent treaties, and with whom they now have an existing treaty, differing but little in terms from those which exist in relation to the Southwestern tribes, have long since passed under the jurisdiction of that State, and one of them, belonging to the Seneca tribe was actually convicted of murder in a court of the State for having put to death a woman, according to the usages of his tribe, for the supposed crime of witchcraft. And again, in another case, it was decided in the Supreme Court of the State of New York, that an Indian could inherit lands which had been granted in the name of his Indian ancestor; and although the decision of the Supreme Court was reversed by the Court of Errors, it was because there was no law of the State of New York which authorized a purchase from an Indian in the manner in which the purchase was made in that case by the lessor of the plaintiff; clearly, however, acknowledging the power of the State to legislate in regard to Indians and Indian affairs. No complaint has ever been made by the friends of Indian rights against the State of New York, nor against any of the other States to the north or northeast, for legislating over the Indians. Nor has any reason been assigned, nor can any be assigned, why a distinction should be made. It will not do to say that one State has legislated wisely and another unwisely. It is a question of power, and when that is decided, each State, in the exercise of the power, must be governed by its own discretion, as they are in every other act of legislation.

But here we are met by another formidable difficulty. It is said that if the State of Georgia, or any of the old thirteen States, had the power to legislate over the Indians within their limits, yet none of the new States have that power, and that Alabama and Mississippi have transcended their constitutional powers in their acts of legislation in regard to those people. I confess it did not sound gratefully to my ears to hear it asserted on this floor that the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, had been admitted into this Union with powers of legislation more limited than those which belong to other States. I had always supposed that she was admitted upon terms of perfect equality; at all events, so far as she had not voluntarily, in her own sovereign capacity, in convention, expressly agreed to an abridgment of her power. And upon this ground I am willing to place the argument. So far as the State, or the people of the State, in their highest sovereign capacity, in convention, have agreed to a limitation of their legislative power, and the limitation not inconsistent with the constitution of the U. States, the State, whilst that constitution of her own adoption remains, must be bound by it. But what is the process of the reasoning on the other side? It is said that the fifth condition of the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia, in 1802, contains the following provision: "That the territory thus ceded shall form a State, and be admitted as such into the Union, as soon as it shall contain sixty thousand free inhabitants, or at an earlier period if Congress shall think it expedient, on the same conditions and restrictions, with the same privileges, and in the same manner, as is provided in the ordinance of Congress of the 13th day of July, 1787, for the government of the Western territory of the United States, which ordinance shall, in all its parts, extend to the territory contained in the present act of cession, that article only excepted which forbids slavery."

That the act of Congress of March, 1817, to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi territory to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, contains the following provision: "Provided, that the same, when formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the principles of the ordinance of the 13th of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, between the people and States of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, so far as the same has been extended to the said territory by the articles of agreement between the United States and the State of Georgia, or of the constitution of the United States." That the third article of compact in the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, is in the following words: "Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools, and the means of education shall forever be encouraged. The utmost good faith shall always be observed towards the Indians: their lands and property shall never be taken from them without their consent; and in their property, rights, and liberty, they never shall be invaded or disturbed, unless in just and lawful wars authorized by Congress. But laws founded in justice and humanity shall, from time to time, be made, for preventing wrongs being done to them, and for preserving peace and friendship with them." And the argument is, that the States of Alabama and Mississippi have been admitted into the Union upon the express condition that they will not legislate over the Indians within their limits; that this condition is binding upon those States, and that their laws, so far as the Indians are to be effected, are void. The first defect of the argument is, that it is not true in point of fact. The article of compact referred to, authorizes laws founded "in justice and humanity" to be enacted in regard to Indians. Is not this the foundation of all legislative authority—the right to pass laws founded in justice and humanity, and not to pass laws founded in injustice and inhumanity? But the question arises, who is to be the judge of what is just and humane? I insist that there is no limitation but the constitution or legislative discretion. The same article of compact declares "that schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged." Who is to be the judge of the manner and extent of that encouragement? The Legislature, unquestionably. There is no other rule than legislative discretion. And so it is in the other case; and Congress, or the treaty-making power, might as well undertake to call the State to account for not properly exercising the power of encouraging schools and the means of education, as for not properly exercising the power of passing laws founded in justice and humanity in relation to the Indians. The argument has, therefore, no foundation in the true construction of the provisions in the different acts referred to. But as I consider my constituents as having a deep interest in the question which has been raised in regard to their powers as a State, I would not think myself justifiable if I did not investigate more at large the principle upon which the objection rests. By the constitution of the United States, article four, section three, it is provided that "new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union." What is a "State," in the meaning of the constitution? Does it not mean the people composing a political society, in their highest sovereign capacity? I take this definition of the term "State," from a paper of high authority—the report of the Committee of the Virginia House of Delegates at the session of 1799 and 1800, to whom were referred the communications of various States relative to the resolutions of the Assembly of that State, of 1798, concerning the alien and sedition laws. The whole passage is in these words: "It is indeed true that the term States is sometimes used in a vague sense, and sometimes in different senses, according to the subject to which it is applied. Thus it sometimes means the separate sections of territory occupied by the political societies within each; sometimes the particular government established by those societies; sometimes those societies as organized into those particular governments; and lastly, it means the people composing those political societies, in their highest sovereign capacity. Although it might be wished that the perfection of language admitted less diversity in the signification of the same words, yet little inconvenience is produced by it when the true sense can be collected with certainty from the different applications. In the present instance, whatever different construction of the term States in the resolution may have been entertained, all will, at least, concur in that last mentioned; because in that sense the constitution was submitted to the States; in that sense the States ratified it; and in that sense of the term States they are consequently parties to the compact from which the powers of the Federal Government result." And in that sense of the term States, and in that alone, I contend, has Congress the power to admit "new States" into the Union. Certainly, Congress has not power to admit into the Union a political society so crippled by conditions that it would not answer to this meaning of the term. If so, then one State might be admitted into the Union upon condition that only one Senator, or none at all, should be sent to Congress to represent the State; or upon condition that the laws of the State should be subject to the revision of Congress; whilst another might be admitted upon condition of double representation in Congress. The moment, therefore, that power is granted to a society of people within the jurisdiction of the United States to meet in convention and form a constitution for their own government, any conditions which may be added calculated to diminish the essential rights and powers of a State, are absolutely void. Among the powers essential to State sovereignty, is that of legislating over every rational being within the limits of the State, unrestrained except by the constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State itself. If, then, in the acts of Congress authorizing the people of the western part of the Mississippi territory to hold a convention, and admitting them into the Union, such conditions are imposed as diminish this essential right, those conditions are void. But I deny that any such conditions were imposed by those acts. But whilst I say such conditions would be void, there is one subject on which I wish not to be misunderstood. I take it to be true, that the principle of relation applies to new States admitted into the Union, and that, when they are admitted, the society forming them must be considered as having been endowed with the rights of sovereignty from the time when authority was given to hold a convention. If this be correct, then it would follow, that whatever restrictions, not inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, this society, represented in convention, imposes on its own legislature, or the other departments of its organized government, and its own constitution, must be binding upon it until that constitution is changed. In the constitution of the State of Mississippi there is the following provision: "Whereas, it is required by the act of Congress, under which this convention is assembled, that certain provisions should be made by an ordinance of this convention: Therefore, this convention, for and in behalf of the people inhabiting this State, do ordain, agree, and declare, that they forever disclaim all right or title to the waste or unappropriated lands lying within the State of Mississippi; and the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States: and moreover, that each and every tract of land sold by Congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by the order or under the authority of this State, whether for State, county, township, parish, or other purposes whatever, for the term of five years from and after the respective days of sale thereof; and that the lands belonging to the citizens of the United States residing without this State, shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to person residing within the same; that no tax shall be imposed upon lands the property of the United States; and that the river Mississippi, and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same, or into the Gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of this State as to other citizens of the United States, without any duty, tax, impost, or toll, therefor, imposed by this State. And this ordinance is hereby declared irrevocable without the consent of the United States."

According to this ordinance, made a part of the constitution of the State of Mississippi, that State, acting in its highest sovereign capacity in convention, has solemnly disclaimed all title to the waste and unappropriated lands within the State, and declared that they shall be at the disposal of the United States; that they should not be taxed by the State for any purpose, until five years after the sale thereof by Congress; that no lands, the property of the United States, should be subject to taxation; that the lands of non-residents should not be taxed higher than those of residents; that the river Mississippi, and the navigable waters emptying into it, and into the Gulf of Mexico, should remain common highways, without any duty, toll, &c. to be imposed by the State; and that the provisions of this ordinance should remain irrevocable without the consent of the United States. The point on which I wish to be understood is, that, as far as the State has bound itself, whilst acting in convention, the different departments of its Governments are unquestionably bound whilst that constitution remains. The question whether one convention can, by a particular provision, act in derogation of the powers of subsequent conventions, is one which it is unnecessary to discuss. But whilst I admit that the State, in all its departments, is bound as far as it has restricted itself, yet surely it cannot be contended that it is bound beyond that. The constitution which the people of that State framed was submitted to Congress; and they admitted the State, with that constitution, into the Union. There is nothing in that instrument which takes away the power to legislate over the Indians, or modifies that power in any particular. The conclusion, therefore, clearly results, that they have the same power—are subject to the same limitations; that the United States have no more power in relation to those States than in relation to either of the thirteen original States; that they are bound by all the limitations, as it regards the one class of States which obtain in relation to the other. In short, that all the States are upon the same footing, to all intents and purposes; and that their power of legislation are the same in regard to all the free population of the State.

Sir, I have done. My principal object was to vindicate the right of the State, of which I am one of the Representatives, to legislate over all the population within her limits. How I have succeeded, in the humble effort which I have made, will be for the Senate, and all others interested in the question, to decide.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 21, 1830.

POWER OF REMOVAL BY THE PRESIDENT.

The resolution of Mr. BARTON, calling upon the President for the reasons which induced him to remove Theodore Hunt from the office of the Recorder of Land Titles in Missouri, being under consideration—

Mr. McKINLEY moved to lay it on the table until Friday next; but, at the request of Mr. BARTON, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. BARTON said he did not intend to re-argue the general question of the powers of the President to remove the Federal officers, as the Senate had removed the injunction of secrecy from one case, and he had published his argument upon that question, made in secret session on the 17th March. There was [he said] some peculiarity in the tenure of this office, distinguishing this case from those of the officers who hold under the act of 15th May, 1820, for four years. The office of Recorder of Land Titles was established soon after the purchase of Louisiana. Some of his duties are of a ministerial, and some of a judicial nature. It was first held by J. L. Donaldson, Esq. who fell at the battle of North Point, near Baltimore, in the late war, until he resigned and left the country; then by Mr. T. Bates, until he was elected Governor of Missouri, in 1824; then by Mr. Hunt, the present recorder, until some of the office-hunting loungers around the President, had persuaded the President to exceed powers during the present session, and remove, or affect to remove him, to make room for a person now nominated to fill it. From the establishment of the office to the present session of Congress, it has been treated and considered as an office during the good behaviour and fitness of the incumbent. Not coming under the law of 1820, or any other special law, as to the tenure and duration of the office, there was no power of removal but what could be derived from the constitutional obligation of the President to see that the laws be faithfully executed. He admitted that if the incumbent were guilty of official delinquency, or labored under physical or mental disability to perform the duties, the President could suspend his functions for that cause, and place a fit person in his place; the whole proceeding being, like other originating acts of the President, subject to the subsequent sanction or restraint of the Senate, participating in the displacing as well as the appointing of such officers, according to the contemporaneous exposition and original understanding of our form of Government. He denied that in any cases, except the cabinet officers, the federal officers were ever intended to be rendered the servile creatures of the Executive, by being placed under his arbitrary will; but were intended to be freemen, looking to the faithful performance of their duties, and to the protection of the Senate and the laws, for their offices. It was fit [he said] that the officers of a despot should live or die by the breath of their master—that suited such form of government. Not so in a republic—a government of law.

Such was the exposition of the fathers—such his early lesson upon the nature of the government of the United States. A contrary doctrine enabled a President to use the offices of the republic as bribes or weapons; rendered all our public offices, civil and military, dependent for official existence upon a President; and put it in his power to employ or wield the whole official force of his country—nay, the purse and sword of the country, against its liberties, whenever he pleased. We have been told of late, by the majority, that the President is nearer to the people than the Senate—holding for only four years, and the Senate for six; and that, therefore, he should be left to his responsibility, at the end of his term, to the people, without examination or restraint by the Senate during his term. Mr. B. said, he had been taught by the contemporaneous expositions of the fathers, that the long term, and comparatively independent tenure of Senators, was the very reason why the founders of the republic gave to them the high charge of restraining the President at every step during his term, supposing it impossible that such a body, the most permanent and constant of any in the Government, could ever meddle in the election of a President or prostitute their stations to the end of party strife.

But, [said he] look at the inconsistency of the majority! They say the President is responsible to the people at the end of his term; and, by way of enabling the people to judge whether he has, or has not, abused a power entrusted to him for the public safety, they refuse to let the people know for what causes the power was exerted! How can the people tell whether he was right or wrong, when thus kept in the dark?

To remove for cause relating to the official conduct, or to the mental or physical fitness of the incumbent, is a public and a patriotic virtue; but to pervert the power, which we all acknowledge, to the purposes of punishing freemen for their opinions or votes, or to purchase supporters, or reward office-hunting wretches for their prostituted services or acclamations, would be a great offence, a gross violation of our constitutional rights, by a President. How can the people tell for which cause the power was exerted, unless the rights of inquiry into the cause of the removals be tolerated? He re-asserted that the cause, instead of being a state secret, was the very essence of the power to remove at all; and nothing but a consciousness of having violated the duties of a President, and the rights of a citizen, could induce any President to submit to be thus covered up in the dark, if he could find a Senate servile and corrupt enough to screen him from the public eye and examination.

But, [Mr. B. said] he would put this call, moreover, on the ground of public interest, by presenting to the consideration of the Senate the case as it really existed, in relation to this office. There was a combination of speculators, official and unofficial, to make fortunes by getting the unconfirmed Spanish land claims, amounting to some two or three millions of arpents, confirmed by this Government. They were men who had engaged on shares to do this for the old inhabitants, and other claimants. Hitherto, even with the aid of their own interested oaths and official helps, they had been unsuccessful, except in a few small claims. They had made war upon all honest men and public func-tionaries, who had stood as barriers against their schemes, and endeavored to prostrate them. Their object is to have every honest man removed out of their way; and among the rest, this Recorder Hunt, who happens to be both intelligent and honest, so far as he had ever heard or believed. And who would this Senate suppose the coterie proposed in his place? A young man of no known capacity for business, who, like too many youths in slave holding countries, seems to have no honest calling whatever; but relies on the office-hunting trade, or smiles of Presidents or Governors, for support. He has shown himself eminently qualified for the purposes of the land jobbing speculators in these claims, by having been twice convicted of fraudulently concealing the property of a debtor from his creditors, at St. Louis, which, by our law, is a criminal and indictable offence.

A bill [he said] had lately passed the Senate to refer all those unconfirmed claims to the recorder and two commissioners to be appointed by the President and Senate, to re-examine and report upon them. Judging from the samples of Missouri appointments, and particularly the illustrious consul to Chihuahua, and the nomination of a convicted fugitive from the justice of Missouri, to be an Indian agent, he presumed those concerned would find no difficulty in imposing on the President such a board as would perform as well as the courts had done in Arkansas; that is to say, to confirm all the claims really in existence, good and bad; and then confirm all the new ones that might be forged and presented! He spoke [he said] from the documents reported to Congress at this very session, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, when he spoke thus of Arkansas. These considerations not only demanded inquiry into the causes of these passing events; but he protested that, with the present prospect of proscribing common honesty from Missouri, if the bill for the revision of those claims were again before the Senate, he could not, and he would not, vote for it.

He protested against the course of the present administration towards the State of Missouri. All that Missouri had thrown off, in her efforts to purify and elevate her society, seemed to be carefully hunted up, and restored upon her. It seemed to be a general restoration, as if her Botany Bay and her Siberia were to be emptied in her streets, to mark the epoch of this administration! The President must surely be imposed upon by the corps of recommenders and office distributors in Missouri, who have so full a delegation here at present, or else the President was no better than they. The President had sadly departed from his original intention in relation to the offices of the country. He presumed all this was part of the "party discipline" of the day, intended to make the high places low, and the low ones high, to prepare the way to some future Presidential election. The offices of our country are converted into bribes in our elections, and weapons of destruction in our party contests.

Mr. KANE said he would reserve any observations he might have to make on the character and qualifications of the gentleman who had been nominated to fill the vacancy created by the removal of the gentleman alluded to in the resolution, until the proper opportunity had arrived for making them known. This opportunity would hereafter be afforded in Executive session. The objection urged by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BARTON] against the power of the President to remove this officer, presented, in one respect, a new question, and furnished the occasion for a few observations upon the character of the office, the tenure of which was somewhat different in appearance from any to which the attention of the Senate had been heretofore directed. The tenure of the offices heretofore considered, had been fixed, either by the constitution or laws of the United States in terms. Such was not the case here. The office of Recorder of Land Titles for Upper Louisiana was created by law, and the President was authorized to fill it: the consent of the Senate was not by the law required. Yet it had been the practice of Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe to make the nomination to the Senate, and the present Executive had followed the example. The act creating the office says nothing of the term for which the officer should hold the office, nor of its tenure in any way. What, then, is the tenure of any office by law created, in the absence of any particular provision, as to time, or the manner in which its duties are to be discharged? Is it an office for good behavior, or for life? If for good behavior, is this and all other petty officers to be impeached and tried before this high tribunal? Mr. K. said he understood the Senator from Missouri as admitting that the Executive had the power to remove, but then this power was to be exercised only upon sufficient cause; and pray, [said Mr. K.] who is to be the judge of this cause? The Executive alone, or the Executive and Senate united? The President is bound to see the laws faithfully executed; and this duty he cannot perform without a control over his agents. He is responsible for the execution of the high trust reposed in him by the constitution, and in this responsibility, so far as the execution of laws is concerned, the Senate does not participate. Suppose, then, the President should think fit to employ in the public service no man who was a public delinquent, a defaulter, for example, of many years standing, and the Senate should suppose this no objection, this power of removal cannot be exercised at all, because the removing power vested in the President and Senate is neutralized by this division of opinion, and in the mean time, the execution of the laws is rendered injurious in its operation, on account of continued delinquencies. The President may be called to an account for an abuse of his executive authority. How should we, the Senators of this republican confederation, appear, when sitting as his judges, if his plea of justification was filed that the Senate would not consent to the removal of the very officer whose mal-conduct had brought upon him the impeachment? Sir, an Executive officer whose tenure of office is not fixed by law, must, of necessity, hold his commission at the pleasure of the Executive, otherwise the Executive is an irresponsible agent of the Government. The practice of every President showed that such had been their opinion. The practice with regard to the very office in question fully exemplified the correctness of this opinion. [Here Mr. K. read the commission first issued by Mr. Madison, followed by another from Mr. Monroe, both in terms declaring that the appointee held his commission at the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being.] Mr. K. said it had been his intention to discuss the questions of the President's power of removal, on some fit occasion, at large; but he would not trespass upon time allotted for an important discussion, by consuming more of the time of the Senate at present.

Mr. BARTON said, he desired only to reply to a few prominent remarks of the Senator from Illinois. He intimates that Mr. Hunt may be a defaulter. Is not that a good reason for inquiry instead of concealment? Is a citizen to be stabbed in the dark by insinuations, and denied the benefit of the open light? Let us know what the cause is, and if it be a reasonable one, I will even say no more about the removal, although I cannot vote for the person contemplated to take charge of the old land titles and records in Missouri. Mr. Hunt had an old navy account with the Government, many years ago; but asserts his integrity and fairness in that matter, and challenges investigation and light. That account, if it be hinted at, was understood by the former administration that appointed him, I presume. Let us have the causes, be they good or bad. The Senator from Illinois declined saying any thing about the character or qualifications of the proposed successor; as, he says, the nomination is pending. Mr. B. said, he had not gone behind the Executive veil to get the facts he had stated. On the 19th instant, he had received the record of conviction to which he had alluded; and he chose to use it here before he committed it to that prison house whence he found it so very difficult to extract the secret matters of this light-shunning administration. And, for the special edification of the majority, he informed them, that, on the 17th instant, he had received another record of conviction, and of a deeper dye; for which he had been waiting some time, and was now ready for another executive session, when it suited their convenience. The Senator from Illinois has asked, who is to judge of the cause of removal but the President? The former proceedings of the Senate might answer that question. Is the President, [Mr. B. asked] irresponsible in the exercise of this power? You say he is responsible to the people. Can the people come here in mass and inquire the causes of the exertion of such powers? If not, their representatives have a right to ask for them; and especially the Senate, to which matters of this nature are confided, in our representative form of government. The practical result of the Senators's doctrine established a despotism in the President. Every body knows the people cannot come here, in mass, to examine these matters. The majority say we shall not do it for them. Then, it follows, it must go undone, and the President is, practically, unexaminable; and the fate of our public men depends on the arbitrary will of a single man! They live or die by his breath! All our offices are but bribes and weapons in his hands; and if that be not despotism, and we a nation of slaves, he did not know the definition of such things. The truth is, [Mr. B. said] the administration had gone to such a length, that there was no way of saving their reputation with the people, but by screening them from the light of inquiry and truth. The Senator from Illinois had read an old commission from Mr. Jefferson, stating the office to be held at the pleasure of the President. Did that alter the relative powers of President and Senate? Did that change the form of our Government? The form of the commission was probably drawn up by some attorney, clerk, or notary. Could they repeal our constitution and laws, and make our President a four years' despot, contrary to the avowed intention of the framers of our Government? He had answered that argument, if argument it were, on the 17th of March. When a citizen buys public land, and pays for it, he is lord of the little domain, by the law of purchase. But if a form of patent should be adopted, saying he held the land at the will of the President, would not that will be subject to the law, or have we a President above law? He put it as a grave law question, to the best lawyer in the majority, whether the form of the commission, or of the patent, in such cases, did, or did not, "nullify" the pre-existing, legal, or constitutional rights of the citizen? Did it, or did it not, "nullify" the relative powers of the President and Senate, and change our republican form of Government into an unexaminable and irresponsible tyranny, for four years, at the pleasure of our President? Truly, that would be placing a veto on the constitution itself! Mr. B. said, he had observed that Mr. Jefferson's mantle was very anxiously sought by this administration, since the late determination to abandon every republican principle; even the right of inquiry. The prophet Elijah, it would be remembered, had also shed his mantle upon Elisha, amid the smoke and savory fumes of a meat offering, made of the oxen of the latter. He presumed a public dinner, and set toasts, would have quite as good an effect in controverting all sorts of party denominations into republicans of the modern type; and if a voracious appetite for office were any test, the combination was composed of genuine republicans; but he entered his solemn protest against the doctrines of the majority, with regard to the removing power. The President's cabinet, for whose acts he is responsible, ought to be freely chosen by him; but the officers of the public were ours; they have legal rights, for the benefit of the public, and to be protected by the Senate and the laws. He protested against this latter class of the public officers being rendered servile instruments in the hands of the Executive, dependent for official existence on the smile of his favor, or liable to official death at his capricious nod.

Mr. BIBB said, questions have been started, at this day, touching the power of the President to remove executive officers, and the power of the Senate to demand and judge the cause of removal. In organizing the Executive departments at the first session of the Congress under the new constitution, the powers of the President necessarily came under consideration. The decision of both Houses appears in the act for establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs, approved by President Washington, on the 27th of July, 1789. [Vol. 2 Bioren's Laws United States, p. 6.] By that act, a principal officer, denominated the Secretary for the Department of Foreign Affairs, was authorized. He was to conduct the business "in such manner as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, order or instruct." This principal officer was authorized to appoint an inferior officer, called the chief clerk, "who, whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy, shall, during such vacancy, have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers, appertaining to the said department." This department, by the act of September 15, 1789, was denominated the "Department of State," and the principal officer called the "Secretary of State." The Department of War and Naval Affairs was established by the act, approved August, 1789, with a principal officer and a chief clerk, with a like provision for the case of removal of the principal officer by the President, or other case of vacancy, as in the Department of Foreign Affairs. In the act to establish the Treasury Department, approved September, 1789, the like provision is made for a principal officer and chief clerk, and for the case of removal of the principal officer by the President of the United States, or other case of vacancy, as in the other acts alluded to. In these three acts the power of the President to remove the principal officer is conceded, as of constitutional right, not conferred by law.

[Mr. B. then read a long list of removals, by Presidents Washington, Adams, and Jefferson.]

Gen. Washington, from May, 1792, to January, 1797, removed many officers whom he had appointed, and appointed others in place of those removed, as appears by the nominations and confirmations on the Executive Journal. Among these are collectors, inspectors, officers of the army, a vice consul at Paris, in place of one recalled, William Short, minister resident in Spain, in place of one recalled, and C. C. Pinckney, minister plenipotentiary, in place of James Monroe. President Adams removed collectors, supervisors, inspectors, officers of the army, and, finally, the Secretary of State, Mr. Pickens, was removed, and Mr. Marshall was appointed in his place. President Jefferson exercised this power of removal; so did President Madison, and the succeeding Presidents. In February, 1814, President Madison nominated Return J. Meigs, as Postmaster General. A resolution was offered in the Senate to ask the President if this office was vacant, "and, if vacant, in what manner it became vacant." This resolution was rejected.

From the commencement of this Government to this time, the power of removal has been conceded, first, by both branches of the Legislature, in organizing the Departments; 2d, by the uninterrupted exercise of that power by all the Presidents.

From May, 1792, when President Washington made his first message, nominating Mr. Wrigglesworth, as the Collector of Newburyport, in place of Cross, superseded, down to this time, notwithstanding the various removals made known to the Senate, by nominations to fill vacancies so happening, not one single instance has occurred in which the Senate, as a body, has asserted the right to ask the cause of removal, or to exercise an appellate or revisory power over the President's decision. The attempt, in 1814, to ask the cause of the removal of Gideon Granger from the office of Postmaster General, was rejected by the Senate. Thus the Executive and Legislative departments have construed the constitution.

In the case of Marbury vs. Madison, (February, 1803,) the Supreme Court of the United States express their opinion, that the nomination, appointment, and commission, are three distinct operations. "1st. The nomination. This is the sole act of the President, and is completely voluntary. 2d. The appointment. This is also the act of the President, and is also a voluntary act, though it can only be performed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. 3d. The commission.

"Where an officer is removable at the will of the Executive, the circumstance which completes his appointment is of no concern, because the act is at any time revocable. By the constitution of the United States, the President is invested with certain political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties, he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority, and in conformity with his orders. In such cases, their acts are his acts; and whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which executive discretion may be used, still there exists, and can exist, no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political.

"The power of nominating to the Senate, and the power of appointing the person nominated, are political powers, to be exercised by the President according to his own discretion. When he has made an appointment, he has exercised his whole power, and his discretion has been completely applied to the case. If, by law, the officer be removable at the will of the President, then a new appointment may be immediately made, and the rights of the officer are terminated."

To those who contend for the supremacy of that Court in settling all questions arising under the constitution, this case of Marbury vs. Madison, ought to be conclusive. But as I am one of those who deny that the Legislative and Executive departments, with the concurrence of the Supreme Court, can change the constitution, I will examine these questions upon the principles of the constitution.

When the Government is so organized as to secure, by reasonable precautions, the enacting of good laws, it is of the highest importance that they be faithfully executed. Good men are interested in the faithful execution, because their conduct is, in the general, in conformity with the laws. Bad men are interested against the faithful execution, because their conduct is, in the general, in violation of the laws. A feeble Executive produces a feeble execution of the laws; it is, in effect, a bad execution of the laws. A government ill executed degenerates into a bad government in fact, howsoever good it may be in theory. Energy in the Executive is essential to a good government. What does it avail, to have a good government in theory, but a bad government in practice? good laws upon the statute book; but those laws ill executed and evaded? In a government looking to our intercourse with foreign nations to preserve peace; direct the energies of the nation in war; spreading over such an extent of territory, an energetic Executive is more necessary than in one of the confederated States.

In the Federal Government, the Executive should be invigorated as far as consists with the safety of the republican principles upon which it is founded. If sufficiently guarded to prevent usurpation, a vigorous Executive is appropriate to the faithful execution of the great powers of war, peace, treaties, and commerce. The Federal Government is doubly watched; first, by the ordinary safeguards of a simple republic; secondly, by the federative rights and reserved powers of the State Governments. The principle ingredients which constitute energy in the Executive, are unity of action, competent powers, adequate provision to maintain itself against the encroachments of the other departments, and against anarchy. A numerous Legislature and a single Executive, seem best calculated to unite the two great ingredients of a good government, salutary laws, and a faithful execution of them. Decision, activity, and despatch, will generally flow from the proceedings of a single Executive, in a more eminent degree, than from two or more. As the number is increased, these qualities of decision, activity, and despatch, will be diminished; and it matters not whether the power be vested in two or more of equal authority, or in one, subjected to the control and co-operation of others, as counsellors to him.

Whenever two or more are invested with a public office and trust, with equal dignity and authority, there is danger of difference of opinion, personal emulation, and animosity. Whenever these dissensions arise in the Executive department, they weaken the executive arm, distract the plans and operations, split the community into factions. They counteract the most necessary ingredients in an Executive—vigor and despatch.

The history of Rome, in her best days, furnishes instances of dissensions between the Consuls, and also between the military tribunes who were substituted at times to the Consuls.

To guard against more frequent dissensions, prudence suggested to the Consuls the policy of dividing the administration between them by lot, assigning to one the government of the city and the suburbs; to the other, the command in the distant provinces; but frequently in extremities, recourse was had to a dictator.

In legislation, differences of opinion, and the jarings of parties, promote, in the general, deliberation and circumspection, and check excesses in the majority, although they may sometimes obstruct salutary measures. But the evils of dissension in the Executive department are un-mixed with any advantages. These dissensions weaken, embarrass, and perplex the execution, of any plan from the first to the last. In our foreign relations, in all the duties devolved on the President, by the constitution, relative to war and peace, treaties and commerce, at home and abroad, where unity, decision, activity, and expedition are so necessary, we would have every disadvantage to apprehend from a plurality in the Executive. Besides the tardiness and inefficiency which would be thereby produced, responsibility to censure and to punishment would be lessened, if not destroyed. In a plurality of Executive heads, amidst mutual accusations, it is difficult to determine on whom the blame of pernicious measures ought to fall, and more difficult to fix the punishment according to the degree of culpability of each. The executive power is more easily confined when it is one—multiplication in the Executive is more dangerous than friendly to liberty. One tyrant is more tolerable and more easily brought to conviction and punishment than twenty-seven. The influence and credit of many individuals united in the executive power and responsibility, are more dangerous to liberty than either of them singly.

By the constitution, the powers of this Government are distributed into three departments; the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial. The President of the United States is the head and fountain of the Executive department. But his powers are not solely executive. He has a qualified negative upon the proceedings of the legislative department. Moreover, "he shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them." "He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." To perform efficiently these important duties devolved upon him by the constitution, means are necessary. Therefore it is, "he shall be Commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States." "He shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, and other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments." He shall have power "to fill up all vacancies that may happen in the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session." "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States." In interpreting the constitution, we ought to view it as one entire work. All the members should have such order, strength, and proportion, as to be homogeneous. All and singular the parts should cohere and fit, the one with the other, so as to answer to the design and end, and make one uniform, fair proportioned, natural whole. This rule of examination is founded in common sense, and is applicable to all the works of genius and of art. In this rule, artists, writers, critics, jurists, the sages of the State, and the fathers of the church, all concur. The constitution provides that the President shall commission all officers of the United States. What is the tenure of office which he shall grant in the commissions? When the tenure of office to be expressed in the commissions is decided, then the power of the President to remove this or that officer, or his want of power to remove, is determined by an inspection of the respective commissions. The constitution declares that the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior. This is the tenure of office to be expressed in their commissions. Taking this declaration of tenure in favor of the judges, in connexion with the power to nominate, appoint, and commission all officers, and the consequence seems to follow clearly, that none but the judges are to be commissioned during good behavior. Affirmative words here are, in their effect, negative of other kindred subjects than those affirmed. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The expression of one tenure in favor of the judges is the exclusion of the like tenure as to all other officers. When the constitution was framed, the States had exploded the notions that public offices were private property, and had established the principle that public offices are public trusts, instituted for the public benefit, and to be held either during good behavior and the continuance of the offices, or during pleasure, as the one or the other tenure should be, according to the character of the respective offices, most consistent with the beneficial management of the public affairs. The duration of the offices is one thing; the tenure by which the officer holds his commission is another. The office may be created expressly for a limited and defined portion of time, or otherwise, the office continuing, yet the commission may be directed by the constitution or laws to be issued for a limited time. In either case, however, the tenure by which the officer holds that commission may be during good behavior, within the extent of the commission, or only during pleasure. There were, then, at the making of the constitution of the United States, but two tenures, or manners of holding the commissions issued for public offices—during good behavior, or during pleasure.

SENATE.]

Power of removal by the President.

When, therefore, the constitution declared that the President should nominate, appoint, and commission all officers, and that he should commission the judges during good behavior, it followed clearly that he should commission no other officers during good behavior; but that all officers, other than the judges, should be commissioned to hold during the pleasure of the President.

This interpretation is enforced by other considerations. The President is elected for four years only. If the officers, other than the judges, were commissioned during good behavior, and not during pleasure, then the Executive department would not be duly ordered and proportioned in its parts; the different members would not be suited to the head; the head, the body, and the feet, would not be homogeneous; they would not be adapted to the design. A President elected for four years, as the head and fountain of the Executive department, with all the executive officers under him, appointed and commissioned during good behavior, not removable by him, but holding for life, would be inconsistent with the plan, and with the duties and responsibilities imposed upon the President. The term of four years is sufficient for unfolding the measures of a President, and his course of administering the affairs of the Government, to bring them distinctly to the view of the people for their approbation or disapprobation. If disapproved, a change is intended by the constitution, through the medium of election. If the President is changed with a view to a change in the course of measures, then, if all executive officers hold at the will of the President, he has the means of changing the executive officers throughout, so far as may be necessary to effect and ensure the change proposed in the course of administration. All executive officers would be subordinate to the President. Dependent on his will for the tenure of office, all would be controlled by his plans and views of administration, and held in obedience and activity, by his power of removal. The President would then have the competent means to cause the laws to be faithfully executed, and to effect his plans and measures of administration. The Executive would be well ordered and adapted to its end and design—harmonious in its members from the head to the foot. The responsibility imposed upon him to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, is then reasonable. But if all the executive officers were appointed during good behavior, removable only by impeachment, trial, and conviction, then the head of the Executive department would be elected every four years, but all the other officers would be established for life, independent of the President; not controlled by the will, plans, and views of the President; not held in subordination by their immediate dependence on him for the tenure of office; but held in activity and the course of duty only by that distant prospect of impeachment. The vacancies happening by death and resignation would be annually so few as to leave the spirit of the executive corps perpetual and unalterable by the Presidential election. We should then have an Executive department, with a President elected every four years, but the whole executive corps established for life, permanent in its spirit, and independent of the President and the people. A President for four years, but heads of departments for life, ministers for life, consuls for life, custom house officers, collectors, inspectors, marshals, attorneys, receivers of public moneys, registers, postmasters, officers of the army and navy, &c. &c. &c. all, all for life! In a Government instituted expressly for conducting the great affairs of war, peace, and treaties, levying money, and regulating commerce; such a system of a President for four years, but all other executive officers for life, would have been a political monster.

If a painter should join together a human head, a horse's neck, members collected here and there from the feathered tribes, and ending with the tail of a fish, would not the spectacle be ridiculous? The framers of the Federal constitution never drew such an unnatural, deformed picture for the Executive department. The Congress and the States would have turned, in disgust and loathing, from such a hideous deformity. Let us pursue the consequences of an executive corps, appointed during good behavior, and not removable by the President. Would it not be passingly strange, and strikingly out of order, to see one President discarded by the people for disapprobation of the course of his administration, another elected to change the course of measures, and yet that the President elect be surrounded by cabinet ministers, operating through inferior officers, whose views of policy were hostile to his, and accordant with those of his predecessor? A President elected to bring about a spirit of economy, and healthful action in the body politic, yet with heads of departments fastened on him, whose views of policy are at war with economy, allowing the most extravagant constructive claims on the treasury, operating upon the theory that a national debt is a national blessing, and endeavoring to consolidate all the reserved powers of the States into the powers of the Federal Government? That the President elect should be without the power to discard heads of departments in whom he had no confidence, and unable to effect a change in the inferior executive officers, would make him the meagre emblem of an Executive; a skeleton stripped of his integuments; a something but little better than a puppet, moved by the undersprings and wires of ministers and officers holding for life, and destitute of all sense of dependence on the President or the people. What reasonable responsibility could be fixed on the President for mal-administration, either as to the preservation of peace, or effecting a favorable commercial intercourse with foreign nations, or in the execution of the laws, if he had no power to recall ministers and remove officers, and substitute them by others more suitable to the occasion, and adapted to the exigency? Suppose a revenue officer, for instance, a collector at the port of New York, who collects near a million of dollars per month, should be suspected of infidelity, would it not be highly injurious to suffer him to remain in office until he had consummated his fraud? until he could be removed by impeachment? or until the President could lay hold of some overt act to present to the Senate to move them to advise and consent to his removal? Suppose a collector, or other receiver of public moneys, in actual default in accounting and paying to the treasury; must the defaulting officer be suffered to continue his peculations until he can be impeached, or until the Senate can be convened to advise and consent to his removal? Such a construction of the executive powers of the President would render them wholly inadequate to a faithful execution of the laws. It would make the injunction upon him, "to take care that the laws are faithfully executed," an idle mockery. To impose a duty and deny the means to execute it, can impose no responsibility for non-performance. The power of nominating, and appointing, and commissioning all executive officers, during pleasure; and consequently of removing them at pleasure, is a political power vested in the President, for wise and salutary purposes, not only to guard existing laws against evasions, to protect the revenue against dilapidations, and to enforce a faithful execution of the laws generally; but also to assure due weight and influence to the executive recommendations of measures which he shall deem necessary and expedient to be adopted by the Congress.

The President is required by the constitution, "from time to time, to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to them such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." It must be evident that the President, from the nature of his office, and from the facilities afforded him, as being the head of the Executive department, of commanding every information which can be afforded by the heads of the departments, and through them from all the other executive officers, and of obtaining through them information from other sources, can have a more distinct and commanding view of the state of the Union and of the measures which may be necessary and expedient, than the several members of the Legislative departments. The duties, therefore, devolved on the President to give information of the state of the Union, and to recommend measures which he shall judge necessary and proper, as well as his qualified veto upon the acts of the Congress, are wise and salutary, deduced from his superior means of information. His veto is calculated to prevent impolitic legislation. But the veto is but conditional, not absolute. How far his veto may influence the Congress in their deliberations upon it, depends upon the weight and influence of the executive power as a whole, and then upon the power of the President to prevent the momentum of the whole from being split and divided into parts pulling into opposite directions. The same considerations will apply to the weight and influence which the recommendation of the President will have in forwarding the adoption of measures by him communicated to Congress as necessary and expedient. For what purpose is he required to recommend measures to the Congress, if his recommendations are to have no weight, no influence? And what weight or influence can they have, if the heads of departments, and all the other executive officers, who ought to be aiding in giving them life and activity, may be opposing and counteracting the recommendations of the President. If all the executive officers were to hold their offices for life, independent of the will of the President, then he would have no means of enforcing a unity of action in aid of his recommendations. A President surrounded by a corps of executive officers, not holding at his will and pleasure, but independent of him, and for life, or during good behavior, would have but little influence at any time. The executive corps, in opposition to the President, could stifle the measures recommended by him. The members quarreling with the head would be a disordered, feverish, disturbed action of the body politic. Confusion and anarchy are the necessary consequences.

If the executive officers were to be commissioned for life, then the President would be disarmed of the necessary and competent means to protect the Executive department against the encroachments of the co-ordinate departments. Mr. Madison, in the forty-eighth and forty-ninth letters of Publius, has illustrated, by reason and by historical facts, the insufficiency of mere paper barriers, to confine the several departments of powers, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, from passing the limits assigned; that it is necessary to furnish auxiliaries, other than definitions on paper, to prevent one of the departments from encroaching upon the chartered authorities of the others; that "the Legislative department is every where extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex." And if I might be permitted without offence, which certainly I do not intend, to remark upon the claim set up in this Senate, for its participation in judging and supervising the Executive in his removals from office, after such long and settled practice to the contrary, I would cite this, in addition to those referred to by Mr. Madison, as another example of the activity of the Legislative department to enlarge the sphere of its powers, and draw within its vortex the powers properly belonging the Executive department.

The power of nomination belongs to the President—the power of appointment is his. "He shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint." "He shall nominate, and he shall appoint, and he shall commission, all officers." The nomination and appointment are each the acts of the President. The Senate may refuse their advice and consent, when an unworthy and unfit person is put in nomination; but they can neither nominate nor appoint the person removed from office. The removal from office is the sole act of the President. It is his political power. It results from the constitution; from the tenure of office established by the constitution. The executive officers hold at the pleasure of the President. The determination of his will, the removal, is the previous act; the nomination to fill the vacancy happening by that removal is the subsequent and consequent act. The Senate cannot touch the removal. That is not submitted for their advice and consent. It is the person nominated who is submitted for their advice and consent. The rejection of the person nominated to fill the vacancy happening by removal, cannot restore to office the person removed. The removal is a fact done. The rejection of the consequent nomination to fill the vacancy cannot undo the fact of the removal—it cannot fill the vacancy.

If the Senate should invest themselves with the power of demanding and judging the causes of removals, then this would be an appellate power in the Senate, exercised over the acts of the President in removing; not a counsel and advice upon the person nominated. The power to demand the cause of removal goes behind the nomination, and acts not upon the question submitted by the proposed appointment. It leaves the question submitted by the constitution and the nomination of the President—the fitness or unfitness of the person nominated—and wanders into the causes and motives of the presidential will and pleasure, exercised in removing the former incumbent. It is an inquisition over the motives of the President. It changes the tenure of office. The President would no longer be the head and soul of the Executive department, but the Senate would be placed above him, to revise and control his political decisions. The unity, activity, and despatch, of the Executive department would be destroyed, by having forty-nine heads instead of one. Men often oppose a thing merely because they have had no agency in planning it, or because it has been done by those whom they dislike. To make the Senate a council whose concurrence is necessary to the operations of the ostensible Executive, would be intolerable in a Government like this, intended to manage our relations of war and peace, and treaties; and the powers of levying money and regulating commerce. "An artful cabal in that council would be able to distract and to enervate the whole system of administration. If no such cabal existed, the mere diversity of views, opinions, and feelings, would alone be sufficient to tincture the exercise of executive authority with a spirit of habitual feebleness and delay."

Over and above the inadequacy of the executive means to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, in case the Senate should invest itself with the power to demand and judge the causes of removal, another weighty objection would arise. The legislative duties of the Senate, connected with this appellate power over the causes for removal, would require the perpetual session of the Senate; and the system, if not impracticable, would be at war with the theory of the constitution. The House of Representatives are to impeach, and the Senate to try impeachments. But by this extraordinary course of demanding and judging the causes for removal, the Senate would pre-judge the cases of officers supposed to have offended. If the cause of removal was demanded, then the existence or non-existence of the cause must be tried. If the removal is advised, the conduct of the officer is condemned; if the removal of the officer is negatived, then the conduct of the officer is approved. The Senate will then be converted into a secret inquisition into the conduct of officers, to hear and decide, in their absence, and affirm or disaffirm the causes for removal. Whereas, by considering the power of the President to remove as a political power, a removal then only evidences the will and pleasure of the President, but does not necessarily involve the guilt of the officer removed. His guilt or innocence must depend upon such ulterior measures as may be instituted before the judicial tribunals, or before the House of Representatives as the impeaching body.

Considering the powers of the Federal Government as few and defined, as conferred for the purpose of administering and protecting the foreign relations of the States, in respect of war, peace, treaties, and commerce, and for maintaining the mutual interests and general concerns of all the States, at home and abroad, as connected with those subjects; believing that all the powers delegated look to, and are connected with, those objects of general concern and general interest; viewing the safeguards over the executive power as reasonably competent to watch and secure against tyranny and usurpation, I am satisfied that the powers of the Executive department were wisely vested in a single head.

In this view of the constitution, it seems to me very necessary and proper that all executive officers, commissioned by the President, shall hold at his will and pleasure, liable to be removed at his will, but subjected, nevertheless, to the additional restraint of impeachment by the House of Representatives, and trial by the Senate.

This tenure at the will of the President is calculated to preserve, 1st. Due subordination in the officers to the executive head, so as to ensure a faithful execution of the laws.

2d. To preserve that unity of purpose and action necessary for decision, energy, and despatch.

3d. To maintain the Executive against the encroachments of the co-ordinate departments, as well as against anarchy.

4th. To maintain that due weight and influence to the President which was intended by the constitution, in giving him a qualified negative upon the proceedings of Congress, and in assigning to him the duty to recommend to Congress such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

It seems to me that the exposition of the constitution, in relation to the executive power, which prevailed at first, and which has been practised upon for more than forty years without interruption, is in conformity with the true principles and sense of the constitution. That exposition gives due order, strength, and proportion, to the different members of the Executive department, preserves the due subordination to the executive head, and adapts the means to the ends and design. According to that exposition, each successive President has the same momentum of executive power which belonged to the first and every preceding President. The periodical elections of the President thus give to the people the effective control over the course of executive measures and executive administration, by arming each President elect with competent means to give efficiency and activity to the principles which bring him into power, as well as to arrest a course of administration which shall have put his predecessor out of power. This exposition subjects the whole executive power to the control of the people, directly and mediately, at every periodical election of President. The contrary construction would entail upon the people an executive body of officers, independent of the President, subject to alteration by such slow and imperceptible degrees, as to render the spirit of the corps perpetual, and independent of any change in the executive head.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the resolution was then laid on the table.

THE INDIANS.

The bill to provide for the removal of the Indians west of the river Mississippi, having been laid on the table, was resumed, on motion of Mr. JOHNSTON.

Mr. ROBBINS said that the whole argument in favor of this bill turns upon the question whether the Indian nations within our territorial boundaries are competent to make treaties with the United States: for it makes no difference whether the Indian nation be within the chartered limits of a State, or out of those limits, if within the limits of the United States: for, if being within a State renders the Indian nations incompetent to make a treaty, the being within the United States makes them equally incompetent, the reason being the same in both cases, viz. the being within the jurisdiction of another power, and therefore, as the argument is, subject to that jurisdiction. If these Indian nations are competent to make treaties, then the proposed law is unnecessary, as its objects may be effected by treaty; and this law is not necessary to aid the Executive in making this treaty. And if these Indian nations are competent to make treaties, then this proposed law is not only unnecessary, but it is unconstitutional; for it is to make a treaty by the Legislature, which can only be made by the Executive and Senate. The turning question, then, of this whole debate, I repeat, is, whether the Indian nations within our territorial boundaries are competent to make treaties?

Before I proceed to discuss this question, I have to remark, that it is a matter of surprise that this question should now be made, when it is now made for the first time. From the time of the discovery of this new world by the old, down to this time, now more than three hundred years, the competency of an Indian nation, situated within the jurisdiction of another Power, has never been made a question before. No jurist, no writer upon public law, has ever made it a question. But, through all that long tract of time, treaties upon treaties, and almost without number, have been made with them, without a doubt, in a single instance, of their competency to make them. This is not denied on the other side; indeed, it is admitted that the doctrine and the practice of all past time, for century upon century, has been, to consider these nations, thus situated, as competent to make treaties. But all this is treated as if the whole world, from the beginning down to this time, had been benighted upon this subject; as if they had ignorantly supposed and believed that the Indian nations, thus situated, were competent to make treaties, when, in truth, they were not competent to make treaties: that Great Britain had been in this deplorable state of ignorance, with all her statesmen; that our Governments, both State and National, had been in this deplorable ignorance, with all their statesmen; that the jurists, or writers upon public law, of all the world, had all been in this deplorable state of ignorance. I say so treated; for I do not perceive that this new opinion is advanced with any less confidence, or with any more diffidence, on account of that mass of authority and usage against it.

I have farther to remark, that, if, indeed, it be so, that these Indian nations, thus situated, are not, and have not been, competent to make treaties, then all the treaties made with them are nullities. If so, the consequences of that consequence would be enough, I should think, to make gentlemen pause a little, and even fear the success of their own argument; for the consequences would be such that the whole body of the rights acquired by Indian treaties, or held under them, or derived from them, would be torn from their foundations, and the resulting evils would be incalculably great. I have said that, in that case, these treaties would be nullities; and who can doubt it? The President and Senate have the power to make treaties; but a treaty made with a party not competent to make it, is not a treaty; it is a compact, as distinguishable from a treaty; and the President and Senate are not competent to make a compact which is not a treaty; so that every such treaty is void, as a treaty, because the Indian nation was not competent to make it; and it is void as a compact, because the President and Senate are not competent to make it. If this be so, my honorable friend from Tennessee need not disquiet himself upon the subject of his contradictory obligations; for, upon his doctrine, these treaties have created no obligations upon the United States.

Again: I have to remark, that, if these Indian nations, thus situated, are not competent to make treaties, no more treaties can be made with them; that the treaties which have been made, and not ratified, if any such there be, must be rejected; treaties which have been projected, for the purchase and extinguishment of Indian titles, as that in Indiana, for instance, must be abandoned: we are to get no more lands from them by treaty; if you are to get them at all, you are to get them by compact, and this compact to be made, not by the Executive and Senate, but by the Legislature. And, pray, how is the Legislature to make such a compact? It would not be possible, I think, to overcome the difficulties to this mode of acquiring Indian lands.

And then, in case of future wars with those Indian nations, how are they ever to be terminated, and how are the relations of peace ever to be restored, without the intervention of treaties? Can any one, then, wish to see established a doctrine fraught with these, and it may be with other equally deplorable consequences? I should hope not. But, if we must prove what has never before been denied—what has always been admitted—admitted in theory, and in practice admitted—namely, that the Indian nations within our territorial boundaries are competent to make treaties—how is that competency to be made out?

I agree that an Indian nation, to be competent to make a treaty, must be a sovereignty; for that treaties, properly so called, can only be made by sovereigns with sovereigns; but, for this purpose, it is not material whether the sovereignty be dependent or independent; sovereignty is all that is necessary to this competency. The honorable gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McKINLEY] said the sovereigns must be equal; but he will find no authority for that opinion, if, by equal, he meant any thing more than that both must be sovereigns. A dependent sovereignty is still a sovereignty, and competent to make a treaty. I understood this to be admitted by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, in the outset of his argument; though I could not reconcile the subsequent part of his argument with this admission.

Now what is sovereignty? It is to be sui juris;—that is, to be subject, within itself, to no law but the law of its own making; externally, it may be subject to another jurisdiction, and then it is a dependent sovereignty—to what degree dependent, will depend upon the treaty or treaties by which it is made dependent, if so made by treaty. Now this is the condition of every Indian nation in our country, sui juris, and therefore sovereign; but subject externally to another jurisdiction, and therefore a dependent sovereign. This has always been their condition since they ceased to be independent sovereignties. Since they ceased to be independent sovereignties, there never has been a time when this was not their condition. When, or where, I would ask, has any Indian nation been subject within itself, to the law of another jurisdiction? I know of none; I have heard of none. If there be one, that one would be an exception from the rest, but would not affect the right of the rest; that one may have relinquished its right to be sui juris, and then it would not be regarded as an exception.

Now the fact of being sui juris, and always of having been so, constitutes the right to be so. I would be glad to know if any nation has, or ever had, a better title to be juri sui juris than the fact of being so, and of always having been so? than a present position, fortified by a prescription that knows no beginning; that runs back as far as memory or tradition goes, and beyond, to where it is lost in that oblivion in which unknown times and their memorials are all buried and lost! And such is the title of every Indian nation now in fact sui juris to be, and remain sui juris. There never was, there never can be, any better title to the right of being sui juris. To the validity of such a title, its acknowledgment by other sovereignties is not necessary; but if it were, there never has been a time in which it was not acknowledged by other sovereignties, or was denied by any other; but it is not necessary, for a right in present possession, fortified and sanctified by such a prescription as this is, stands on higher ground, much higher, than any acknowledgment by other sovereignties could place it. Unquestionably, then, these nations are sui juris, of right sui juris; therefore, sovereign; therefore, competent to make treaties.

A multitude of matters have been urged upon our consideration on the other side, not to disprove the fact of the Indian nations being at this moment sui juris, nor the fact that they always have been sui juris—for these can neither be disproved nor denied—but to prove that though the are sui juris de facto, that they are not sui juris de jure, not being aware, as it appears to me, that the fact constitutes the right. It is said, for instance, that the crown of Great Britain claimed a right to this country by the right of discovery; that what was the right of the crown is now our right; and, therefore, that the Indian nations are not sui juris de jure.

Now what was the right as claimed by discovery? (I make no question of that right, for the time has gone by for making that question, except as a moralist or historian. Whatever was the defect of that right originally, time now has supplied that defect, as far as defect of right can be supplied by lapse of time.) But what was that right as claimed by discovery? It was this; a right to the domain of the country, subject to the right of occupancy by the Indian nations; and that occupancy to be without restriction as to mode, and without limitation as to time; with the right of alienation of their possessory title, restricted to the proprietor of the domain. This was the claim of the British crown as founded on discovery: it was so defined and settled in the case referred to by the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. McKINLEY] the case of Johnson and McIntosh. It was so settled by the court, in that case, because it had been so settled by what had become the customary law of nations. But did the King of Great Britain claim, (for that is the important question) did he claim these Indian nations as his subjects, over whom, or for whom, he had a right to legislate, for their internal regulation? No, never; never was a claim of that kind advanced; never heard of; never thought of; that claim left them as it found them, subject within themselves only to their own jurisdiction.

Besides this notorious fact, the right of pre-emption claimed by discovery is decisive to prove that the right of jurisdiction was not claimed. If the Crown claimed these Indian nations as his subjects, why claim a pre-emptive right to their titles? Did any King claim a pre-emptive right to the land titles of his own subjects? Never. If discovery then is a good authority for what it claims, it is good for what it disclaims: it disclaims the right of jurisdiction over and for the Indian nations. It therefore affirms and confirms this right in them, and guarantees it to them. Is it possible that the honorable gentleman from Mississippi can suppose that the case of Grenada is a case in point? That was the case of a conquest, and the conquest ceded by the treaty of peace to the conqueror, to be holden as a part of his dominions, and the people as a part of his subjects; and both have been so holden ever since.

It is said again, that a State has a right to exercise jurisdiction over persons within its territorial limits, and, of course, over the Indian nation within its limits; and, therefore, that such Indian nation can have no right to exemption from that jurisdiction. If this State right was admitted, it would not disprove the Indian right; it would only prove that the two rights were incompatible, and that if the State right is exerted and executed against the Indian right, that the Indian right must be annihilated. That the Indian nation is placed within the limits of another jurisdiction, proves nothing against the Indian right, for that must be the situation of every Indian nation within our territorial limits. It is so, and was to be so, by the very claim originally made to the country, on which it was originally settled, and by which it is now held. This country was in the possession of these Indian nations; the British claim to it, as founded in discovery, was a claim to the domain of their country, subject to their right of occupancy. They of course must be situated in that domain. That domain was parcelled out into colonies, now become States; the Indian nations of course must fall within the limits of those States. So that, by our very claim to their country, they were to be, and to remain within our jurisdiction, and exempt from that jurisdiction, and subject only to their own.

To strengthen this State claim against the Indian right, it is said that the State within its territorial limits has all the rights which the crown of Great Britain had within the same limits. But, as has been stated, the crown of Great Britain made no such claim against the Indian right. Happily will it be for these nations, if the claim of that crown is adopted by the States as the measure of their claim, and if they will content themselves therewith.

Still it is said that a sovereign independent State has a right to jurisdiction over all its own population; and that these States were sovereign and independent when they adopted this constitution; and that they did not surrender this attribute of sovereignty by that adoption. Admitting all this, it is still to be proved that an Indian nation within a State, is a part of the population of that State. How can this be seriously pretended? The population of a State, is the population which constitutes the community, which constitutes the State, which is protected by the laws, and amenable to the laws of the State, as that community. But an Indian nation within a State is not a part of that community; is not protected by the laws, and amenable to the laws of the State as a part of that community.

The population of the United States is taken periodically, by regular census; it is now about to be taken for the fourth time; were the Indian nations within the United States ever included in any census as a part of the population of the United States? Never, as every one knows. And why not, if all persons within the limits of a sovereign jurisdiction are necessarily the subjects of that jurisdiction, as a part of the population under that jurisdiction?

The States pay direct taxes to the United States, in proportion to their numbers; that is, to their population. But are the Indian nations within the States included in that population? Never; they are expressly excluded by the constitution of the United States. Then, the States themselves, by adopting the constitution, have defined what constitutes their own population; and have excluded from it these Indian nations.

Still, it is insisted, and as a branch of the same argument, that the constitution gives the Executive no authority to go within a State and make a treaty with a part of its population. This is true; but an Indian nation within a State, as we have just seen, is not a part of its population. The power to make treaties, as given by the constitution, is a general power, and may be exercised at the executive discretion, with any nation or people competent to make a treaty; and it is not material where that nation is situated or placed; if competent to make a treaty, our Executive is competent to make it with them.

Again, it has been said that in several States in which is situated some tribe or remnant of some tribe of Indians, that these States have subjected those Indians to State legislation. Without stopping to inquire how that fact is, and, if a fact, whether it has been with the will or against the will of these Indians; it is enough to say, that if those States have undertaken that legislation over those Indians, against their will, and while they were a tribe and sui juris, and when, up to that time, they had always been sui juris, that fact, instead of proving a right in that legislation, proves a wrong by that Legislature; and instead of disproving the Indian right, it proves a violation of that right. I trust it is too late in the day, and so enlightened as this is, to contend that a fact which is a wrong is a precedent to justify a similar wrong; and that a violation of right in one case becomes a warrant for a violation of right in all similar cases.

In the multitude of matters urged upon our consideration, to show that the Indian nations are not sui juris de jure, these are all which appear to me to have the appearance of argument; for in the rest, I confess I cannot see even that appearance. It is said, for instance, (and I notice it as a sample of the rest, for it would be endless to notice them all in detail,) that the Indian is an inveterate savage, and incapable of civilization. Admitting this to be the fact, which I by no means do admit, what has it to do with the question, whether his nation is sui juris, and competent to make a treaty? Is the Indian right less a right because the Indian is a savage? Or does our civilization give us a title to his right? A right which he inherits equally with us, from the gift of nature, and of nature's God. The Indian is a man, and has all the rights of man. The same God who made us made him, and endowed him with the same rights; for "of one blood hath he made all the men who dwell upon the earth." And if we trample upon these rights, if we force him to surrender them, or extinguish them in his blood, the cry of that injustice will rise to the throne of that God, and there, like the blood of Abel, will testify against us. If we should be arraigned for the deed before his awful bar, and should plead our boasted civilization in its defence, it would, in his sight, but add deeper damnation to the deed, and merit but the more signal retribution of his eternal justice. As to the civilization of the Indian, that is his own concern in the pursuit of his own happiness; if the want of it is a misfortune, it is his misfortune; it neither takes from his rights, nor adds to our own. As to his being an inveterate savage, and incapable of civilization, I do not believe it; in that respect, I believe he is like the rest of mankind. The savage-state is the natural state of man; and that state has charms to the savage, which none but the savage knows. Man, no where, at no time, ever rose from the savage to the civilized man, but by the spur of an absolute necessity; a necessity which controlled and could not be controlled; it was not until he could no longer live as a savage, or go where he could live as a savage, that he would submit himself to that incessant labor and severe restraint, which lies at the foundation of all civilization; and to which nothing but education and habit reconciles the nature even of civilized man. The wild and free nature of the savage, unaccustomed to involuntary and constant labor, and to the multiplied and severe restraints of civilized society, revolts at the idea of that labor and those restraints; and his strong repugnance to them can be only overcome, as I have said, by the force of an overruling necessity. I have said this, not that I disapprove or would discourage attempts at their civilization; but to account for the only partial success, if it has been only partial, which has attended those attempts; and at the same time to vindicate the Indian from the charge of incapacity for civilization, any farther than as it is applicable to all mankind, while in a savage state. That very necessity exists, and is beginning to exert its civilizing tendency, where the tribes in question now are, but will no longer exist, if they are removed as is contemplated by this bill.

[SENATE.]

Again, it is alleged against one of these nations, situated not in one, but in several of these States, that they have been guilty of an act which forfeits their right to live independently of State jurisdiction, and which requires that the forfeiture should be immediately and rigorously enforced. It is the act of their having changed the form of their government for their own internal regulation. It seems that, to better their condition, and with a view to their own civilization, they have discarded that of the savage, and adopted the government of civilized man. And it is a government well devised to improve that condition, and ensure that civilization—a government that is in itself a monument of wisdom; that speaks volumes in favor of their capacity for civilization, and of their advances therein; for it has every essential feature of a free and well balanced government. It is evidently not a work of blind imitation; for while it has followed the best models, it has followed them only so far as they were adapted to their circumstances; and it is original so far as their circumstances required it to be so—and, where it is original, it is no less admirable than where it is imitative. Attentive to those circumstances, so far from assuming any powers inconsistent with their external relations, either to the United States or to those States, that Government recognises and ratifies those relations exactly as they exist, and confines itself entirely to provisions for their own internal police. Sensible of their rude state, and with a view to their own civilization, it makes it the primary duty of the nation to provide the means of education, and to promote the acquisition and diffusion of knowledge. Indeed, all its provisions show a wise survey of the present, and a provident forecast for the future. Now, this new government is not to be tolerated for a moment: State legislation must come and abate it as a nuisance; and the nation are to be punished for this atrocious act, with the forfeiture, and for ever, of every national right. They are not to be permitted even to resume the government they had discarded, and to live again as savages: but they are at once, and for ever, to be subjected to the rule of another jurisdiction, never again to enjoy the right of self government—a right which has come down to them from their fathers, and through an unknown series of generations, and for an unknown series of ages—a right which they had used, but not abused; certainly not in the act which is made a pretext for its destruction.

All fated Indians! barbarism and attempts at civilization are alike fatal to your rights; but attempts at civilization the more fatal of the two. The jealous of their own rights are the contempters of yours; proud and chivalrous States do not think it beneath them to take advantage of your weakness. You have lands which they want, or rather which they desire, for they do not want them; your rights stand in their way, and those proud and chivalrous States do not think it beneath them to destroy your rights by their legislation. Proud and chivalrous States do not think it beneath them to present to your feeble and helpless condition this alternative—either to abandon your homes, the habitations you have built, the fields you have planted, and all the comforts you have gathered around you; the homes of your fathers, and the sepulchres of their dead; and go far into the depths of an unknown wilderness, there to abide the destiny which may there await you, or to surrender your rights, and submit yourselves to their power, but to expect no participation in their rights.

An alternative which has planted dismay and despair in every heart that palpitates in that nation; for they see their situation, and that nothing is left them but resignation to their fate. Within themselves, they have no resource; without, they have no hope. The guaranties of treaties made with the United States—the faith of a mighty nation pledged for their protection, which was their hope—is now their hope no more; like the morning cloud and early dew, it has passed away; for the chief of that mighty nation has been appealed to, to make good that guaranty, but has been appealed to in vain. He has told them that he will not make it good; and that they must submit to that alternative.

But we are told they have deserved all this, because they have changed the form of their government. But has this changed their external relations with the United States, or with those States? Not in the least. Not in any one possible respect. The new government, like the old, is made for their own internal regulation, and for that object merely. Sui juris as they are, and always have been, they had a right to make the law for their own internal regulation, according to their own will, and to change it from time to time, according to that will. They have done this, and, in doing this, they have done no more than they had a right to do. If they now are a government within a government, at which such an outcry is made as justifying their destruction, so they always have been; and not more so now than they always have been. They have always been what the gentleman calls an imperium in imperio—dependant, and without the external prerogatives of sovereignty; but still an imperium. But no matter—no matter how justifiable, how proper that change of government was, how strictly a mere exercise of right; they see and feel that their doom is sealed—that the decree is gone forth, and will be executed.

The cry of the miserable Indian will not arrest it; the sympathy of this nation in that cry will not arrest it; that sympathy is not credited, or, if credited, is despised; and we are told here, and in a tone of defiance, too, that no power shall arrest it. My fears are, that no power will arrest it—none certainly will if this bill pass, and without this amendment; for then the Executive will not arrest it. But if executed, and when executed, for one, I will say, that these Indians have been made the victims of power exerted against right—the victims of violated faith, the nation's faith—the victims of violated justice: yes, I call God to witness, of his violated justice.

Mr. WHITE said, that, as chairman of the committee who reported the bill, it was expected of him to notice some remarks made by gentlemen in opposition to it, and overlooked by those who supported it, but did not desire to do so while any gentleman wished to say any thing on the subject.

Mr. FORSYTH then took the floor, and occupied it until the usual hour of adjournment.

THURSDAY, APRIL 22, 1830.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE, the bill providing for the further regulation of the Patent Office was taken up for consideration, together with an amendment proposing to admit foreigners to the privilege of patenting inventions in this country, and increase the fees both to foreigners and on our citizens.

Mr. H. explained its object, and the circumstances which induced them to adopt the amendment. It appeared that a number of petitions from foreigners had been regularly before the Committee on the Judiciary, for special laws to enable them to exercise their inventions in this country; and were productive of great expense to the nation, as well as to the individual applicant. In consequence of this inconvenience, both to the patentee and the country, the committee had come to the conclusion to admit the subjects or citizens of all other States, Empires, and Kingdoms to take out patents in this country, subject to the laws of their respective countries, by paying two hundred dollars into our treasury, instead of seventy-five dollars, the amount of the sum claimed by the provisions of this bill from our own citizens.

SENATE.]

The Patent Office.

Mr. DICKERSON said, he had doubts about the propriety of adopting the amendment proposed to the bill, or even the first section of the bill itself. He was of opinion that the sum required by the present law for the privilege of taking out a patent was quite sufficient. He believed it was now placed at thirty dollars; and, if he was called upon for an opinion on this subject, he would reduce instead of increasing the fees. He thought it was the duty of Congress, as it was the interest of the country, to promote, and not to discourage, the inventive genius of those who devote their talents, ingenuity, and time, in prosecuting discoveries in the useful arts, for the benefit of the country. It was well known [said Mr. D.] that many of those who applied for patents had exhausted all their little means in perfecting their discoveries and rendering them serviceable to the country; and if difficulties were thrown in the way of taking out patents, their inventions could not be tested, and their utility lost both to the inventor and the country. He was opposed to that feature in the amendment which proposed to raise the fees on foreign patentees to two hundred dollars; because if it be admitted that the patents are of importance to the country, as he believed all would admit, then he thought that all should be placed on the same footing.

Mr. HAYNE said, at an early period of the session, a communication was received by the committee from the Secretary of State, covering a report from the superintendent of the Patent Office, recommending what ought to be done for the better regulation of the institution; and stating, among other things, that great inconvenience had resulted from the low sum for which patents can be obtained, in consequence of which the office was crowded with a number of useless inventions, of no earthly use to the patentees or the public. The committee, after the examination of the subject, with such lights as were presented to them, thought it would be better, by raising the price of patents, to restrict the issuing of them in such numbers, rather than throw open the doors so widely as hitherto, for the admission into the office of useless lumber, by which the business of the office was increased, and the community at large, in a great many instances, imposed on. In raising the price of a patent from thirty dollars to seventy dollars, the committee were of opinion that no useful invention would be prevented from being known; though he thought there could be no doubt that the increase of price would have a salutary effect in preventing applications from ignorant or unworthy persons. With regard to that branch of the amendment which permitted the issuing of patents to foreigners, in certain cases, he would observe that the committee had been subjected to much trouble for several years past, in consequence of applications from that class of persons who could not obtain patents under the existing laws. He thought it much better to establish a general principle by law, for granting patents to foreigners, than to legislate, as heretofore, for each individual case, after subjecting the committee to the labors of an investigation and report. To the gentleman from New Jersey, he would reply that there could be no difficulty in the way of the superintendent's ascertaining the laws of other countries in relation to patents, so as to grant them to citizens of countries which did not exclude ours from like privileges; the usages of foreign countries under their patent laws were not necessary. A difference ought to be made between our own citizens and foreigners; and the committee, in establishing the difference, had turned their eyes towards England and France, and had ascertained that the fees paid in those countries were higher than any proposed to be fixed by the bill.

Mr. HOLMES observed, that it seemed to him, the two additional clerks called for in the bill, for the performance of the supposed increased duties of the Patent Office, were rather unnecessary, when viewed in connexion with the other amendments proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary. By these amendments, it was proposed to increase the fees for obtaining patents; and the reasons assigned for this increase of fees, were to exclude the immense number of useless inventions which were daily presented at the Patent Office. It appeared to him, [Mr. H.] that, if the reasoning of the committee were correct, a diminution of clerical duties in the office must follow as an inevitable consequence. He thought we got along very well under our present law, and was inclined to believe that the amendments would, instead of removing evils, be productive of many. The increasing of fee, he did not believe, would sift out the useful from the useless inventions. They depended upon experiment, and the valuable are as liable to be excluded as the worthless. He would mention the invention of the cotton gin, the nail casting machine, and propelling boats by steam, any one of which was of more advantage to the nation than would counterbalance all the evils intended to be removed by the amendments; yet all might have been lost to the country under these amendments. With respect to the clause relating to foreigners, he thought it in some measure a proper one. The committee had to encounter a great deal of labor in presenting their petitions, examining their claims, and their bills, and vast expense was incurred by the country; but (as we understood him) the fees exacted from them were too high. He thought that, instead of two hundred dollars, the fee might safely be reduced to one hundred dollars.

Mr. McKINLEY said, that great unanimity had prevailed in the committee with regard to the amount of the fees to be charged for patents. On that subject there had been no difficulty. The great difficulty had been so to frame the law as to prevent the issuing of patents for useless inventions. It had been at length settled that the increasing of the fees would have the effect of lessening the number of patents. The committee had had another object in view; and this was to increase the responsibility of the officers charged with the management of the business; for it had been found that many patents had issued where the fees had not been accounted for; and it was to provide against this that the first section had been framed. Mr. McK. thought there was no danger of any useful inventions being excluded from the public notice in consequence of the increase of fees to seventy dollars; that sum was too small to prevent any one from taking out a patent for any invention of sufficient importance to promise him any remuneration for his skill and labor. With regard to the proposed charge of two hundred dollars for a patent to a foreigner, he thought with the gentleman from South Carolina, that some distinction ought to be made between citizens and strangers, and that settling some definite principle on which they might be admitted to the privileges of our Patent Office, would be preferable to leaving their cases to separate legislation.

Mr. ROWAN thought the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] had not given the subject that reflection to which its importance entitled it. He was of opinion that seventy-five dollars, the sum to which the fees were proposed to be increased, would not prevent the inventors of what are really useful from obtaining a patent; because they will always be able to purchase a patent if the invention be valuable. But the people of this country had been so frequently imposed on by their Eastern brethren, who travel over the country with their patented notions, which they sell to the honest and unsuspecting farmers. When they had not money, the patentees would dispose of their notions for notes or obligations; but, before the note or obligation becomes due, the imposition is found out—payment is refused—suit is entered, and the industrious farmer is dragged at a great expense and inconvenience from his business to the Federal court. He had seen many such cases himself. He mentioned a patent for distilling by steam, and another for a "bulk head," that were old and utterly useless, though they were sold, and the purchaser brought a great distance to the Federal court to defend himself against the imposition. He did not suppose that the great discoverers of the cotton gin, the steamboat, &c. could have been lost from the fee being raised to seventy-five dollars. But when the fee is only twenty or thirty dollars, every trifling notion is patented, to the injury of the people, and the patentee not infrequently. He did not think that our countrymen required much legal encouragement to stimulate the spirit of improvement. Let any one go into the Patent Office, and he will find that the spirit is not very sluggish. It was prudent, to be sure, not to damp it by imposing an enormous tax. As it related to the tax on foreign patentees, the committee were influenced in placing it at two hundred dollars, from having understood that that fee was smaller than what is required by the laws of foreign nations. In reply to the idea advanced by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES] that the increase of fees would decrease the duty of the office, and consequently so far remove the necessity for clerks, Mr. R. reminded the gentleman from Maine, that if his reasoning were correct, still the duties of the office have more than doubled, and hence the necessity for the additional clerks provided for by the bill. He had understood that the revenue derived from the office would support these clerks, and still leave a surplus to go into the treasury. Unless as a general measure, Mr. R. had no particular concern for this office; but as it was necessary and important to the country, he thought that the arrangement and provisions of the bill would have a salutary tendency.

Mr. DICKERSON observed, it was true, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, that he was not much acquainted with the subject. He did not before know that a bill of that nature had been before the Senate. His opinion still was, and he thought that a little reflection would bring the gentleman from Kentucky to the same conclusion, that there was no necessity of increasing the fees for patents. Any increase of fees could only be made for one or two objects—for purposes of revenue, or for the sake of diminishing the number of patents. Now, although he was perfectly willing to increase the number of clerks in the Patent Office, he never wished to see any revenue derived from it; and as to the idea of diminishing the issue of patents, he could not see how the increasing of the fees could possibly have that effect. Those who gave their time to the invention and improvement of machinery, could, either through the instrumentality of friends, or on the credit of a useful invention, raise money enough to pay for the patent; and those whose inventions were not useful, would be most apt, through want of skill, to set a high value on them; and procure, by some means or other, the price of a patent. But the gentleman from Kentucky talked of the number of Eastern notions, by means of which the people of his State had been defrauded. Now Mr. D. would only observe, that notions were not peculiar to the people of the East—they were to be found every where—as well in the North, South, and West, as in the East; and those who did not like Eastern notions, might turn the tables on them. Mr. DICKERSON would have no objection to any reasonable plan for diminishing the number of patents issuing from the Patent Office, for he believed as much folly was collected there as ever was collected together in any one place in the world; but he did not believe that any increase of fees would remedy the evil; it would only have the effect of laying a tax on genius, without producing any good. With regard to that part of the bill which charges two hundred dollars for the patent to foreigners, he was opposed to it, and moved to strike out "two hundred" and insert fifty dollars.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he thought the provision respecting foreigners a very fair one—it was one of perfect reciprocity. He would suggest one idea to the chairman of the committee that presented the amendment relating to the admission of foreigners to the benefits of the patent law—it is this: when patents are granted under the existing laws, the patentees have the exclusive right to dispose of their rights, and, when they are sold, it is in our own country; but the privilege to foreigners, by the provisions of the bill, are such, that if they do not choose to sell in this country, we are deprived of the advantage of using them for fourteen years, while their own country may be enjoying the use of them. All know the jealousy that exists in other countries in relation to this subject, and the fear that we should become acquainted with the principles of their inventions.

Mr. HAYNE observed, that, as far as the committee had been able to ascertain, the regulations, or nearly similar, which prevailed here in relation to patent laws, prevailed in Europe. There was no possibility of regulating, by law, the sale of patented inventions; but he believed if any foreigner took out a patent and refused to sell, he would incur a forfeiture. A provision might be inserted in the bill, that the foreign patentee must sell; but he must also be allowed to fix his price. That difficulty was inseparable from the subject. It appeared to him, [Mr. H.] that the only security to be had, was in that strong sense of interest which would induce every man to sell out his invention speedily, for the purpose of realizing the expected profit.

Mr. CHAMBERS, in reply to the observations of the gentleman from Georgia, said, that if the citizen or subject of a foreign power were to obtain a patent in this country for an invention, in order to restrict its use to his own country, an American citizen might use it, subject to an action for damages in a court of law; and if a foreigner were to come here to obtain a patent for the purpose of prohibiting for using it, he was of the opinion that a court of justice would not award much damages for a violation of the law, when, in the country in which the patent was used, such violation did not interfere with its sale. Mr. C. was of the opinion that every dollar derived from the revenue of the Patent Office should be expended for the encouragement of the useful arts; or, in other words, that there should not be a dollar drawn from the proceeds of the office, after paying its expenses, to go into the United States' treasury. He was, therefore, opposed to the increase of patent fee, proposed by the bill. With respect to the provision for admitting foreigners to the benefits of the patent law, he approved of it. He believed that, according to the present mode of passing special bills for that purpose, the cost to the Government, in every instance, exceeded two hundred dollars, and the trouble and expense to the individual were also great and perplexing. He mentioned one case, where a gentleman had been a whole year waiting on Congress, to obtain a patent right for a useful and important invention. Yet, from the multiplicity of business before them, the bill could not be acted on; and the applicant, after having subjected himself to great expense and loss of time, was obliged to abandon his object until another session.

Mr. ROWAN observed, that, if the gentleman from New Jersey had bestowed any examination on the subject, he would, with his usual reflection, have seen the difficulties attendant upon permitting individuals to monopolize the sale of articles belonging to the common concerns of life, under the pretence of taking out a patent for them. His constituents were so simple as to believe that when any thing emanated from Washington, and having the sanction of high official authority, it established an undoubted right to the article specified. They, moreover, had such a horror of being dragged before the Federal courts, that they were too apt to give up, and suffer themselves to be defrauded, either by paying the whole, or by a compromise. Did not the gentleman see the evils resulting from individuals claiming the exclusive right to articles formed from the dictates of common sense, and of common and daily use? There was nothing that the Eastern patent venders had not taken out patents for—from washing-machines to millinery; (he did not mean the fig-leaf, but improvements in the mode of cutting female dresses;) the baking of bread, (he apprehended bread was used before the old people left the garden;) nothing had escaped them. With respect to the gentleman's arguments that the increase of fees would not diminish the number of patents, it might apply to marriages, though not to patents; for he believed those who married were not tempted into matrimony by the lowness of the fees, nor would those inclined to celibacy be kept out of it solely by any high fees that might be imposed. Let us [said Mr. ROWAN] offer sufficient encouragement to the obtaining of patents—but let us not believe that no impositions are practised, and, in consequence, refrain from imposing such restraints as will, in some degree, have the effect of preventing them.

Mr. NOBLE said, as to the marriage fees alluded to by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. ROWAN] he thought they did not suit his purpose. He was astonished that there was not another clause introduced in the bill, making provision for taking out patents for reform. These were to have been the days of regeneration, but he believed they were the days of degeneration. This Secretary of State of ours wants four thousand five hundred dollars for the Patent Office—two more clerks under his patronage. Would he go in person to the Patent Office? No, sir; he would not, though I believe him small enough to go into one of the rat traps there. He said he would vote against the bill and amendment; instead of increasing the tax to seventy-five dollars, he would prefer reducing the present tax at least one-half. As regards the foreigners, he would act on that if it were important; but as to the four thousand five hundred dollars which were to be given for these changes, he had no idea of it.

Mr. HAYNE had only one word to say. He would have been much better satisfied if the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] had not made his motion, particularly as that gentleman had expressed himself as opposed to the admission of foreigners to the privileges of the patent law. If he were opposed to them, he ought not to facilitate the means of embracing it, which is the inevitable tendency of his amendment. He [Mr. H.] had great confidence in the inventive genius of his countrymen, and was inclined to think that we would gain more than we would lose by the provisions of the bill. The four thousand five hundred dollars which the gentleman from Indiana wished to withhold, [Mr. H. said] would be necessary to keep the office in order, preserve the models, records, &c.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that gentlemen were mistaken as to his motives. He was not opposed to granting patents to foreigners, but he was opposed to granting them as a matter of right. He wished the present practice to continue, and then such restrictions could be imposed on the issuing of a patent to a foreigner as the nature of the case required.

Mr. FORSYTH was not satisfied to adopt the amendment proposed to the bill, and wished farther time for reflection on it; he therefore moved to lay it on the table till to-morrow; which was agreed to.

THE INDIANS.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, of New Jersey, said, that the proposed amendment prohibits the appropriation of any part of this fund towards secret presents for the chiefs or head men of the Indian nations. When it was introduced by the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MC-KINLEY] the objection urged was, that it would be regarded as a reflection upon the purity of the present administration; that so ungracious an imputation should be studiously avoided, especially at the commencement of a Presidential term. Then, sir, secret presents seemed to be regarded with universal execration. The amendment and the bill were laid on the table; and to my great surprise now, we hear the honorable Senator from Georgia attempting to justify the practice of presents made to chiefs, by the usage of the Government, for many years back, even to 1793; and we are charged with a squeamish fastidiousness of morals for venturing to question the propriety, or policy, or wisdom of the measure. Sir, we are even threatened with the indignation and scorn which those are sure to receive, who dare denounce a custom sustained and countenanced by great names. Sir, such terrors did not reach me; and no array of names shall deter me from pronouncing this odious practice of dealing with those feeble tribes, by means of such corrupting agencies, an abomination for which no vindication nor apology can be made. Sir, neither time nor names can change the character or the qualities of things. The great moral distinctions between virtue and vice, truth and error, are inherent and irreversible. And when my honorable friend left his precedents, and spoke as his feelings sprang up, warm and purely, his own fervid exhibitions of all the mischiefs that have resulted from such practices were the strongest arguments against the whole system of Indian negotiations.

Sir, he correctly stated that we deny to these tribes all competition in the sale of their lands; no State, no individual can approach them with terms. We, the Government alone, are to buy. We propose the quantity, the price, the mode of payment; and then what follows? We send the public purse along with our agents; and they are to select the chiefs who are most in the confidence of their people, and the tempting bribe is addressed to their selfish passions, and their consent is yielded to such debasing and corrupting influences. Sir, is it not time to pause and retrace our steps? There needs a stronger support for this humiliating custom than the ridicule of what the gentleman is pleased to denominate a sickly morality.

The honorable Senator from Georgia has insisted that the matter of difficulty between Government and the Cherokees is settled. That she has extended her laws over them; that they will go into operation in June next; that the Executive of the United States, whose duty and province it is to construe the act regulating Indian intercourse, has decided that he cannot interfere; and there, argues the gentleman, the matter ends, and the Cherokees must submit. Sir, I mean not on this collateral subject of amendment to be drawn into the discussion of the great questions of Indian rights and our national obligations. But I confess it was with astonishment that I listened to the disposition made of these interesting concerns by the gentleman. I had supposed, sir, that the conduct of Georgia in her legislation over the Cherokees was still a debatable subject. The country feels it to be so. It has awakened a tone of feeling that thrills to the very heart of this republic. But the honorable Senator proclaims a triumph before even a contest has been had. He raises the notes of victory, while the conflict is still matter of expectation only.

Sir, we presume to deny to the President the constitutional power of adjusting and concluding the extent or the fulfilment of treaty obligations; and we differ altogether from his construction. We mean to contend, and hope to show, that Georgia is wrong; that by her legislation she has entered the fields of the feeble and friendless, whom we, as a nation, are bound to protect. And, sir, we shall not in this discussion, and we hope not in our legislation in this hall, bow to any Executive rescript whatever. We shall revise the interpretations which the President in his late message has thought fit to present to Congress, of the relations of Georgia and ourselves towards the Indians and each other. We cannot, in the discharge of high public duties, defer to Executive will, nor leave to him the common right inherent in this co-ordinate department of power, of ascertaining and deciding when and how far our treaties bind us, and when and under what circumstances the nation is absolved.

Sir, if we yield up this right, the struggles of the Revolution will have been in vain. There will be but the exchange of tyrants. I am very certain that our Chief Magistrate will not seriously assume such extravagant powers. We shall, at all times, protest against their exercise, and resist a despotism that would despoil the American Senate of some of its vital functions. Sir, this is the high vantage ground, where freemen meet to revive and discuss public duties and obligations; and we mean to do this fearlessly, uncontrolled by Executive fiat, and unawed by the denunciations of any Senator of any State.

We hope that Congress will declare the nature of our duty to the Cherokees, and will effectually interpose the strong arm of our Government between their invaded rights and the pretensions of the State of Georgia. But should we fail here, we shall not, as has been intimated, advise resistance. If Congress abandon these, their dependant allies, no one of all the friends of Indian rights, who shall dare encounter the share of reproach that seems to be preparing for them, will, I trust, counsel the Cherokees to resist unto blood. If the United States, with their faith and honor pledged to these nations in scores, shall withdraw their protecting shield from around and above them; if the ægis, that in the days of her truth she raised, shall now be rudely and cruelly torn away, we shall refer the poor, driven, persecuted Indians over to the tender mercies of Georgia; and we hope that she, in the time of her triumph, will not forget the law of kindness.

The gentleman complains that prejudices have been excited on this subject, and that Georgia has been selected, without reason, and against all justice, as the peculiar object of unfounded reproaches. Sir, so far as this matter may now be presented to the consideration of Congress, I regard it as a pure, abstract question of political and civil right, on which I feel no prejudice, and desire only a temperate, calm, and full discussion. That public attention and interest have been particularly directed to the State represented by the honorable Senator, has arisen from our treaty relations with the Cherokees, and the strong grounds lately assumed by Georgia in her assertion of sovereign power over these people. This State cannot expect, sir, that the rights of property and self-government, by us solemnly guaranteed to the Cherokees, shall be invaded by any member of the Union, a party to such guaranty, and no inquiry or complaint made.

If the authorities of the United States shall maintain the rights of the Southern Indians against all State encroachments, I trust, sir, that the States who may have any interest in the question will submit; from Georgia, sir, I can anticipate no different result. She does not, I presume, pretend to infallibility, nor would she dispute but that she may have been mistaken in the interpretation of her rights; and a generous, high-minded people will, I hope, acquiesce in the determination of a tribunal that can have no other concern in this momentous question than to secure for it a patient hearing and a righteous decision.

Mr. McKINLEY replied to Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN; after which, on motion of Mr. WHITE, The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 23, 1830.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the Mississippi.

Mr. SPRAGUE made some additional remarks on the subject, in reply to the observations of other gentlemen.

Mr. WHITE then commenced a reply to the gentlemen who had opposed the report and bill; and did not conclude before the usual hour for adjournment.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1830.

The bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi, was resumed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITE concluded his remarks in reply to the arguments of gentlemen in opposition to the bill; and

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN made some observations in explanation of some parts of his former remarks, which he thought had been misapprehended by Mr. WHITE.

The question on Mr. F's amendment was divided, and first taken on adding to the bill the following proviso:

Provided always, That until the said tribes or nations shall choose to remove, as by this act is contemplated, they shall be protected in their present possessions, and in the enjoyment of all their rights of territory and government, as heretofore exercised and enjoyed, from all interruptions and encroachments.

The proviso was rejected.

The question was then taken on the other proviso, which is as follows:

And provided also, That, before any removal shall take place of any of the said tribes or nations, and before any exchange or exchanges of land be made as aforesaid, the rights of any such tribes or nations in the premises, shall be stipulated for, secured, and guaranteed, by treaty or treaties, as heretofore made.

This was also rejected.

Before taking the question on the above provision, Mr. BARTON rose and said, he voted for this amendment in Committee of the Whole, and should do so again, upon its own intrinsic merits, for it was intrinsically right or wrong, without regard to either the present administration or to the particular question in the South, in which Georgia felt a peculiar interest; yet both of these latter questions had been introduced into the debate upon this amendment.

Some of the friends of the administration [said Mr. B.] object to the amendment on the ground of its being unusual, and amounting to a reflection upon the present administration. So far from that being my object, the amendment was offered by a supporter of the administration, not as a reflection on the President, but upon the discovery of an actual case of such bribery of Indian chiefs, during the last summer, to sell the lands of their tribe, and after a rejection of the stipulation for the bribe in this Senate, with a view to prohibit, by law, the use of such means in future. We do not accuse the President of having countenanced the bribery; and it would be a feather in the cap of the administration, to introduce the elevated and honorable principle of the amendment into our contracts or treaties with the miserable remnants of the once powerful owners of the country, by declaring, by a law, to govern all our public agents, President and Commissioners, that neither force, nor fraud, nor direct, secret bribery, shall be resorted to in acquiring the lands of those helpless people, whose guardians we affect to be.

I hope the mere circumstance of the last administration having taken the high ground of rejecting, with disdain, an offer to use bribes in such negotiations, will not be sufficient reason to reject the amendment. This sin cannot be visited upon any particular administration. We must be responsible as a nation for its existence; but let us not recede from the ground taken by the last administration, which emphatically repudiated the practice. And as to the exciting Georgia question, it has no proper connexion with this bill or amendment. This bill is to extinguish Indian title north of the Ohio, in Indiana, and does not touch the Georgia question at all; and presents a fair opportunity of putting down, by law, without prejudice to Georgia, a practice that has been improperly revived under the present administration, and we presume without the sanction of the President. Disguise this question as you may, it is substantially whether we will sanction by our votes the use of secret bribes to obtain cessions of Indian lands. And I am sorry the Senator from Alabama has abandoned the amendment that would have done so much honor to the administration of which he is a supporter. This is a Government of law, and the national honor is concerned to prohibit, by law, all our agents, whether they be Presidents or subordinates, from continuing so unfair and dishonorable a practice, which we admit has crept into our negotiations. Secret bribes to chiefs, without the knowledge or consent of the poor tribes, whose guardians we affect to be, to sell us the lands of the tribe, sullies the honor of the nation, and renders the contract void, if the Indians had power to assert their rights.

The Senators from Tennessee, Louisiana, and Illinois, [Messrs. GRUNDY, LIVINGSTON, and KANE] argue, however, that this amendment interferes with the treaty-making power of the President, given by the constitution. It is true the treaty-making power is given to the President, subject to the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate; and it is equally true that a great revolution has occurred during this session in this body, upon the subject of the unrestrainable powers of the President. Formerly, the rage was to render the President a cypher—to dispute his right to accept an invitation in the recess of the Senate, to begin a negotiation to be afterwards submitted to the Senate for their advice and consent, as in the Panama mission. Now, a treaty may be held without an appropriation, even after a refusal to grant an appropriation. At this session the majority have carried their confidence in the President so far as to surrender the restraining power of the Senate over an abusive exercise of the power of removing unfit or delinquent officers, by converting the whole offices and emoluments of the country into mere bribes to purchase popularity, reward partisans, and punish opponents for votes and opinions; and have utterly refused to permit any inquiry into the causes of such removals; and have established in the palace a four years' secret despotism and inquisition, contrary to all the former opinions, votes, and proceedings of themselves under other administrations; thus screening the President from a public knowledge of the true causes of removing men too honest, and too proud of their rights, to buy peace and office by a surrender of their sacred right of opinion and election!

Formerly, the rage was to strip the Federal Government of its beneficial powers, dissolve and scatter it into the semi-anarchy then miscalled State rights; now, the Executive head is made an absolute despot for four years, while the other branches of the Government are prostrated in the dust, or their useful existence assailed. It is admitted that the treaty-making power belongs to the President and Senate by the constitution. And what is a treat for Indian lands but a contract between the parties? And what is the President but the agent of the Union, in making such contract? Or is the President the nation? So, also, by the same constitutional authority, individuals may make a contract; and it is even provided, that a law shall be passed impairing the obligation of their contracts. But does that prevent a government from enacting laws to prevent agents or principals from using bribery and fraud as the means of cheating the weaker party out of his property? Laws against the use of force, fraud, and the bribery of agents, are enacted every day when needed; and yet the right of free contracts between individuals is of as high constitutional authority as that of contracting for Indian lands. Then, if Indian treaties for lands be contracts of bargain and sale, as they are, force, fraud, or bribery vitiates the contract, and makes it void. So men, angels, and divinities would consider it. But the difficulty lies here: the Indians have not the physical power to assert their rights; nor have they, like Portugal, a powerful and warlike nation at hand to protect them, when we play false to them; nor any just common tribunal to decide the matter in their favor, when we, their boasted guardians, bribe their avaricious or needy chiefs to sell their lands, or force them to do so under the mouths of our cannon bearing upon them through the portholes of our western forts, by telling them of the irresistible power of their great father the President, and his warriors. And after a treaty for their lands shall be effected by force, fraud, or bribes, what serious chance has the poor Indian to come before this Senate and show all the facts and circumstances, so as to induce the Senate to reject the treaty? Unless, indeed, your President be the nation, himself, how can it infringe the constitutional power of the President and Senate to make bargains of purchase of Indian lands, for the nation to prohibit by law our agent or negotiator from employing such means to cheat the weaker party as would render the contract void? Who but the law-making power can prohibit a practice, which, so far from being a use of the power given by the constitution, is a gross and shameful abuse of it, unless, indeed, the President be above law? Unless the supremacy to all law be accorded to the President, as well as a freedom from all inquiry into the abusive exercise of his power of removal from office for cause, and from all restraint of the Senate, we have as much power to prohibit the use of bribes to him, as to any other agent or individual in the Union. So far from infringing the constitutional power, it would only guard it from the approach and contamination of bribes, as other contracts are and should be.

There is another high constitutional power secured by the same instrument—the great elective right of free choice of a President, as high and constitutional as the power to bargain for Indian lands. Would it infringe that right to guard it from the bribes of Executive patronage? If so, your famous six bills reported during the last administration, under pretence of guarding the country from that influence, are all unconstitutional. This minority is entitled to the credit of having revived these bills since the discussion on "Foot's resolution." They died at their birth in 1826, and have slumbered in their graves ever since, until this minority, by the friction and the fire of that debate, restored them to life, and presented them to their wondering fathers. They come too late in the session to save the country from the ravages of corrupt proscription and despotism; but they may be in good time to save the credit and consistency of their authors.

Suppose, as the case happens to be, that this administration should use all the offices and emoluments of the country, in their newly usurped power, as mere capital, to purchase popularity and votes, and reward partisans; and the removing powers of the President should be perverted from their public purposes to punish men for their opinions and votes; until the spirit of the nation should be so corrupted that we should see those loungers behind our seats, skulking about the city all the session, come from the extremities of the Union, to press the administration to remove gentlemen from office, and to resume the work of reform, from which they were frightened until the late decision of the Senate to sustain them by refusing inquiry into the causes of removal, to make room to reward such creatures for the base prostitution of their votes (for influence they had none) at the last election, in hopes of office—would it be unconstitutional to guard the great elective franchise of the United States from such bribes?

Impeachment of Judge Peck.

[SENATE.]

Look at those mercenary expectants behind our seats and in the gallery! One would be content with an Indian agency; another would be satisfied, for the present, with some land office, or the like; a third presses the removal of a postmaster, that he may be rewarded for guessing at the strong side, by being placed in a situation to purify the rays of mental light and the streams of national intelligence, by exercising a servile and corrupt system of espionage upon the correspondence of our citizens, under the late subservency to party discipline to which the General Post Office has been subjected.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. KANE] not only places the President's mere agency in negotiating these contracts for Indian lands above the control of the laws of the land, but boldly attempts to justify the use of secret bribes by the milder name of secret presents, by telling us that they are not used to induce the chiefs to do wrong, but to induce obstinate chiefs to do right!

Such an argument would, if valid, destroy the capacity of the Indian tribe to make the contract. That is merely saying we, the strong party, are to be the judges when it is right for the weak party to sell their lands, and then to bribe their agents to do the right thing!

No, sir, it is no infringement of the constitutional power to buy Indian lands, to enter into private contracts, or to elect a Chief Magistrate, to guard them all by law from the contamination of bribes, either secret or public; but such a prohibition by the Legislature of the Union would redound to the honor of the administration that enacted it, and to the nation, for thus introducing into our intercourse with the Indians the elevated and honorable principle, not by varying Executive will, but by a permanent law.

Mr. SPRAGUE then moved to add a proviso in the following words:

Provided always, That until the said tribes or nations shall choose to remove, as is by this act contemplated, they shall be protected in their present possessions, and in the enjoyment of all their rights of territory and government, as promised or guaranteed to them by treaties with the United States, according to the true intent and meaning of such treaties.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN next offered the following proviso:

Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize the departure from, or non-observance of, any treaty, compact, agreement, or stipulation heretofore entered into, and now subsisting, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians.

This amendment was rejected.

On motion of Mr. McKINLEY, the fourth section was amended, by adding thereto the words following:

And upon the payment of such valuation, the improvements so valued and paid for shall pass to the United States; and possession shall not afterwards be permitted to any of the same tribe.

A verbal amendment in the fourth section, proposed by Mr. SPRAGUE, having been agreed to,

Mr. SANFORD moved to add the following section:

And be it further enacted, That where the lands in any State are held by Indians, and such lands belong to the State, subject to the claim of the Indians, or the State or its grantees are entitled to purchase the Indian title, the President of the United States may give and assign to any such Indians any suitable district or portions of the lands described in the first section of this act, when any such Indians shall choose to remove to, and reside on, the western lands, so as to be assigned to them.

Mr. WOODBURY moved to add thereto the following:

Provided, That no part of the expense of extinguishing the titles, or paying for the improvements of the lands on the removal, or of the first year's residence of the Indians, referred to in this section, shall be borne by the United States.

This was accepted by Mr. SANFORD, as a modification of his motion; and the amendment was then rejected.

On motion by Mr. FORSYTH, the second section was amended, by adding thereto the following:

When the land claimed and occupied by the Indians is owned by the United States, or the United States are bound to the State within which it lies, to extinguish the Indian claim thereto.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the blank in the eighth section was filled with five hundred thousand dollars, and the bill reported to the Senate with the amendments; which, having been concurred in,

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN moved further to amend the bill, by adding the following proviso; which was rejected:

Provided, That before any exchange or removal shall take place, the President of the United States shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint, three suitable persons, and by them cause the country to which it is proposed to remove the Indians to be fully explored, and a report made to the President, and by him to Congress, of the extent of good and arable lands that can be obtained, and of the proportion of woodland in such country, and of its adaptation to the objects of this bill, and to the wants and habits of the Indian nations.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Barnard, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Noble, Rowan, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Knight, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Webster, Willey—19.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, APRIL 26, 1830.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE PECK.

MESSRS. BUCHANAN and STORRS, members of the House of Representatives, with a message from that House, were announced; and, having taken the seats assigned them,

The PRESIDENT informed them that the Senate was ready to receive any communication they might have to make.

Mr. BUCHANAN then rose and said: We are commanded, in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, to impeach James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of Missouri, of high misdemeanors in office; and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same; and we do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said James H. Peck, to answer to said impeachment.

Messrs. BUCHANAN and STORRS having retired,

Mr. TAZEWELL rose and said, that in looking over similar cases, for the purpose of ascertaining what would be the proper course of proceeding, he discovered that messages, similar in most particulars to the one just received, had been presented to the Senate in three cases. The first was the case of John Blount, one of the members of this body; the next was that of John Pickering, Judge of the District Court of New Hampshire; and the third was that of Judge Chase. Upon each of these cases, there seemed to have been some anxious consideration, in order to adopt the course most proper to be pursued. Mr. T. would state in what the proceedings in these cases differed. The case of Mr. Blount being the first of the kind that had ever occurred, presented so anomalous a practice that it never could be referred to as a precedent. The other two were consistent with the general principles of law and justice. From these it seems that it had been settled, that, when the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they were about to present articles of impeachment, a Select Committee was appointed to take the subject into consideration, and report what measures were proper to be taken. He would read, for the information of the Senate, the cases as they occurred.

"In the Senate of the United States, March 3d, 1803.

"A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Messrs. Nicholson and Randolph, two of the members of said House, in the words following:

"Mr. President, we are commanded in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, to impeach John Pickering, Judge of the District Court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same.

"We are further commanded to demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachment.

"On motion,

"Ordered, That the message received this day from the House of Representatives, respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, Judge of a District Court, be referred to Messrs. Tracy, Clinton, and Nicholas, to consider and report thereon."

In the case of Judge Chase, the articles of impeachment were presented at the bar of the Senate by Messrs. Randolph, Rodney, Nicholson, Early, Nelson, and Geo. W. Campbell, managers on the part of the House of Representatives. [Mr. TAZEWELL here read the proceedings, from which it appeared that the Senate had previously decided what forms should be observed in receiving the articles of impeachment, and that the managers, on appearing at the bar of the Senate, were prepared with and presented the articles.]

The case of Blount was not exactly similar to either of the cases he had cited. This was in the year 1797. [Mr. T. then read the proceedings of that case.] The idea [said Mr. T.] of calling upon an individual to enter into a recognizance to appear at no named time, at no given place, and to answer to charges the Lord knew what, (for no articles of impeachment had been made out,) was so manifestly contrary to justice, that the Senate itself seemed to have abandoned it, for the accused did not appear, and no further proceedings were had until the next session of Congress. Under all the circumstances, Mr. T. took it for granted that Blount's case would not be considered as a fit precedent, but that the proceedings in the cases of Pickering and Chase would be resorted to; and he therefore moved that the message of the House of Representatives be referred to a select committee, to consist of three Senators, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. TAZEWELL's motion having been carried,

Mr. BENTON asked to be excused from voting on the subject; and the question being taken, Mr. B. was excused.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for a committee; and, on counting the ballots, it appeared that Messrs. TAZEWELL, BELL, and WEBSTER were chosen.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

The resolution proposed some time ago by Mr. BARTON, calling upon the President of the United States to inform the Senate of the reasons that induced him to remove James Carson, Register of the Land Office at Palmyra, in the State of Missouri, was called up.

Mr. GRUNDY asked for the yeas and nays on its passage.

Mr. MCKINLEY thought, as so much had been said and published on the other side of the question, that the resolution ought not to pass without a farther examination of the ground it had assumed, and the reasoning by which that ground was attempted to be maintained. If no one else would say any thing on the subject, he would notice it himself. As he understood the question presented in the resolution, it was one of power. It was contended that the President of the United States had no power to remove an officer without the consent of the Senate. If such a proposition can be maintained, then it appeared to him that the Executive power was not confided to the President, but to the Senate. This was not the distribution of power, as regulated by the constitution of the United States. By that instrument, as he understood it, the execution of the laws was reposed in the President. The duties of the Senate were legislative. The House of Representatives had as good authority to ask and demand of the President the reasons for performing the duties confided to him by the constitution, as the Senate. He would ask the gentleman who made this proposition, to point to the authority for calling upon the President to assign the reasons to remove or nominate. If by the constitution he be empowered to see the laws faithfully executed, as he thought it would not be questioned, he could not see how the Senate could claim or exercise the same power. It was an absurdity in terms to suppose that such coequal powers could exist; yet it was evident that the ground assumed in the resolution amounted to such a claim. If the Executive and Senatorial powers be coequal, the President has the same right to demand of the Senate the reasons why they reject his nomination, that the Senate has to call upon him for the causes of removal; and he might say, that, until such reasons were assigned, he would make no further nominations, and throw the responsibility on the Senate.

But it is contended that the President is not responsible to any tribunal, but to the Senate; and that, if the Senate are not permitted to check him, there is no power any where else during his term of office to restrain his tyranny; and that he may remove from office without cause. He would ask, to what tribunal is the Senate amenable for their conduct during their term of service? They were both responsible to the same tribunal—the people. It seemed to him a strange state of things for the Senate to erect themselves into a tribunal, for such an investigation. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Marbury and Madison, so far as a decision of that court could effect the constitutional power of the Executive, had put the whole question for ever to rest. By that decision, the power of removal was demonstrated to be exclusively in the discretionary power of the President; and if he abused it, he could only be punished by the people.

Mr. KNIGHT said, that when the resolution was first introduced, he had been at a loss to know what object could be attained by its adoption. If any legislative act could grow out of it, there might be some reason for its adoption; but if no legislation could follow, it seemed to him that it would be a perfect act of supererogation. He should be glad to be informed on this point. When the President sent nominations to the Senate, it might be very proper to call upon him for his reasons for the removal of a public officer, and to inquire why the Senate had been asked the second time to sanction an appointment to the same office.

Mr. KANE said, the Senate was certainly satisfied that it was unnecessary now to consume time in arguing a question that had so often been decided, and decided, too, by yeas and nays. The question had been settled; and, with a view of putting an end to useless and unprofitable debate, he would move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BARTON requested Mr. KANE to withdraw the motion, saying he wished to answer the question of the gentleman from Rhode Island; and Mr. KANE having consented to withdraw the motion, Mr. BARTON addressed the Senate at some length; and when he had concluded,

Mr. KANE renewed the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

This question was decided in the affirmative; yeas 22, nays 15.

TUESDAY, APRIL 27, 1830.

JUDGE PECK.

Mr. TAZEWELL, from the Select Committee appointed on the subject, made the following report, which was concurred in by the Senate:

Whereas the House of Representatives on the 26th of the present month, by two of their members, Messrs. BUCHANAN and STORRS, of New York, at the bar of the Senate, impeached James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, of high misdemeanors in office, and acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same; and likewise demanded, that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said James H. Peck, to answer the said impeachment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

And the committee further recommended to the Senate, that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to notify the House of Representatives of the foregoing resolution.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1830.

THE EXECUTIVE POWERS.

The following resolutions, offered yesterday by Mr. HOLMES, were taken up for consideration.

Resolved, That the President of the United States, by the removal of officers, (which removal was not required for the faithful execution of the law,) and filling the vacancies thus created in the recess of the Senate, acts against the interest of the people, the rights of the States, and the spirit of the constitution.

Resolved, That it is the right of the Senate to inquire, and the duty of the President to inform them, why, and for what cause or causes, any officer has been removed in the recess.

Resolved, That the removals from office by the President since the last session of the Senate, seem, with few exceptions, to be without satisfactory reasons, against the public interest, the rights of the States, and the spirit of the constitution: Wherefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to communicate to the Senate the number, names, and offices, of the officers removed by him since the last session of the Senate, with the reasons for each removal."

In support of these resolutions,

Mr. HOLMES rose and said, that it was, perhaps, fortunate for him that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. KANE] had snatched the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BARTON] out of his hands, and placed it beyond the reach of debate. And, [said Mr. H.] although it was no mark of liberality, and, at other periods, would have been called by a very different name, yet it has given me an opportunity to discuss the question on a more extended scale. I have been waiting for this opportunity (not for the edification of the Senate, but for the instructions of the public) to give my views of the power of the President to create vacancies and fill them in the recess of the Senate, and to illustrate my remarks by a brief historical sketch of the practice of the Government since the adoption of the constitution. Notwithstanding the able arguments of my friends from Delaware and Missouri [Messrs. CLAYTON and BARTON] and others who have touched upon this topic, still the facts, more in detail, are necessary for a full understanding of the subject. The people want more light, and, so far as my feeble taper will reflect it, they shall have it.

But, sir, I will come directly to the questions raised by the resolutions, and my position is this: That the President of the United States may, by removals in the recess of the Senate, abuse the power; that he has abused it; and that the Senate, a co-ordinate branch of the Executive, is the only effectual tribunal to restrain or correct him; and that, consequently, this is the one which was intended by the constitution.

Before I proceed to the discussion of this proposition, I will make two brief remarks. The first is, that though the constitution has given the appointing power to the President and Senate, and to the President alone to fill vacancies which "may happen in the recess," it says not one word about the removing power. Now, as there is no provision for this removing power, it would be fair to infer that it belonged to the appointing power, or that it was to be defined by law. No law has defined it, and it might seem to follow that every removal since the adoption of the constitution was illegal and unconstitutional. The framers and expounders of this constitution, before it was ratified by the States and the people, were of the opinion that the removing and appointing powers were co-ordinate. The practice under it, however, has been, that the right of removal was vested in the President alone.

The second remark is, that, except of Judiciary officers, the tenure of office is nowhere defined. The questions, therefore, which would naturally arise, are, can Congress define it by law, or is it vested in the discretion of the President and Senate, or the President alone? Is it inferrible that because the constitution has defined the tenure of a certain class of officers, that therefore it has placed all others at the will of the President? It would, in my view, be a far fetched conclusion.

But, sir, supposing that the power of removal, in the recess of the Senate, be vested by the constitution in the President, still the question recurs, cannot the Senate correct an abuse of this power? It would seem to me that there was no other adequate corrective. If the power is not here, where else are you to look for it?

Sir, it is not merely the loss of office, which has created such individual suffering, and which (as my friend from Missouri remarked) "makes the land pale;" it is not the distresses which I witness around me, that most afflicts me; it is the principle upon which this is attempted to be justified; it is the danger to the public interest, from new and inexperienced officers, to manage our complicated concerns, and, above all, the alarming doctrine of absolute Executive will. These are not only afflicting, but alarming. The States have hitherto looked to the Senate as their chief security. By the constitution, it was established for the very purpose of guarding against the popular branch of the Legislature, on the one hand, and the President, who, by his election, is chiefly a popular Executive, on the other. It was just as necessary that the Senate should hold an Executive as a Legislative check. Suppose some great political question should arise: suppose one party should wish to diminish, and even annihilate, the powers of the States, and transfer every thing to the General Government; and that, to accomplish the views of the popular branch and the popular President, all the nominations of Judicial and other officers should be made to the Senate, the guardian of State rights, from this party—would it then be contended that we could inquire no farther but into the qualifications of the officer nominated?—that we could not look beyond his talents and integrity? Imagine, further, that we should be engaged in a disastrous war, and threatened with entire conquest, and that there was but one man—one Washington, who, as Commander-in-Chief of our armies, could probably save us, but the President should nominate another, qualified, to be sure, but not pre-eminently so, nor so equal to the crisis as the other; should we then be told we cannot look beyond the qualifications of the candidate? Sir, to test a principle, it is a fair illustration to imagine a crisis, and then apply to it the limited powers of the Senate, which are contended for.

I never expected to witness the time when a majority of the Senate should surrender its powers to the Executive chief, nor even when it should be slow to stand for its rights. What, sir, the Senate of the United States, the Representatives of twenty-four sovereignties, once the most august assemblage in the world, once the inflexible guardians of State rights against Federal encroachment, now yielding to the President almost the last vestige of its Executive power! What patriot, who observes “the signs of the times,” but must deplore this obsequiousness and humiliation of the Senate of the United States?

Sir, I see in this, symptoms of monarchy more strong and palpable than those which disturbed the nerves of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON.] He has given us a vivid description of the first inauguration of the first President of the United States; and he then imagined that he saw, in the extravagant and enthusiastic adulation of the man, symptoms of a monarchical tendency. I, too, sir, think that extravagant adulation or adoration of men should not be encouraged, as it tends to detach our affections from our institutions, and to fix them upon those who contributed most to establish them. A perpetual, habitual praise of an individual has but too often converted the adorers into slaves, and the adored into a tyrant. But I suspect, that, in the case to which he alludes, he was (begging his pardon) a little fastidious, if not capricious. Washington had been too well tried, and was too firm a patriot, to be seduced by flatteries, adulations, or hosannas. And besides, sir, was there not an apology, if not a justification, for this pageantry? We had endured the distresses of the Revolutionary war; Washington had, to say the least, been the chief actor in that war, and had contributed more than any other to its successful termination. Peace came; but peace found us poor, distracted, and united only by “a rope of sand.” Something was necessary to place us on an equality, and to unite our energies. A Federal constitution was to be formed; the object was accomplished, and principally by his agency. He was unanimously elected the first Chief Magistrate, to put the machine in motion, and to give the new Government an impetus, which should secure its successful operation. The people looked back upon the past; upon the distresses of the struggle, and the consequent anarchy; they looked forward with hopeful prophecy to the future, for an end of their toils, to prosperity, liberty, and happiness, which they have since enjoyed in full fruition. Was it then strange, that, with such a prospect before them, they should have indulged in an extravagance of joy, and have idolized the man who had done so much, and was destined, as they believed, to do so much more? Yet I am against idolizing any man. I have heard of a celebration of the last eighth of January, the anniversary of a single victory. The cases were very different; one had saved a city after a peace, and the other had conquered a peace, and saved his country. Here, too, was a spacious palace, a splendid dome. At one end was erected “a throne,” and over it was “a canopy,” which was surrounded by the ladies of the palace. This palace was filled to overflowing with youth, elegance, and beauty; they were engaged in the mazy dance, when the word was given, and all was hushed and still as death; the company separated; an avenue was formed; the trumpet sounded, and lo! “he comes, the conquering hero comes,” supported and sustained by the grandees of the empire, and conducted up to the throne. He bowed graciously to the ladies of his court, mounted the steps, and was seated on “the throne.”

Was the Senator from Louisiana present? Was he one of the dignitaries who conducted his majesty up? Sure I am, no one could better deserve the distinction; but if he was there, and a thought of the scene at New York had happened to cross his mind, what must have been his reflections. Then he was in the heyday of youth; the blood ran quick, and the pulse beat strong, and hope was ready to seize on fruition. Now, he had arrived, to say the least, to the meridian of life, when reason assumes the empire of the passions, and all our predilections tend to the gloomy side. Sir, he must have looked with indignation at the disgusting scene, and, with downcast eye and heavy heart, have turned his back, and, with slow and pensive step, have retired to his home, lamenting sincerely at this dismal and fatal symptom of the destruction of his country's liberty. I do not know that there was a Mark Anthony there, who “thrice did offer a kingly crown, which he did thrice refuse.” No, that would have been premature. Then the Rubicon had not been passed; then the outposts had not been surrendered; then the Senate had not yielded up all its executive powers, and accorded to the President an unlimited and boundless discretion. After all this has been done, a crown is a matter of course; it is but a symbol of the power surrendered; the seal and sign manual of the deed of surrender.

Sir, I would not look upon “the signs of the times” with a jaundiced eye; it is not my habit to despond. I would hope even against hope; but when the Senate gives way, where is the ground of hope? Once the American people regarded it as the bulwark of their liberties. It was the rock in the midst of the ocean, defying the storm. The tempest of executive power had burst in vain upon its brow, and the billows of popular fury had broken harmless at its base; but, alas! they now see, to their unutterable disappointment, that it was but a house built upon the sand, and the rains descended, and the winds blew, and the floods came, and beat upon that house, and it fell, and great was the fall thereof. Aye, great indeed, for it contained within it the ark of our liberties; and when the house fell, that ark was crushed to atoms. We, the representatives of the States—we, their watchmen upon their walls—we, the guardians of their sovereignty, have surrendered up all executive discretion to a single Executive Chief, who can create vacancies in offices, supply them at his will, and is responsible to no earthly tribunal.

Sir, it is not altogether sympathy for friends who are made the victims of this relentless proscription, which induces me to stand here to defend these resolutions; it is not merely the injuries and cruelties which we every where witness, and which, as my friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTON] has expressed it, “makes the land pale,” which afflicts me most. I know that to see the honest, faithful, aged patriotic republican, persecuted and punished for opinion's sake, would extract a tear from the eye of the most obdurate. Yet I almost forgot their misery and pain in the all absorbing consideration of the interest and liberties of my country. It has been roundly asserted on this floor, aye, in the Senate of the United States, (and would that I could blot this last fact from my remembrance for ever,) that the President of the United States may, at his unlimited and illimitable discretion, remove officers in the recess, and appoint others to fill the vacancies, and that it is his right, and even his duty, to conceal his reasons and motives. This is his own doctrine: for this power is claimed for him by his personal and confidential friends. It has, moreover, been exercised to an extent unprecedented in this or any other civilized country in modern times.

Executive Powers of Removal.

[SENATE.]

Sir, I regret that it has fallen to the lot of the humble individual who addresses you, to assist in exposing the fallacy of this humiliating and alarming doctrine.

Sir, the powers of this Senate, once surrendered to the President, can never be reclaimed; once gone, they are gone for ever. You will, probably, never find a President so very complaisant, so very modest, as to ask you to take them back. Surely it is not to be expected from the present Chief Magistrate. If the President of the United States abuses this power of removal, as we know that this President has done, and most wantonly, where is the redress? Can Congress legislate to reach the case? In 1826, a bill, with an elaborate report, was presented by a select committee, to restrain executive patronage, which provided that whenever the President removed and appointed in the recess, it should be his duty, on his nomination to the Senate of the officer thus appointed, to communicate to them the reasons for the removal! The bill and report have, after slumbering for four years, been revived this session, and are now on your orders of the day. Whether it is intended to act upon this subject or not, it is very certain that this remedy can never reach the mischief. Suppose that this bill should pass both Houses of Congress, and you, the friends of the President, should, in a body, present it to him for his signature, what would probably be his reply? "Gentlemen, you have, over and over, again and again, determined that I had a right to remove and appoint in the recess, ad libitum, and upon my 'high responsibility.' I have you here before me 'in black and white.' You have repeatedly settled the point, that this was a business exclusively my own, and that you had no right to question my reasons or motives; and if you should, I was not bound to respond. Now, gentlemen, if I have this power, pray where did I get it? Surely not by legislation; for Congress has never given it by law. There is, then, but one answer to the question: I derive it from the constitution itself; and if it is a grant in the constitution, what right have you to take it from me by legislation? Your law is, therefore, unconstitutional. Take it back; and if two-thirds can be found to take this power from me, which a majority of you have repeatedly declared I now have by the constitution, do it, and I will appeal to the people, and we shall see what credit you will get for consistency." Now suppose he should make this concise but pungent argument, how would you answer him? I think it might puzzle the wisest to give an answer satisfactory to him.

But he might add: "Gentlemen, this is not all. Your bill and report were presented at an early period of the administration of my predecessor; it was permitted to sleep till this time; now, when I, at your own instance and request, have exercised the power of removal beyond all precedent, you offer me a law to restrain me. Whatever may be your motives, the public will draw but one inference from the transaction; they will say, this subject was not acted on under Mr. Adams's administration, because it was unnecessary; he never abused this power; there was no mischief, and therefore no need of a remedy. But the danger has now become so alarming, the distress and misery which I have created have produced such sensations, that I must be restrained by my own friends; if, therefore, I approve this law, I sign my own condemnation, my own death warrant. Take it back, and if two-thirds of both Houses will pass this vote of censure on me, let them do it." So we see, sir, that this remedy by legislation would be visionary; when a President conducted correctly, there would be no necessity for the law; and when, as in the case before us, he abused the power, his approval of the law would be an acknowledgment of the abuse; consequently the remedy by legislation is the merest vision.

What other remedy do grave Senators propose? Impeachment? Now, to name it provokes me to an involuntary smile—not a smile of approbation, but of a very different character. Impeachment! Convict a President of the United States by two-thirds of the Senate, for an exercise of a power in which a majority of the same Senate had repeatedly determined that he could do no wrong? Sir, such a proposition carries upon the very face of it its own condemnation. Besides, the Senate has no control over impeachments; it cannot impeach; it can only try. It stands here as the guardian of "State rights;" and is it probable that the House of Representatives, the popular branch, would ever impeach a President for violating these? Sir, the framers of this constitution were never so stupid as to entertain a thought that impeachment was the remedy for this abuse of executive power. Mr. Madison and others, to be sure, entertained an opinion that it was an impeachable offence. Mr. Hamilton was of the belief that the power of removal by the President did not exist at all. But I shall tremble for my country when the time shall come that the President of the United States shall be tried on an impeachment. It would be a perilous experiment, and testing the constitution in its weakest point. Nothing, perhaps, but absolute, palpable, overt treason could justify the attempt. The event would agitate the Government to its centre. It would be the shock of an earthquake. May I never live to see the time when a President of the United States shall be tried on an impeachment! However, sir, I never shall live to see it. So long as the executive patronage is thus profusely poured into both Houses of Congress, my life for it, no President will ever be impeached, much less convicted, let him do what he may. One-eighth of the last and this Senate, and a large number of the members of the other House, have been appointed to important offices, and this, too, against Gen. Jackson's own solemn pledge; and, after this, never tell me that the remedy for any abuse of power is impeachment.

But the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] can feel no danger of executive patronage from appointments from the Senate; and his reason is, that a seat of a Senator is so exalted and so desirable, that no gift of the Executive could detach him from it. It might have been so once, and I wish to heaven it were so still. But I am a practical man; I take things as they are, and I consider one fact worth a hundred theories. We know full well—the truth stares us in the face—that there are many offices in the gift of the Executive, which Senators will gladly accept, because they have accepted them. This throws his theory to the winds. But as he has indulged in speculation, let me speculate too; and I think I can find strong reasons why Senators would become solicitous for executive offices. It would seem to me there were two classes that would desire them: The first is, the young and ambitious; and ambition, properly tempered and under reasonable restraint, is a virtue. The Senate is not a "stepping stone" to the highest offices in the gift of the republic; it is not "ambition's ladder," on which to climb to the two first honors. Since the first organization of the Government, I do not recollect a single candidate for President or Vice President (whether successful or not) taken from the Senate. There have been, and I trust there are now, men in the Senate, quite as well qualified for these offices as those officers are; but it seems to be the settled custom, that neither of them shall be taken from this body. How, then, are the aspirants here to reach the object of their ambition? By being made "premiers," or other heads of departments. This is the road to glory. The other class consists of those in advanced life, who have been long here, and are fatigued, and perhaps disgusted, with the toils and conflicts which have lately become but too common, and yet from long habit they would not wish to retire to private life, as the otium cum dignitate would not exactly suit them. They would be gratified with a comfortable office, sufficient to support them, and give them an employment which would keep the mind from rusting. Hence the facts and reasonings prove that Senators would be as likely to become office seekers as other men; and, as they are subject to like passions, they would be influenced by like considerations, and therefore might become the creatures of executive will. From all these considerations, it seems to me most manifest, that, to check this abuse of power by impeachment alone, would be a hopeless experiment.

But, another remedy has been named—"public opinion." If the last would provoke a smile, this would provoke a laugh. Surrender to the President the power of removal and appointment in the recess, and at his will and pleasure, and then correct his abuses by public opinion! Sir, can gentlemen be serious in this? He has the right to withhold the evidence on which he acts; he is not obliged to disclose a single reason, but public opinion is to judge him! Yet all this while he is perverting and corrupting "public opinion." He can remove and appoint at pleasure; he has the army at his heels; he has the navy at his beck; he has the treasury at his control; during four years he holds the purse and the sword. Is this all? No; he has more—the post office and the press. He has a sentinel at every post office; he has a recruiting officer at every press. This, then is the way to check these abuses! During all this period of four years, official influence will be subduing our liberties and independence; the gangrene will have been spreading, the leprosy will have become broad and deep, and nothing but the interposition of Heaven can save us. Did our civil fathers, who gave us this constitution, deem it possible that the time would ever come, when any man should imagine that an Executive usurpation for four years could only be corrected at the end of the term? Yet this is the consolation which gentlemen would administer when they seem to admit, or cannot deny, the abuses of which we complain. Here I present, concisely and at one view, the only remedies of Executive usurpation—legislation, impeachment, and public opinion; each, or all, entirely inadequate, utterly visionary. This enables us to define a term lately introduced into our modern political code—"high responsibility." Now, as words are only intended to convey ideas, it will be well to ascertain the meaning of the term. The President can remove from office and appoint in the recess, and no one has a right to inquire the cause; and, if he does, the President is under no obligation to answer. He is responsible, but not obliged to respond to any earthly tribunal which has any right whatever to consider of the response; and this is "high responsibility!" "High responsibility," then, is unquestionable, unlimited, illimitable discretion; and unquestionable, unlimited, illimitable discretion is sovereign will, and sovereign will is absolute despotism; wherefore "high responsibility" is absolute despotism. Now, I think, sir, that this is reasoning syllogistically, or a fair conclusion from your premises. It hence follows fairly, if not irresistibly, that there is no other check upon this abuse of power but the Senate. Here the people and the States are to look, and here they have hitherto looked.

But, sir, each subordinate executive officer, also, is securely intrenched behind this high responsibility. At the request of a friend who had been very unceremoniously removed from the post office, I wrote a letter to the Postmaster General, to inquire the cause of his removal. This new fledged, or rather unfledged head of a recently created department, did not condescend to answer the inquiry of a Senator, and I received a note from one of his subordinates, which was in substance this: "I am directed by the Postmaster General to inform you that you are not permitted to know, sir." In the proud days of the republic, when the Senate was what it should be, the Postmaster General would, for such a reply, have been summoned to the bar of this Senate to answer for a contempt. But it would now have been madness to have proposed it. We are the humble servants of these petty tyrants. They all act upon their "high responsibility." You will not allow us to ask the President why he is doing this? And if you yourselves know the causes, you refuse to inform us. Can it be doubted, that if you of the majority had satisfactory reasons, you would not withhold them from us. We invite you to join us in an inquiry of the President, why this extraordinary course has been pursued—why this general sweep has been made. If you know, tell us; give us the satisfactory information, and there is an end to the call. It may be that you do know the President's reasons for his removals, and that they will not bear the light. His friends, I am sure, have not the moral or political courage to avow, and justify to the world, that it is all a system of rewards and punishments; that honest and independent officers must be hurled out, however faithful, to give place to partisans, however worthless. But, sir, is it uncharitable for us to say that these removals are all a partisan, a personal affair? Whenever there is, or you think there is, a removal for good cause, you are ready enough to communicate it; you seize it with alacrity, and proffer it to us with a sort of triumph. But there is only now and then one of this description; most of the cases are yet involved in the deepest mystery. You know that nothing has been gained, but much lost, by this relentless proscription: for, as a general remark, the officers removed were unquestionably better than those who succeeded them. Now, if the President has removed hundreds of faithful and capable officers for political opinions, he has flagrantly abused his trust, and violated the constitution. If it is not so, give us the true constitutional reason, and we will be satisfied. But there is good ground to suspect that, if the President had any satisfactory reasons, his friends would never have attempted to shield him by the slavish doctrines we have heard advanced. I confess I was thunderstruck, that old fashioned republicans, "died in the wool," should attempt to enforce the principle of sovereign will and unlimited confidence. If the doctrines inculcated by the Senator from Louisiana are sound, there is not a monarch in Europe more absolute than the President of the United States. If no one can inquire, no one can judge; and if no one can judge, how can it be determined that the President has abused his power? How can the guilt be made manifest, and the abuse corrected, when the President has a right to keep all his reasons and motives for ever locked up in his royal bosom? Sir, in the name of that liberty so dear to man, and in the presence of my country and my God, I here enter my most solemn protest against these doctrines, as fit only for tyrants and slaves. But the Senator from Louisiana would humble us still further. The President may remove and appoint in the recess, and decline to nominate the officer thus appointed to the Senate at the next session, or, if the Senate rejects him in either case, as I understand, the temporary commission would not expire until the end of the Senate's session, and thereupon the President may appoint the officer again to fill the same vacancy, again happening in the recess. If the President could be sustained in this construction by a professed constitutional lawyer; if he could have a pretext so plausible as this, my life for it, he will assume the power, for it is characteristic of the man. What, then, would your Senate become? Less, if possible, than it had already become, not even the register of the royal decrees. The Senate reject the nomination of an officer who had been appointed in the recess! He holds, says the Senator, his temporary commission until the end of the session. As the commission and the session expire together, the commission did not expire in session; it consequently did in the recess. With unlimited, illimitable discretion, sovereign will, and a power to pass by the Senate entirely, and take the appointment of every officer into his own hands; and what more is necessary to constitute the despot? And the Senator tells us that the President, if we reject his nominations, will pass by the Senate, and appoint in the recess.

One gentleman will affect an alarm at doctrines or symptoms of a monarchical tendency; another apprehends a judicial tyranny, and that the Supreme Court will prostrate the liberties of the people; a third verily believes that Congress is usurping power, unknown to the constitution. Yet, thus tremblingly solicitous for the constitution and liberty, we can tamely surrender into the hands of a single individual every office, to be bestowed at his will and pleasure. Sir, is not this "straining at gnats and swallowing camels?" Let the President subdue the Senate, no matter how; let him at the commencement of his term remove, and fill every office with his own creatures; let the post office be his, the press be purchased in; and, all this done, let him at an early period of his administration announce himself as a candidate for re-election. You could no more resist him than if he had an army of half a million at his heels, devoted to his person, and ready to execute his will. Is this hypothetical, or is it matter of fact? Is it prophecy, or is it history? Sir, it is all done already. Compare the Senate as it is, with the Senate as it was. See every office secured; see the source and the channels of information corrupted, and see the President already announced a candidate for the next term. With all this corrupt and corrupting official influence to struggle against, the most sanguine friend of a free government must despair. At these prospects the face of the patriot will gather paleness. At the expiration of this four years, farewell, a last farewell, to the hopes of freemen.

Sir, some gentlemen seem to admit (very liberal) that an officer ought not to forfeit his office for exercising the elective franchise; but insist, that if he uses his official influence in an election for President, it is good ground to remove him. The reason, I suppose, is, that if the influence of office is brought to bear upon the people, it abridges or controls their elective rights. Now, if you can draw a distinction between the officer's personal and official influence, I will not object to your rule. But, then, you should carry it through—go the whole—no partiality. But there is partiality. The agent for managing the Northeastern boundary question was appointed by Mr. Adams. He did use his official influence in the election, and very lavishly; but instead of a removal, he was promoted to one of the best offices at the President's disposal. To be sure, his influence was in favor of the successful candidate. But that should make no difference. If there is any reason in the rule—if it is a good rule, it should work both ways. I presume, however, that the rule in practice is to reward every officer for official influence in favor of the present incumbent, to punish every one for the same influence against him, and to presume his guilt without a shadow of proof.

Some insist that "rotation in office" is a republican maxim, and that this is the ground of these removals. Here your practice is utterly at war with your principles. Prove to me how, where, and in what "rotation" is your rule. I do not find the principle in this book. It is not there. It has never been practised since the adoption of the constitution, and it is not now practised. Rotation in office! General Harrison, minister to Colombia, was removed before it was ascertained that he had arrived at the place of his destination—rolled out before he was rolled in; and this is "rotation in office." Miserable! No, sir, your "rotation in office" is to roll out all who did not throw up their caps for the chieftain, and to roll in those who did. If he was your man, and as old as Methuselah, and had held his office from the commencement, he is no subject of your "rotation." But if he did not go the whole for Jackson, he was scarcely seated before he was unseated; scarcely "frocked" before he was "unfrocked." No, sir, there is some reason why "rotation" should be the principle in the State Governments, especially in the small States. The appointing power would be perfectly acquainted with the qualifications of the candidates, and there would be little danger in changing. But the framers of this constitution saw that this Federal Government would extend over an immense people and territory, and it would be next to impossible that the appointing power could be acquainted with the merits and qualifications of the candidates. The ability and fidelity of the officer in office would be better evidence than ten thousand recommendations in favor of the candidate who would supersede him. Here is a reason at once, plain and palpable, why "rotation" has not been practised under this constitution. Gentlemen seem to reason as if offices were made for the officers: not so; they were made for the people. The compensation should be adequate to the service, and no more; and then the longer a faithful officer is in, the better will his experience enable him to perform the duties. Such has been the understanding heretofore, but now every thing is subverted, and we already feel the deleterious effects.

Again, sir. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY] would make us believe that these removals were to restore to "the republican party" the control. If he will look at the President's professions, and again at his practice, he will see nothing of that. In 1817, and at the commencement of Mr. Monroe's administration, General Jackson wrote him a letter of advice in regard to appointments to office. I believe I have it here, and I like to recur to it; it is well written, and I am disposed to give the President full credit for all his literature, as he does not now appear to be in a situation to improve it, especially if he relies for instruction upon some members of his "Cabinet." It will be recollected that this was written soon after the close of the late war, when party animosity had not subsided, when the lines were distinctly marked, and each party was smarting under the wounds inflicted by the other.

"Upon every selection, party and party feelings should be avoided. Now is the time to exterminate that monster, party spirit. By selecting characters most conspicuous for their probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness, without regard to party, you will go far to eradicate those feelings which, on former occasions, threw so many obstacles in the way of government, and perhaps have the pleasure and honor of uniting a people heretofore politically divided. The Chief Magistrate of a great and powerful nation should never indulge in party feelings. His conduct should be liberal and disinterested; always bearing in mind that he acts for the whole, and not a part of the community. By this course you will exalt the national character, and acquire for yourself a name as imperishable as the monumental marble. Consult no party in your choice—pursue the dictates of that unerring judgment which has so long and so often benefited our country, and rendered illustrious its rulers."

Here, sir, we have his unequivocal sentiments on this point. Be not the President of a party—party is a "bubble," "strangle the monster"—"consult no party in your choice," &c. Had this President practised upon his own principles, he would, indeed, have gained "a name as imperishable as monumental marble." "Be the President of the United States"—"act for the general good—for your country." Had he acted up to this, it would have been the brightest laurel which ever adorned his brow. His victory at New Orleans would have been nothing to it. He has acted up to it, so far as this—republicans have been excluded from office, who were not active supporters of his election, and federalists have been substituted, who were. Is any thing more necessary to prove that personal considerations govern exclusively? The inquiry is not, what has been your conduct towards your country, but what has it been towards me and my friends? Sir, we are forced to this conclusion; it is inevitable. But, if his friends will give us a different account; if they will present us other facts and reasons; if they will permit us to ask the President, respectfully, his causes, and they shall be good, or even reasonable, we will take all this back, and be satisfied.

What other principle can govern?

Are these removals on account of the restrictive or constructive doctrines of the officers removed and appointed? On roads and canals, or tariff? Prove to us that the President has done this upon principles like these, and if we are not satisfied with his reasons, we will admit the integrity of his motives. What his principles are upon these subjects is somewhat doubtful. If I understand his message, his tariff policy is a protection of manufactures to meet foreign competition. If I am right in this, he goes as far as heart could wish for the protection of "home industry." And so far as I have observed his course on "roads and canals," and other objects of "internal improvements," he has no constitutional scruples on the subject. But be these things as they may, it is most manifest that none of his removals and appointments have been made upon either of these grounds. I leave it to the Senators from New Hampshire and Louisiana to settle the point between them on which side of these questions the President is; which would be the most republican, and what bearing the removals and appointments were intended to have on these great national questions. Show us a single case where there is the least appearance of principle, and we will excuse it, whether the principle be right or wrong, if the President will tell us that he conscientiously believes it to be right. I have thus proved, as I think, (but of this the Senate and the public will judge,) that for the President to remove and appoint in the recess, to fill vacancies created by him, without causes assigned, is an abuse of power; that the President has thus abused his power, unless he gives us satisfactory reasons; and that it is the right and duty of the Senate to check such abuses, and to this end to call for the reasons; and that, until we have an explanation from the President, this conduct is against the spirit of the constitution. I shall now proceed to contrast other administrations with this, and will show that its course is as unprecedented as it is unprincipled.

It will be well for us, so far as we can, to examine the facts, and to exhibit a brief sketch of the practice of the Government, in regard to removals and appointments. The history, I admit, is very imperfect, as to the causes; but, from what I shall disclose, I am inclined to believe that the public will be astonished at the result. I know full well that this detail will be entirely uninteresting to the Senate. It is always tedious, and will be especially so at this late period of the session, when every one is worn out with debates. Still, it is not to the Senate exclusively to whom I address myself. At this crisis I have a much higher duty to perform. I consider our constitution and liberty in danger. I fear that the rights of this Senate have been surrendered. It is, therefore, due to me, and those who may come after me, to leave behind the reasons why I was not a party to this surrender, that my name may be redeemed from the reproach which, I fear, will inevitably follow. It may be matter of history, an "abstract and brief chronicle of the times," and it is possible that republicans of future days, if any there should be, might observe the rock on which we have been wrecked, and shun the danger. It is important to contrast what has been done with what is now doing; and to point the patriot to the causes which have produced such effects. "I shall nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice." The exhibit will astonish all, as the result of the research has astonished me. I have carefully examined the Executive Journals, and I believe I am correct. I have intended to give a fair and impartial narrative of facts; and, if I have erred, it is the error of the head, and not of the heart.

The administration of Washington commenced on the 25th of May, 1789, and continued to the 3d of March, 1797, eight years. During that time, his removals were eleven. As this period is so remote, and there is no accurate account of the causes, it is not to be expected that I should give them. But I have, upon examination, found that one (a collector in New York) was removed, being a defaulter to the Government. From the notes which I shall subjoin, it is probable that those who were in active life in those days, will be able to recollect the reasons which led to the removals of the others. But it is not to be presumed that Washington ever removed upon party grounds. The duty of first organizing the Government devolved upon him, and, in this, he was no doubt deceived in the qualifications of some of the candidates. Yet, such was his accurate knowledge of men, that, after all, he was obliged to remove but eleven officers in eight years. This is a pretty good comment upon your doctrine of "rotation in office."

Mr. Adams's administration commenced on the 4th of March, 1797, and, during four years, his removals were eleven. Four of his appointments, upon removals, were annulled by his successor, Mr. Jefferson; and, I think, three of the four officers removed were restored. It was believed that Tench Coxe, of Philadelphia, was removed by Mr. J. Adams, from the office of supervisor of the revenue, on party grounds; and this single act of supposed proscription produced an excitement through the whole country; so much so, that I am told even Virginia, who has never indulged at all in exacting a political test as a qualification for office, did, in this case, refuse to re-elect her Speaker of the Assembly, a Mr. Larkin Smith, on party grounds, to show her resentment, and to retaliate for the removal of Coxe. But the cause of Mr. Adams's removal of Mr. Pickens, his Secretary of State, will be recollected by all. He differed with Mr. Adams on the policy of sending the second mission to France, persisted in his opposition to the measure; and as this pertinacity of his principal cabinet minister was not to be subdued, it was the duty of the President to remove him. Mr. Adams, I believe, was never blamed for that act, even by his enemies. The principal complaint was, that he had not removed him before. But if there have been instances during our history of proscription, or what may now appear such, these have been few, are only an exception to the rule, and can be no justification for the present course, which we so decidedly and emphatically condemn.

Mr. Jefferson's administration commenced on the 4th of March, 1801, and continued eight years. I know it has been insisted that his is a precedent on which the present administration might safely repose. I have examined it, and it is an act of duty as well as justice to the memory of that distinguished statesman, to redeem him from the parallel which is here attempted. The cases are so adverse that it is less difficult to perceive where they differ than where they agree. Indeed, there is no resemblance at all. That was a great political revolution. The parties were divided upon principles, as they believed. Those in office were chiefly the supporters of the unsuccessful candidate. Mr. Jefferson, in his letter to the New Haven merchants, gives, as the reasons for removals, that it was right to produce something like equality. But that object accomplished, his only inquiry thereafter would be, "is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the constitution?" And, when an attempt was made to remove General Huntington, of the same State, on party grounds, he refused, declaring that he should be governed by no such considerations. And he has publicly denied that he ever removed an officer because he was a federalist. Whether the facts will justify this declaration, I leave to his more intimate friends to determine. It will be recollected, moreover, that, at the time, none of those officers, except marshals, I believe, held their offices by a tenure limited by law. The instances were, therefore, few, where he could expect to restore an equilibrium, except by removal. "Few die, and none resign." Besides, it was believed that many offices had been created for the purpose of being filled by an expiring administration.

The judiciary act, giving to this expiring administration an appointment of sixteen judges of circuit courts, and with the promotions from district courts, &c. say thirty permanent officers, opposed to Mr. Jefferson and his policy, was deemed by him and his friends to be intended to throw an influence against his administration. It was believed that those courts were unnecessary, and the belief was strengthened by subsequent experience. This was not all. "The alien and sedition laws" had been passed and executed, as it was insisted, with unusual rigor. It was believed that these laws were unconstitutional. They were, to say the least, unpopular, and exceedingly odious. Consequently, the attorneys, the judges, and marshals, who prosecuted, decided, and executed them, became also odious. I have heard of great complaints against prosecutors for persecutions, judges for partiality, and marshals for packing juries, and vindictively executing the judgments of the courts. Some of these complaints might have been groundless; but, considering the madness of party, others were probably well founded. Now, in this state of things, and with all these inducements, it might be fairly presumed that more removals would be made at this than at any other period of our history. Mr. Jefferson and his friends saw, or thought they saw, a policy to strengthen and give weight and influence to the opposition, and to cast a millstone about the neck of his administration, which would sink it. But great complaints were made at these removals. Proscription and persecution were the cry every where; and we most of us believed that they were cruel and vindictive. And were I now to ask any Senator here, who has not examined the journals, what was the number of removals, during his eight years, few would place them at less than three hundred, fewer still at two, and none so low as one. I am sure they will be astonished when I inform them that, after diligent search, I have found but thirty-six! Sir, quite as much official patronage was thrown into the hands of President Jackson, by postponing the nominations of his predecessor to the fourth of March last, as Mr. Jefferson had, by removals, during his eight years. As much, did I say? Yes, more, by far! for, upon examination, I find that four of Mr. Jefferson's were of officers to fill vacancies created by his predecessor, which he himself had made; six were defaulters to the Government; and one was a removal of his own appointment. There were, moreover, one district attorney and seven marshals, and these were chiefly in those districts where the complaints were that the sedition law had been prosecuted most rigorously and vindictively. The district attorney and marshal of Vermont were removed. You all recollect that a member of Congress from that State [Mr. Lyon] had been prosecuted, tried, and punished there, for a libel, under this act. Complaints were loud and strong, that, in the prosecution, trial, and punishment, he was treated oppressively. The charges might be groundless, but they were believed to be true; and, since I have been a member of this Senate, this same Matthew Lyon has presented a petition here, claiming redress for the injuries which he suffered. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, suffered by a conviction under the same law, and he has a petition now pending here for relief. Callender, of Virginia, was also a convict; and, I believe there had been other trials and convictions, in New York and Maryland. Such was the public feeling in regard to these and other proceedings, that not only the ministerial officers of the courts, but the judges themselves, became exceedingly unpopular; so much so, that a justice of the Supreme Court was impeached by the House of Representatives, and barely escaped a conviction of the Senate. So near did he come to it, that one of the managers of the House afterwards pronounced him "an acquitted felon." There was, no doubt, great exaggeration in all this. It is unnecessary now to believe or disbelieve the complaints; it is enough that such was the spirit of the times. We find that, of the seven marshals removed, there were those of Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. Now, at this late period, we can find that, of thirty-six removals, there was good cause for nineteen; and we have, consequently, a right to infer that there were reasons equally good for the rest.

Mr. Madison's administration commenced on the fourth of March, 1809; and during eight years his removals were five! Sir, it will be useless to stop to inquire into the causes. Five removals in eight years! it cannot be pretended that there was no party conflict during this period. Though his first election was not contested, yet his second was fiercely contested. It was during the last war, when all the angry passions were excited, and his rival [Mr. Clinton] received, if I do not much mistake, quite as strong a vote as Mr. Adams had at the last election.

Mr. Monroe commenced on the fourth of March, 1817; and during eight years his were nine. We have now arrived at a period when memory will supply the defect of records. Of these nine, two were consuls, who failed as merchants, and, therefore, forfeited their consular offices. Another, Auldjo, [consul] for insanity. This was a good cause, then. It is doubtful whether, under this administration, it would be any cause of removal, or, indeed, any impediment to appointment. The removal of the consul at Glasgow was demanded by the British Government, on account of quarrels in which he had been concerned. Another was recalled on the complaints of American citizens. A district attorney, of Florida, was removed for abandoning his office, and remaining among his friends in Maryland. David R. Mitchell was Creek agent. He was removed, and Crowell was appointed. We all recollect this case. Mitchell was charged with conniving at an illegal transportation of slaves. The charges were made to the President, Mitchell was notified, and all the evidence on both sides was referred by the President to the Attorney General. He reported the facts in the case, and on these the President removed him. Whether the decision was right or wrong, I know not; but sure I am, it was a fair exercise of Executive discretion. Of these nine removals, I have been able to give the causes in seven, and I leave it to our opponents to prove or infer that the other two were removed from political or party considerations.

Mr. Adams commenced on the fourth of March, 1825, and his removals were two! one, a citizen of Maine, and a personal and political friend of Mr. Adams, who was appointed a collector by Mr. Monroe, by the request of Mr. Adams. Charges were preferred against him, that he had some fifteen years before violated the embargo laws. The charges were pending when Mr. Adams came into office, and he ordered a commission to examine the case and report the facts. There was a full hearing; a report of the facts proved was made to the President, and on this the officer was removed. The other, a marshal of Louisiana, and I do not recollect the reasons of his removal; perhaps the Senators from that State can inform us. During all the preceding administrations, the whole number of removals amounted to seventy-three, less than an average of two in each year. I repeat, it is possible that a few may have escaped my examination; but I am sure that, if any, they must be very few. These facts furnish another comment on the doctrine of "rotation."

Allow me to make one remark. General Jackson did not (as Mr. Jefferson did) come into the Presidency with nearly all the official influence against him. Mr. Adams had no calculation of that sort, and never practised in that way. He was quite as likely to prefer his foe as his friend—his object appearing to be the public interest, regardless of himself.

When we shall again find a President acting upon such maxims, we may again hope; but "the signs of the times" are against us. If Mr. Adams, or his friends, had, during his four years, been contriving to throw weight and influence against the present dominant party, there might have been some apology for this proscription. But, we call upon you to point us to the case where Mr. Adams exhibited the least indication of partisan or personal attachment. The Secretary of the Treasury, his most powerful rival, was solicited to form one of his Cabinet; the Attorney General and Secretary of the Navy were retained, without regard to the part they had taken in the contest; and another rival for the Presidency was made Secretary of State, and his Secretaries of the Treasury and War had been decided and distinguished opposers of his election. To be sure, there was less of policy than magnanimity in this; but Mr. Adams's rule of policy was the good of his country, by a faithful administration of its Government. He practised what General Jackson professed in his letter of advice to Mr. Monroe. Never was a more striking contrast, and never did contrast cast farther into disgrace and contempt than the last administration has cast this.

General Jackson, moreover, had no abuses to correct. No oppressive laws had been passed; no unnecessary offices had been created to sustain a declining party; no doctrines had been advanced and practised on, which created alarm to any one; no "reign of terror" was even pretended. There was no necessity of restoring an equilibrium; for when Jackson was inaugurated, his partisans had probably a full share of the offices.

Now, has there not always been an understanding, a sort of pledge, that, if the officer was faithful and capable, he should retain his office so long as he should remain so? When the office was accepted, he was well acquainted with the practice of the Government. The policy of forty years had taught him that honesty, capability, and fidelity to the constitution, were all that was necessary to secure his continuance. He, therefore, directed his whole talents to the duties. He became unqualified for every other employment. His habits and predilections were altogether official. He was rendered unfit for every thing else. Public confidence was, therefore, his only pride, for it was his only security.

Now, reverse this system; let it be the understanding that, in a change of administration, all the officers who have not favored the change are to be removed; and what is to be the effect upon the public welfare? It goes to the destruction of all confidence; and every one who holds his office by such a precarious tenure, will take care to provide for himself by defrauding the Treasury.

We now come to the removals made by the present administration; and, sir, I approach the subject more in sorrow than in anger. When I was last elected, I entertained no prejudices or enmities against the present Chief Magistrate. I had no personal or political quarrels to settle; no "private griefs" to assuage; I did not form my opinion of his character from those who had engaged in personal controversies with him, but who are now his zealous supporters. Notwithstanding their characters were high, and I might have been justified in believing their testimony, I concluded it might have been under high excitement, and I made the proper allowances. I had, moreover, no special partiality for the last incumbent. He was not my first preference; but I knew them both. I had witnessed the last administration, and though I saw, or thought I saw, something to dislike, I saw much to approve; and when a President had done well for the first four years, I deemed it policy, as well as justice, to try him again, rather than venture upon a new experiment, and thus to keep the public mind in eternal excitement. I had served two years in this Senate with the present President, and though my personal partialities were all in his favor, it was my deliberate belief that he had not the qualifications for this exalted office; and I confess that nothing has since occurred to shake this belief. While my judgment compelled me to fear, my partialities induced me to hope. When I was in the other House, a distinguished member from Georgia, since a Senator, here, and now no more, introduced a resolution declaring that General Jackson, as commander of the army, had, in taking St. Mark's and the Barrancas, violated the constitution of the United States; but my feeble powers were exerted against that resolution. Yet the whole delegation of Georgia, a majority of South Carolina, among whom was the ever to be lamented Lowndes, and a decided majority of the Virginia delegation, voted for it.

I do not speak this as a matter of reproach against those States, but as proof that I had nothing against the man, as many of his present worshippers had. And when I was last elected, and took my leave of the Legislature of Maine, I expressly told them that, although General Jackson was not the choice of the State, yet they must not expect me, as their Senator, to persist in a continued hostility to his measures; that I should condemn where I must, but approve where I could. I have done, and shall continue to do so; but this system of proscription, without and against all reason, I must and will condemn.

Let us now see what has been done, and is now doing. During forty years, and under six different Presidents, we can find but seventy-three removals, not averaging two in each year. Long as the period, and imperfect as the history, we have ascertained good causes for nearly half, and it is fair to infer that there were causes equally good for the removals of most of the rest. How is it now? In one short month, this Executive removed more than had been removed for the whole forty years; and in one short year, three times the number! The heads of Departments may be set down as removals: for, considering the example of the last administration, they would not have resigned, had they not been assured that they should be removed; and the conduct of the Senate in postponing nominations, was to them a hint broad enough. We will set down five. The removals in the Departments, of principals and subordinates, must be charged to the account of the President, for all this was done under his eye. These were forty-six. The nominations of Mr. Adams, postponed to the 4th of March last, and thus rejected, must be considered as the act of the Senate, by the advice and at the request of the President elect, to increase his patronage; and these were thirty-eight, making eighty-nine! A pretty good beginning. Now, it has been ascertained that the other removals, up to this time, have amounted to not less than one hundred and fifty; making, of removals by the President, and chiefly in the recess, two hundred and thirty-nine in the first year, more than three times the number removed by all former Presidents for forty years. But this is not all. By an official report from the Postmaster General, we learn that he had, at that time, removed four hundred and ninety-one of his deputies; and as he had probably not exaggerated, to say the least, and as we know the good work is going on, it is moderate to set these down at five hundred. It is within reasonable calculation, to put the clerks and other dependants on those offices, at five hundred more. Add to these, the subordinate officers of the customs removed, as officially reported, one hundred and fifty-one. Add to these, deputy collectors and clerks in the customs, deputy marshals, private secretaries of foreign ministers, clerks in land and in other offices, surveyors, and others, and it is within bounds to calculate six hundred more, making in the first year about two thousand! Now, why all this individual distress? for what purpose? Let us inquire, the people want light. If there was good cause, they will approve; but if not, they will condemn. Why are you dumb? The reasons—we ask the reasons. Speak. You are but the servants of the people; and speak in a language which they can understand, and they will judge you impartially. Why this dark silence? It was never so before. Has your President done what he is ashamed of? Come out manfully, and let him come out manfully, and tell us the causes; and if they are good, the people will be satisfied. But all this seems to have been done in utter contempt of the Senate. We were kept together from the 4th to the 18th March, an extra session beyond all precedent. The President proceeded with a snail's pace, and very little business was done. But our backs were scarcely turned, when the fires of persecution were kindled, and have ever since raged with relentless fury.

But the greatest outrage of all is, that the President has invaded our dominions, and actually removed, and in the recess too, an officer of the two Houses of Congress! Sir, the President had as good a right to remove the Secretary of the Senate as the Librarian. This library is the library of Congress; the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library was for the two Houses of Congress. The rules for governing it are to be made by the presiding officers of the two Houses. The law, to be sure, gives the power of appointment to the President; but so soon as he has exercised it, he is functus officio to all intents and purposes.

The President has no control over this library any more than one of our clerks, or any stranger. We permit him to take books under our regulations, as we do the Justices of the Supreme Court and other officers; but he cannot, any more than they, dictate a single word as to its management or control. Instead of his having the power to direct this officer in the performance of a single duty, it is directly the reverse; the Librarian has the right to direct him, and to punish him for a violation of its rules. If the power of removal is, in this case, consequent upon that of appointment, the President can impose on us an officer of the two Houses against the will of both. If he can remove at discretion, he can also refuse at his discretion. He might, consequently, return a Librarian utterly offensive to us, who mismanaged our property, disobeyed our directions, and set our rules at defiance. But, sir, this usurpation is further manifest, from the fact, that he can never judge when the officer becomes disqualified. He, either by himself or any of his subordinates, has no right whatever to inspect the library, or inquire how the duties have been performed. He can, therefore, never know when there is cause for removal. It, with him, would always be a haphazard business, quite as likely to be done wrong as right. The President did not, for he could not, remove for cause. He had, when this removal was made, been inaugurated but three months. Now, had he devoted all his time to examining the regulations of that library, he would not have learnt whether the Librarian had managed well or ill, even in three years. But, sir, we know that Mr. Watterston was not removed because he was unfaithful or incapable. We know he was both faithful and capable, and pre-eminently so. Not a murmur has been whispered against him. I appeal to the Joint Committees of the Library, who have, from time to time, superintended it, if this is not the fact.

But, sir, there is another reason which should have convinced the President that he was doing wrong, if he is capable of reasoning at all. The law required that the Librarian, who was to have the custody of such valuable property, should give bonds with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House. When this removal was made, there was no President of the Senate here, and no Speaker of the House in existence. This puts the flat negative upon the President's power to remove and fill in the recess. He could not possibly appoint this officer according to law. The whole was illegal; a responsible officer was thrust out by arbitrary power, and another man ordered to take our property into his custody, of no legal responsibility. But, sir, if he had the power to remove and appoint at his discretion an officer of our own, we should have thought that common courtesy would have demanded that he should have consulted us. But he did not; indeed, he could not; Congress was not in session; there was in fact no Congress in existence when the removal was made: for some States had not then elected their members. I then call upon gentlemen to give the reasons why, how, and by what authority, our Librarian has been removed!

But we were promised "reform," "retrenchment," a "correction of existing abuses," a "saving of the public money." The "Augean stable" was to be cleansed. This was the cry out of doors, and echoed even from the halls of Congress. Many, I have no doubt, repeated the expression without understanding a word of its meaning or its application. I do not mean the Senators, for they no doubt are all very classic. And I would not now repeat the story, but to show that there is no analogy. Augeas, as you recollect, was some petty king of some petty province or city of Greece. What was its name? Elis, aye, that is it. It seems he had a stable which had always contained three thousand oxen, and it had never been cleansed out for three hundred years. Hercules undertook to cleanse it, (this was his fifth labor,) and he was to have, for his compensation, one-tenth of all the cattle—three hundred—a pretty good fee, equal, at least, to the salary which you are about to provide for the chief of your new "law department." Well, Hercules, by turning the current of the river through the stable, cleansed it in one single day, and then demanded his reward. Augeas refused to pay him, alleging that he had practised an artifice. In consequence, they made war. Hercules killed him, and gave his crown to his son; and here is the whole story. Now, where is the analogy? Had Hercules swept out the cattle only, it might have resembled your case. You have removed the whole herd, and replaced them by a much more numerous and scurvy set, and made the filth ten times worse than it was before. So much for your "Augean stable."

Now, sir, what has been gained by all this devastation, this prostration of all principle, this concentration of all Executive power in a single chief? Once, the people of the United States would never have made their rights and liberties a question of profit and loss. But, even making it a mere matter of calculation, I repeat the question, What have we gained? Draw your comparisons between the present and last year's expenditures, and with all the subtlety and cunning which belongs to the head of the treasury, and what do you make? The attempt to stifle the truth has been detected; and it is manifest, even to the eye of a superficial observer, that your expenditures are, and must be, necessarily more. The fact has been proved beyond controversy. But whether less or more, is not the question. The question is, Have the expenditures, be they what they may, been prudent or prodigal, more, or just as much, as the public exigencies require? If my agent, last year, expended one hundred thousand dollars, all for my benefit, I have no right to blame him; if he, this year, has expended less than half that sum, and has wasted in this expenditure one-half of this, it is a lame apology to recur to a comparison of the two years. We ask you, then, what was wasted in the last year of Mr. Adams's administration? Put your finger upon the single item. Do you retort the question? We are ready with the answer. In the removal and appointment of foreign ministers in the recess of the Senate, forty thousand dollars have been drawn from the treasury against the law and the constitution, without any earthly benefit, and for no other ostensible purpose but to reward partisans, far less qualified than their predecessors. In the collecting of the revenue, that "searching operation," what have you gained? Fifty additional officers in this single department.

Sir, in the faithful execution of this duty, of collecting money and payment into the treasury to meet the exigencies of the Government, and discharge the national debt, the people have a deep interest. This duty requires not only perfect fidelity, but long experience. The complicated machinery of the system is not to be learnt in a day; it requires years. Now, if you make a general change here, even if you supply the place of those removed with the best men, it is morally certain that, from their want of experience, nothing but a miracle can save you from losses.

Take the case at New York, where more than one-third of your whole revenue is collected; all your principal and twenty-five of your subordinate officers displaced, and about the same number have been added. Here, besides the chief officers, you find fifty new ones, all without experience, to manage that vast concern, so important to the interests of the country. Will any one say, in sober earnest, that all this was for the public good? Under the arrangement and severe discipline of Mr. Thompson, every thing was done with perfect system—scarcely an error escaped—the Government was perfectly safe, and no one, but he who wished for an opportunity to violate the laws, had the least disposition to complain. Now, why is the whole system subverted? Why is this dangerous experiment attempted, when all was so well before? It is for no reason under heaven but to reward the minions of the present administration.

Sir, if your party had talents, and, as a general remark, I do not think they are overburthened, is it possible that a machine, so complicated as the Treasury Department, can be successfully managed with raw hands? Can mere "land lubbers" navigate the ship? I put this question to experienced statesmen, to Senators; and I ask them frankly, if, in all this, they can see any thing of public good?

What has been gained, I ask, in removing one thousand connected with the Post Office Department? Mr. McLean was no partisan, and certainly he had done nothing to throw the influence of his department into the hands of the late administration. What good motive could have induced this universal proscription? Every post office, whose emoluments are worth even less than ten dollars a year, if he has not huzzaed for the chieftain, is hunted down as a ferocious wild beast; and every hole, every corner, is searched for this small game. All this, I suppose, is "retrenchment;" and yet we learn that more officers must be provided, or this sapient chief of this new department cannot make the machine work. Now, this is not strange at all. The General Post Office is in utter confusion; every thing is in error, and "sixes and sevens;" the assistants and clerks have been running against each other, and have got into such confusion, that they do not know where to go or what to do, and very prudently conclude, therefore, to stand still and do nothing.

But this is not all; they are asking for money. Mr. McLean had made the post office support itself; and it has hitherto produced a surplus. In one year, we find that there is likely to be a deficit of one hundred thousand dollars. Now, how does this come to pass? This question is easily answered—it is removing the experienced and faithful, and placing in their stead those who cannot or will not fulfil their duties. It is reported, too, that contractors have been remunerated beyond their contracts. At any rate, we are reduced to this: we must add one hundred thousand dollars to the funds of this department, or strike off some forty or fifty mail routes, and thus deprive the people in the scattered settlements of the means of information, or the machine must stop. This is another of the effects of this retrenching, reforming administration.

Two or three examples will serve to illustrate this conduct of this administration. Florida is a Territory, not ten years old. The President was its first Governor; and when he left the Government, it is to be presumed, the officers were satisfactory. At the last election, this Territory had no political influence whatever. It had no vote, nor could it command one any where else. Its preferences for one of the other candidates could, therefore, have no effect on the election. Yet we find that removals here have been made with the same relentless proscription as if it had been in its power to settle the contest. Removals—Navy Agent and Storekeeper, at Pensacola; Surveyor of live oak timber, and Agent for its preservation; Postmaster, at Pensacola, and Marshal, two Commanders of Revenue Cutters; Law Agent; Indian Agent; United States' Attorney, Collector, and Marshal, at Key West; Surveyor of Fernandina; Postmaster, at St. Augustine; and Collector, at Appalachicola—sixteen! and four other Executive appointments made since the fourth of March last, to supply vacancies created by his own removals! Now, what other motive could have induced all this, but that of rewarding hungry expectants, who could not be provided for any where else?

I will go now into an opposite extreme of the United States—into Maine. When we arrived here, at the commencement of this session, every United States' office, perhaps worth ten dollars, was in the hands of the friends of the administration, except two, those of the Marshal and the Collector of Passamaquoddy. These two have been since "reformed." I will give you but one other case. Of the thirty-seven District Attorneys, seventeen have been removed, and three were postponed by the Senate of the last Congress to the fourth of March; that is, rejected, and others appointed in their places, making twenty. Of the thirty-six Marshals, there have been fifteen removals, and, as I believe, several postponements; inasmuch that there are not now, perhaps, three of each of these offices held by men who were either neutral or in favor of Mr. Adams's re-election. I will here make a single remark, which will clearly illustrate this policy. President Jackson has made more than twice the number of removals, of his own appointments, in one year, than Mr. Adams did in four, of all the officers of the Government.*

In addition to these wonderful improvements, we find that some fifty or sixty editors of newspapers have, for their loyalty, been engaged to assist in this work of reform. Petty editors of country newspapers are made "Second Comptrollers" and "Fourth Auditors," and Amos Kendall wields the trident of Neptune, and holds in his hands the destinies of that navy which has triumphed in every sea, and unfurled "the star spangled banner" in the face of every maritime nation on earth. Sir, in this aspect of our affairs, it is time to be a little serious, and to ponder well. The press was intended to be, and once in reality was, the palladium of our liberties. It was the press of the people. If the Government should have attempted to subsidize or usurp it, the cry would have been "hands off, touch not, handle not," it is ours. Editors are our watchmen, our sentinels on the outposts of liberty. When these can be seduced or bribed, the citadel is gone. It has been asked, is an editor to be excluded from office? I answer, yes, so long as he remains such, unless the people, whose servant he is, shall select him. If he would serve the Government, let him first abandon our service, but let him not desert, and acquire honors at our expense. Sir, it is my deliberate belief that there is now no way to restore the press to what it was, and what, in every free Government, it always should be, but by carrying the principle out.

* The Collector at Key West, a son of the late Mr. Pinkney, a very faithful officer, was removed, and a Mr. Thurston was appointed in his place. It is ascertained that Mr. Pinkney collected the revenue there with one permanent and one occasional Inspector. The new Collector, with less revenue to collect, is allowed four permanent Inspectors.

The Marshal at Key West, Mr. Wilson, was removed, and a Mr. Dean appointed in his place. Money was advanced him by the Secretary of State, by what authority I do not know. He soon proved a defaulter, is removed, and the money is lost.

Captain Harrison had a wife and seven children in this District, [Georgetown.] He was commander of a revenue cutter at Key West. When he repaired to that remote and unhealthy station, he left an order that his whole pay should be appropriated to the support of his family, and he himself to live on his rations alone. He was removed without the slightest cause that is known or even imagined, and a Mr. Deveze was appointed in his place. Such were his confirmed habits of intemperance, that President Jackson, from regard to decency, was, in a few weeks, obliged to remove him.

But, be this as it may, certain it is, that rewarding the partisan editors of the successful chief with high offices, is effectually corrupting the press. After this example, what reliance is hereafter to be placed upon newspapers? Those rewarded are to sustain the Government, right or wrong. Those striving for a change must oppose it in every thing, pervert its measures, and abuse its motives. All editors, whose hopes depend upon the success of their respective candidates, will forget, in their zeal, their duty to the people, and no dependance can be placed on what they publish. Editors are but men, no purer than others; and, then, is not this the necessary result?

The specimens of reform, not yet noticed, are many, but will be passed over briefly. You proposed to raise the salaries of your district judges about fifty per cent., and this bill has passed the Senate. The House increased the compensation of the marshals for taking the census thirty-three per cent., and the Senate raised it to a hundred. You have a bill before you, reported by the Judiciary Committee, to establish "a Law Department," in obedience to the recommendation of the President in his message, with a salary for the Attorney General of six thousand dollars, and an assistant, clerks, and messengers, in the bargain. Additional officers are appointed to your revenue cutters to increase their emoluments, when they are only to perform the duties which belong to the custom house officers, notwithstanding you have increased their number at least fifty. All these things constitute "reform" and "retrenchment." Reform on, and retrench in this way, and very soon you will reform and retrench the people out of both their money and their liberty!

On another occasion, in my defence of New England, I recurrd to this proscription which I have here exposed, and remarked that this administration had glutted its vengeance on the purest patriots on earth; that neither age, condition, sect, or sex had escaped. For this I have received a rebuke from the Senator from Louisiana, by which it appears that this language is too plain and too strong for the delicate sensibility of this very sensitive administration. Our friends have been swept off by hundreds, aye, thousands: we have not been permitted to know or even to ask for the cause, and now we are to be denied the poor consolation of complaining. It appears that I spoke in a tone that was not acceptable to that Senator. I regret exceedingly that the sound of my voice does not better harmonize with his refined taste. But he should recollect that our conditions are very different. He was "brought up at the feet of Gamaliel," received his education in the first city, and has since been improving it in the most polite and accomplished city in the Union. I am from the woods yonder, "a plain, blunt man, who speaks right on," and, perhaps, tell you only what you yourselves already know. I have no city airs, nor city management. I have no fashionable modulation of voice; no "attitude, nor stare, nor start, theatric practised, practised at the glass."

But, sir, as to the substance. Is it not true that the Executive has glutted its vengeance upon the purest patriots on earth; that neither age, condition, sect, or sex has escaped? I shall speak plain—call things by their right names. How? Must I sacrifice the rights of my constituents to a fastidious delicacy? Have I a right here to indulge in affectation? No, sir, in man or woman, but most in man, and, most of all, in man who assumes to sustain the people against their oppressors, I, from my soul, loathe all affectation. It is the object of my scorn—my implacable disgust. What! is man the only thing in God's creation that must appear in disguise? All nature else is ruled by unerring laws, penned by an unerring hand—the brutes even obey their god, and follow their destiny. Inanimate creation, those orbs which shine and sparkle around us, all concur to fulfil their great Creator's purpose. And shall man, the creature of an hour—man, whose "breath is in his nostrils," who to-day is, and to-morrow slumbering in his humble tomb, and mingling with his kindred dust—shall he alone put on airs, and "play his antic tricks before high heaven?" No—no. Let him speak as he thinks, and act undisguised—all else is rank hypocrisy and deceit.

Then, let us speak out, and speak the truth. The venerable Melville was the last of the "tea party"—the last of "the cocked hats." He was always a republican, from the destruction of the tea to the present moment, without "the shadow of turning." He has been proscribed. To be sure, he is not poor—he has, by his economy and fidelity, acquired a small pittance—has a little change in his pocket to bear his expenses on the small remnant of the road he has to pass, and from which "no traveller returns," to pay his toll at that gate which is very soon to be for ever shut after him. But Elbridge Gerry—he was a republican from the first to the last. He was one of those fearless patriots, who took their lives in their hands, and signed your Declaration of Independence. He was one of the framers of this constitution, the basis on which we now stand. He had been successively minister to France, Governor of Massachusetts, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate, occupying the very chair which you, sir, fill with so much talent. He died here, and is slumbering yonder. He was poor and penniless, as every honest Revolutionary patriot necessarily was. He left a widow, three helpless daughters, and a son, his own "image and superscription" in every thing. The patriotic and kind hearted Monroe gave this son an office, to which he was every way qualified, upon the express and special condition that he should appropriate the avails to the support of his widowed mother and orphan sisters. The pledge was fulfilled to the letter. He even denied himself the ordinary consolations of domestic life, without which nine-tenths of a man's happiness is cut off. He was never a political partisan; but he is swept off with a relentless hand, and the venerable relic of that departed Revolutionary patriot, with her helpless daughters, is cast off, in the winter of her days, upon the cold charity of a cold and uncharitable world. Need I go farther, to prove that every age, condition, sect, and sex had become the victim of this relentless tyrant? Sir, let the Senator from Louisiana compare the expression with the facts, and answer the question himself, if every word I said is not justified? I take nothing back—it is all true—I have proved it all.

I again repeat the inquiry—What have you gained? The President, in his message, proposed certain important measures for the consideration of Congress. One was a modification of the Judiciary, dividing the courts into two equal parts, each to hold the sessions alternately, so that the majority of one-half might settle the constitutional law, and the majority of the other half might, at the next session, unsettle it. It is some consolation, that no lawyer in either House has had the courage, so far, to hazard his own reputation, as even to propose an inquiry into the expediency of adopting such an absurdity.

Another (the conceit probably of the arch-Secretary of State) was to dispense with the United States' Bank, and to substitute another, based upon the public revenues. The officers, I presume to be the creatures of the Executive, and the management and facilities to suit his purpose, and conform to his will. A President, with unlimited discretion in removals and appointments, the army, navy, post office, the press, and this bank, at his control, has only to will it, and he is the tyrant. It is done, it is finished, and the liberties of the people are gone for ever. Thank Heaven, that scheme has got its quietus.

Another "reform" was, to establish a law department, the Attorney General its chief, with an assistant, and all the other paraphernalia. This is knocked down.

The Indians were to be removed from the limits of the States. This is uncertain.

A free trade with the West Indies, and other British provinces, was promised. This has ended, as every rational man believed it would, in smoke.

Then, what is the sum and substance of all you have done, but to remove good men from office, and put bad ones in their stead? Give us a solitary instance where there has been a single improvement in favor of the interests and liberties of the people, one principle in which your own party shall all agree, and I consent you take it for your text.

Sir, I might go on, and perhaps repeat cases to the Senate even as flagrant as these; but I have exhausted myself, and, no doubt, the patience of the Senate. I have omitted many things which I intended to say. It was my object to open the eyes of the people, that they might see their danger. This is a crisis in our affairs; it is a state of things unparalleled in our history. Look at the consequences. The distresses of the proscribed are comparatively a small matter. The public interest is put in jeopardy by displacing experience and fidelity, and substituting mere partisans, without regard to qualifications. But if these were all, I should not despond. The principles inculcated are most alarming; the right of the sovereign to do all this, "of his own mere motion," which is so obsequiously yielded; the unlimited, illimitable discretion so unquestionable; these are the "signs of the times" which induce the most gloomy forebodings. If this discretion were only surrendered to a discreet man, we might be safe for the present, though we should look out for the future. But, strange as it may seem, it is yielded to the last man to whom it ought to have been confided—one who has always gone to the utmost bounds of the constitution, and, in the opinions of very many, has often transgressed them. It is the time, above all others, when we should have kept a jealous eye upon the exercise of Executive power; and yet this very period is selected to surrender every thing. There seems a mysterious apathy, a sleepy carelessness, a lethargy, a paralysis, in the public mind. A dark and dead silence reigns in your Executive halls. Your chief sits in sullen mysterious reserve, entrenched behind "his high responsibility," issuing his fierce decrees, and immolating his victims with cold-blooded indifference, and we dare not ask him why? We, the Senate of the United States, are so fallen, that we cannot summon the firmness to whisper this single monosyllable in his royal ears. Is this a reality, or is it a dream? If what we now witness had been presented to my mind in the fantastic visions of the night, the dream would have awakened me, and I should have started from my pillow with horror.

Sir, I have done. I make no apology for detaining you thus. I have, so far as my feeble talents would permit, performed a duty which I owed to myself, my country, and my God.

Note.—It is proper to remark, that, in this contrast of the removals in this and the other administrations, I have confined myself to civil officers. When the speech was made in the Senate, it so stated, but is here inadvertently omitted.

Mr. GRUNDY then moved, without comment, to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of the resolutions; which motion was decided in the affirmative, 24 to 21.

THURSDAY, APRIL 29, 1830.

PENSION LAWS.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, the bill from the House of Representatives "declaratory of the several acts to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," was resumed, with the amendment of the Pension Committee.

Mr. FOOT explained at large the object of the bill as it has been proposed to be amended by the Committee.

Mr. HAYNE said, this was a bill similar in its character to that which was brought forward during the last session of Congress, and which was then known by the significant appellation of the Mammoth Pension bill. Under the specious pretext of paying a debt of national gratitude to the soldiers of the Revolution, it was calculated to empty the treasury, by squandering away the public treasure among a class of persons, many of whom, [said Mr. H.] I do verily believe, never served in the Revolution at all, and others only for such short periods as hardly to entitle them to praise. I will yield, sir, to no gentleman here, in a deep and abiding sense of gratitude for Revolutionary services. Brought up among Revolutionary men, I imbibed in my infancy, and have cherished through life, a profound reverence and affection for the whole race—feelings which will descend with me to the grave.

But, sir, when the attempt is made to thrust into the company of the war-worn veterans of the Revolution, a "mighty host," many of whom, probably, never even saw an enemy; when a door is to be opened wide enough to admit mere sunshine and holiday soldiers, the hangers on of the camp, men of straw, substitutes, who never enlisted until after the preliminaries of peace were signed; when, after having omitted to pay the debt of gratitude really due to the honest veterans who toiled through all the hardships and dangers of the great contest, you now propose to give the rewards earned by their blood, with so profuse a hand as to enable all who ever approached the camp to share them; I must be permitted to say, that neither my sense of justice, nor my devotion to Revolutionary men, will suffer me to lend my aid to the consummation of the injustice. Sir, I know that deep as have been the wounds inflicted by the chilling neglect experienced by many of these gallant officers of the army who fought your battles throughout the war of the Revolution; keenly as they have felt the injustice which delayed, until a recent period, to satisfy their just demands, founded upon contract, none of these things, nor all combined, have inflicted so deep a wound upon their feelings, as the admission, to all the honors and rewards of the Revolution, of persons who shared few of the hardships, and none of the perils, of the war. He who toiled through the heat of the day has found the evening feast spread out for those whom he knew not in the camp, or on the field of battle, and whom he never saw till he found them at the festive board provided by the gratitude of the country.

Sir, I am informed, from the highest authority, that, when the pension bill of 1818 was before Congress, providing for the "nine months men," a gallant veteran of the Revolution, then a member of the other House, was so indignant at its provisions, that he declared he considered the soldiers who had served throughout the war as dishonored by a law recognising, as equals, the class of persons who would come in under that bill; and such, I have reason to believe, was the general sense of all such men throughout the country.

It has been my pride and pleasure, on all proper occasions, to manifest my gratitude for the heroes of the Revolution, not merely by professions, but by the most unequivocal acts. Here and elsewhere, my efforts have not been wanting to manifest the sentiments by which I am animated. But, in refusing to support such a bill as this,

[SENATE.]

I am conscious I am only doing that of which the veterans of the Revolution themselves, if they were here present, would cordially approve. In doing justice to the country, I am also doing justice to them.

In the further examination of this subject, I propose [said Mr. H.] to take a brief review of the pension system in this country, and to point out the new, extravagant, and alarming provisions which it is proposed, by this act, to introduce into that system.

The people of the United States, even before the Revolution, had imbibed a deep-rooted and settled opposition to the system of pensions.

In the country from which they had emigrated, they found it operating as a system of favoritism, by which those in authority made provision, at the public expense, for their friends and followers. In Great Britain, pensions have long been used as the ready means of providing for the "favored few," at the expense of the many. This system affords the most convenient means of appropriating the industry and capital of the laboring classes, for the support of those drones in society, the "fruges nati consumere," who occupy so large a space in all refined, civilized, and christian countries. Our ancestors had seen, and severely felt, the effects of such a system, which necessarily converts the great mass of the people into the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the privileged orders of society. When our Revolution commenced, therefore, a deep, settled, and salutary prejudice against pensions almost universally prevailed. On the recommendation of General Washington, however, Congress had found it necessary to provide that the officers of the regular army, who should continue to serve to the end of the war, should be entitled "to half pay for life." So strong, however, was the prejudice against pensions, that the officers entitled "to half pay for life," found it necessary so far to yield to public opinion as to accept of a "commutation," in lieu thereof, of five years' full pay, a debt which was not finally discharged, according to the true spirit of the contract, until about two years ago.

In 1806, provision was made by law for pensions to all persons disabled in the military service of the United States during the Revolution; and, in 1808, the United States assumed the payment of all the pensions granted by the States for disabilities incurred in the Revolution. And, from that time to 1818, the principle was settled, that all persons disabled in the course of military service should be provided for at the public expense, and the United States took upon themselves the payment of pensions to such persons, "whether they served in the land or sea service of the forces of the United States, or any particular State, in the regular corps, or the militia, or as volunteers." Here, then, was the American pension system established on a fast and sure foundation. The principle assumed was not merely gratitude for services rendered; for that principle must have embraced civil as well as military pensions, and is broad enough to admit all the abuses that have grown up under the pension system even of Great Britain. Our principle was, that pensions should be granted for disabilities incurred in military service—a measure deemed necessary to hold out those inducements to gallantry and deeds of daring which have been found necessary in all other countries, and which we have, perhaps, no right to suppose can be safely dispensed with in ours.

Here, then, we find, that, up to the year 1818, the principle of our pension system was disability, a wise and safe principle, limited in its extent, and almost incapable of abuse.

In 1818, however, the Representatives of the people, in Congress assembled, seem to have been seized with a sudden fit of gratitude for Revolutionary services; an act was accordingly passed, which provided for pensioning all who served in the army of the Revolution "for the term of nine months, or longer, at any period of the war," and "who, by reason of reduced circumstances, shall stand in need of assistance from their country for support." [See act of 18th March, 1818.] Here, it will be seen that the principle which limits pensions to disabilities incurred in the service is abandoned, and length of service and poverty are made the conditions on which pensions are hereafter to depend. The history of that bill, as I have heard it from the lips of those who were actors in the political scenes of that day, is not a little curious. All agreed that the operation of the bill was to be confined to those who had, during the Revolution, given up their private pursuits, and devoted themselves exclusively to military service. No one imagined, for a moment, that any person who had rendered casual services merely; men who had only shared, in common with all the other citizens of the country, the dangers and sacrifices of the times, were to be the objects of public bounty. The original proposition, therefore, was to confine the provisions of the bill to those who had served in the regular army, either during the war, or for a term of three years, and who stood in need of assistance from their country for support. But, sir, in the progress of that bill, it was discovered that, in a certain quarter of the Union, a number of soldiers had been enlisted for a term of only nine months, and, to cover their case, "three years" was stricken out, and "nine months" inserted. Sir, no one foresaw the consequences of that measure. It was supposed that even this provision would include only a few hundred men. The whole charge upon the treasury was estimated at one hundred and sixty thousand dollars. And, seduced by this expectation, and by the popular cry of "Justice to the old soldiers," Congress were persuaded to pass a bill which they were assured could not make any very considerable addition to the pension list, which would be lessened from year to year, and would soon cease to exist. And what, sir, was the result? What a lesson does it read to legislators! How forcibly does it admonish us to weigh well the provisions of this bill, before we undertake to enlarge or extend the pension law of 1818. I have applied to the Pension Office for information on this subject, and hold in my hand the official report of the officer at the head of that department. In giving the result, I shall not aim at minute accuracy.

The number of applicants for pensions, under the act of 1818, considerably exceeded thirty thousand! a number greater than that of General Washington's army, at any period of the war; exceeding the whole number of soldiers that could be supposed to be alive in 1818. Notwithstanding the "rigid rules" laid down by the Department of War, it was found impossible to exclude the applicants. Upwards of eighteen thousand were admitted and placed on the pension roll, one-third of whom, at least, (as it afterwards appeared) had no claim to be there. The claims of upwards of twelve thousand of the applicants were found, even at the first examination, to be entirely groundless, and were accordingly rejected. The money required to pay the pensions was found to be, not one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, as had been estimated, but between two and three millions. The very first year, Congress had to appropriate for pensions, under the act of 1818, one million eight hundred and forty-seven thousand nine hundred dollars; and the next year, two million seven hundred and sixty-six thousand four hundred and forty dollars, which, with the appropriations for invalid pensions, made the whole amount appropriated in that year for pensions, three million one hundred and eight thousand three hundred and three dollars. And no one can tell to what extent these appropriations would have been carried, if Congress had not interposed to correct the evil. The whole country had become alarmed. No one doubted that an immense number of persons were receiving pensions, who had no claim to them whatever. Men who had never served at all, or for very short periods; men who had given away their property to their children, or conveyed it in trust for their own benefit; in short, every one who was old enough to have served in the Revolution, found little difficulty (notwithstanding the rigid rules of the War Department, of which we now hear so much complaint) in getting themselves placed upon the pension list.

To rescue the country from this enormous evil, the act of 1st May, 1820, was passed, which, without changing the terms and conditions on which pensions were to be granted, (still requiring service "for a term of nine months," and "indigent circumstances,") yet provided guards against frauds, by requiring every applicant to submit "a schedule of his property," and to take the necessary "oaths," &c. Sir, under the provisions of this act, intended only to prevent frauds, upwards of six thousand persons were stricken from the pension roll. Two thousand three hundred and eighty-nine never even presented a schedule, or made an application under this act; and the Treasury was thus relieved from a charge of a million of dollars per annum.

Now, sir, with the experience afforded by this case, one would really suppose that the very last thing that any statesman would propose would be still further to enlarge and extend the provisions of the act of 1818, again to unlock the Treasury, which was wisely closed by the act of 1820, and subject it to a charge similar in character, and probably much greater in amount, than was imposed by that law, and to open a wide door to all the evils, aye, and much greater evils than were experienced by the country under the operation of that act.

I will put it to the chairman of the committee who reported this bill: Is he satisfied of the wisdom and justice of the act of 1818? The gentleman says, "it ought never to have been passed." Well, sir, while the gentleman acknowledges that that act was impolitic and unjust, and "ought never to have been passed," how can he advocate this bill, which enlarges and extends every objectionable feature of the former law?

Sir, if we have already taken a rash and unadvised step in this business, it is better for us to go back, or at least to stop where we are; but assuredly we ought not to advance and press forward in error, regardless of consequences.

I come now to the examination of the character of the proposed measure. We have before us two bills: the first has already passed the House of Representatives; the second is proposed as an amendment, by the Committee of Pensions of the Senate.* They both purport to be acts merely declaratory of the acts of 1818 and 1820, and they are supported on the avowed ground that they are not intended to change the pension system, but merely to correct some misconstructions of those acts on the part of the officers of the War Department.

If, sir, I shall be able to show that there have been no such "misconstructions," and that there exists no necessity whatever for any "declaratory act," will I not have a right to expect that gentlemen who now support this bill will at once abandon it? I know, sir, the expectation would be vain; for the truth cannot be disguised, that it is the real object of this bill greatly to enlarge and extend the pension system, by the introduction of new, and, as I believe, most alarming provisions. This is no declaratory act. The acts of 1818 and 1820 provide that pensions shall be granted to persons who served in the regular army of the revolution, on two conditions: 1st, That they should have served for a "term of nine months or longer, at any period of the war;" 2d, That, by reason of reduced circumstances, they shall be in need of assistance from their country for support." Now, sir, what are the "misconstructions" which make a declaratory act now necessary.

It is alleged,

First, That "the term of nine months service" has been required by the Secretary of War to be a "continuous service;" and it is proposed to provide that an applicant for a pension "shall be deemed to have served for the term of nine months, if he shall have served nine months under one or several enlistments, whether continuous or not."

And it is alleged,

Secondly, That, in examining the "circumstances" of applicants for pensions, no fixed amount of property has been considered as conclusive of "indigent circumstances," but the character, habits, place of residence, family, &c. &c. have all been taken into account; and it is now proposed by the bill from the House of Representatives, to provide that a man "shall be deemed and taken to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country, if the whole amount of his property, exclusive of household furniture, &c. shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars, all debts from him justly due and owing being first deducted." By way of guarding against frauds, it is added, "that the applicant shall not be required to show what his circumstances or condition in life were, or what property he was possessed of at any time prior to the passage of this act;" the plain interpretation of which is, that, if any man, before this act receives the sanction of the President, shall give away his estate to his children, he shall, notwithstanding, have his pension.

Now, in what respect has the act of 1818 been "misconstrued?" How far are the bills before us "declaratory?" It is alleged that service for a "term of nine months" does not imply nine months continuously. But I apprehend they can only relate to continuous service under one enlistment. A term is a technical phrase, and, when applied to judicial or military service, always relates to an unbroken period of time. The term of a court, we all know, has this signification; and, in military language, the "term of service" relates to the period of a soldier's continuous service under one enlistment. That it was so used in the law, is obvious. The truth is, this provision was inserted for the avowed purpose of covering a certain class of troops, known to have served under an enlistment for nine months. And the words "a term of nine months, at any period during the war," can admit of no other construction. If it had been intended to embrace mere casual service, under various engagements, amounting in the whole to nine months, the expression would have been, "who served for nine months during the war," or (as proposed in this bill) "whether continuous or not."

So far, therefore, as this bill relates to "the term of service," it is not "declaratory" of the old law, but substitutes a new, and, as I think, a dangerous rule, for that

* The bill from the House of Representatives proposed,

1st. "That the applicant for a pension shall be deemed and taken to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country, if the whole amount of his property, exclusive of his household furniture, wearing apparel, the tools of his trade, and farming utensils, shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars, all debts from him justly due and owing being therefrom first deducted." &c.

2dly. "That, whenever the granting of such application shall depend upon the term of service, such applicant shall be deemed and taken to have served for 'the term of nine months or longer,' if his continuous service was nine months or longer, notwithstanding his enlistment may have been for a shorter time than nine months, and notwithstanding he may, during any portion of his said term, have been taken and detained in captivity."

3dly. "That the regular troops of the several States, &c. shall be deemed and taken to have been on the continental establishment, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to include in said class of State troops the militia of the several States."

The amendments proposed by the committee of the Senate embraced, in substance, the following provisions:

1st. "That the applicant shall be deemed and taken to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country, if the value of his property contained in the schedule now required by law shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars."

2d. "That, whenever the granting of such application shall depend upon 'the term of service,' &c. such person shall be deemed to have served for 'the term of nine months or longer,' if he shall have served nine months or longer in the continental establishment, at any period during the war, whether continuous or not." &c.

3d. "That the State troops shall be entitled to pensions, as proposed in the bill from the House of Representatives."

prescribed by the former law, as construed and uniformly acted upon by the Department of War.

Let us next inquire into the probable effect of the proposed provision. Who are the persons now excluded from the benefits of the existing law? They are those who, during the whole course of a war of seven years, (a bloody and arduous contest, brought to the door of every man,) served in all only nine months, and that, too, at various periods.

Now, let it be recollected that the law relates only to enlisted soldiers of the regular army; let it also be remembered that enlistments, until after the preliminaries of peace were signed, were for fixed periods, of greater or less duration: some (as in the case of the Maryland line) enlisted "during the war," others for a "term of three years," and almost all of the rest for "the term of nine months." If I am not greatly misinformed, it was after the fighting had ceased—after the capture of Cornwallis (which took place in October, '81)—after the preliminaries of peace were signed, (in November, '82,) that enlistments were entered into for "nine months or less." The gentleman says, there were some enlistments made at an earlier period for eight months, and that many of these men continued in service under a new engagement, after the expiration of their first term. I wish the gentleman had favored us with a statement of the number of such enlistments; I am assured they were not numerous, and that a provision so framed as to cover such cases would operate but on a few individuals. But if the object is merely to provide a remedy for those cases of special hardship, let provision be made for persons who enlisted for eight months, and entered into "new engagements at the expiration of their term." Provide, if you please, "for persons who were taken prisoners, or who were confined in prison ships," (cases on which gentlemen so strongly rely,) if they are not already provided for under the act of 1818. No one will complain of provisions intended to apply to special cases of peculiar hardship. But, instead of making such provisions, attempts are made for breaking down all the barriers against fraud. These bills propose to throw open the door of the treasury, so as to permit all who choose to do so, to enter, and help themselves at pleasure.

Sir, I deny the policy or justice of the act of 1818. It departs entirely from every sound principle applicable to pensions, and has provided for that large class of persons whose services were in no respect more valuable than those of the great body of the people. Who were the "nine months men," admitted under the act of 1818? They were chiefly those who entered the service after the capture of Cornwallis. A large proportion of them served only between the date of the provisional article of peace, in November, 1782, and the adoption of the definitive articles, in September, 1783.

From what I can learn, a large majority of those who were admitted to pensions under the act of 1818 never saw any service, except during the two years which elapsed between the capture of Cornwallis and the establishment of peace. I have been unable to obtain any detailed information on this point. But I am told that the average ages of these eighteen thousand pensioners, at the date of their application, proved that they could only have served towards the close of the war. Of this vast number, but little more than three thousand claimed to have served through the war; so that it is unquestionable, that the bounty of the Government, under the act of 1818, has been chiefly extended to those who never abandoned their private pursuits, who did not devote themselves exclusively to military service, and who, therefore, were not embraced within any sound and safe principle applicable to pensions in a republican government.

But if such was the true character, and such the operation of that act, what will be the effect of this bill? While the law required "a term of service of nine months or longer," although persons might be admitted who had rendered no efficient service, yet you had some security against abuse, by requiring specific proof of a continuous service under one enlistment, with the power, in most cases, of referring to the original muster rolls, and thereby detecting all attempts at imposition. Now, however, that the most casual service, and for the shortest periods, is to be taken into the account, who can fail to perceive how much the chances of imposition will be multiplied? Resort must be had to oral testimony. And what more uncertain than the memory of man, as to the duration of another's service half a century ago? Who is there that ever served a month in the army, or who was even a follower of the camp, that will not be able to adduce certificates to show that he served for just so long a time as he may choose to lay claim to.

But, sir, there is a stronger objection to this measure even, than its liability to abuse. It is, that it rests on no sound principle applicable to military pensions. If there be any principle recognised and fully established in this country, it is, that pensions must be confined to those who were separated, by the nature of their service, from the great mass of the community, and who devoted themselves exclusively to military duties. It is a palpable absurdity to talk of giving pensions to all the people. Those who, in the course of the Revolution, performed, only in common with the rest of their countrymen, the military service required of every citizen, stand upon an equal footing. He alone, who, in the strictest sense, put off the citizen and became a soldier, and who, in abandoning the pursuits, relinquished also the habits of private life, can have any just claim to be provided for at the public expense. I speak not now of physical disabilities incurred in the public service, this class of cases having been amply provided for under the acts of 1806 and 1808. But, with regard to claims depending entirely upon length of service, if we once depart from the rule I have laid down, and declare that mere casual service for short periods, and at long intervals, shall entitle a man to a pension, you cannot stop short of pensioning all who rendered any service whatever in the course of the Revolution. All the State troops will be embraced within this principle; and this bill, accordingly, proposes to provide for them. The militia will come next; for what true hearted whig was there in all America, who did not, in the course of the seven years' war, render, from time to time, services equal in the whole to the period of "nine months?" I think I may very confidently assert, that there was not, in the State of South Carolina, one genuine patriot of '76 capable of bearing arms, who did not, in the course of the Revolution, spend more than nine months in the camp; and I should be glad to be informed on what principle they can be excluded, if these nine months men are to be embraced? But I shall be told the militia will all in due season be provided for, a proposition to that effect having already been submitted in the other House. It comes, then, to this, that all are to be pensioned who rendered military service of any description during the war. But were not services equally valuable rendered by men in civil stations? All these must of course be included; and it will finally come to this, that pensions must be provided for every one who lived at the period of the Revolution; you cannot stop short of that, if the principle embraced in the bill is to be sanctioned. So much for "the term of service."

The next provision of the bill relates to "the circumstances in life" of the persons to be pensioned. The rule on this subject prescribed by the acts of '18 and '20, and hitherto considered as the very foundation of the pension system, was, that the pensioners should be "in such indigent circumstances as to stand in need of assistance from their country for support." I should have supposed that no one could for a moment doubt the policy, the propriety, nay, the absolute necessity, of this rule. No country which has ever passed through a bloody revolution, could possibly undertake to distribute rewards for every service. In bestowing military pensions, they are constrained to act on the principle of merely providing for those who, being unable to support themselves, are necessarily thrown upon public or private charity. Military pensions constitute an honorable provision for old soldiers of broken fortunes. But what is the proposition now before us? Why, sir, the pension system is no longer to be confined to persons in reduced circumstances. The bill from the other House expressly declares that every man shall be "deemed and taken" to be in indigent circumstances, and unable to support himself, who shall not be worth more than one thousand dollars clear of debt. Now, can any thing be more absurd than such a provision! A man may be in possession of an estate worth half a million of dollars; he may have a clear income from such an estate (or from professional pursuits) of twenty or thirty thousand dollars a year; and yet, if his debts exceed the estimated value of his estate, the law declares he shall be "deemed and taken to be unable to support himself." Sir, I give all due praise to the committee of the Senate for their judicious recommendation that this monstrous provision should be stricken out; but I must be permitted to add, that I should have been better pleased if they had reformed the section altogether. I perceive they have retained the provision which fixes one thousand dollars as an arbitrary standard to determine a man's circumstances in life. Nothing, it seems to me, can be conceived more unequal or unjust than to measure men's circumstances in life by such a rule. Of two men possessed of the same amount of property, one may be in easy circumstances, while the other will be poor indeed. A man enjoying a green old age on a farm in the Western country, with an industrious family around him, would be as independent as any man alive; while the inhabitant of one of our Atlantic cities, with an equal amount of property invested in land or in stock, would not be able to procure his daily bread. One man may be entirely disabled, from age or infirmity, from earning his subsistence, or he may have a helpless family depending upon him for support; another may be in the enjoyment of a large professional income, or he may be surrounded by dutiful children in affluent circumstances. Will any one pretend that these men would stand in equal need of "assistance from their country for support?" I confess I am unable to discover a single argument in favor of the arbitrary rule laid down by the committee, unless, indeed, it be desirable to increase the number of pensioners: that it will produce that effect, no one can doubt. The truth is, that, in looking into the circumstances of pensioners, the officers who have been successively at the head of the War Department have found it absolutely necessary (to keep the pension system within any thing like reasonable bounds) to resort to rigid rules. Under the administration of Mr. Calhoun, but one person was admitted whose fortune exceeded three hundred and fifty dollars, and the great majority fell below two hundred and fifty dollars; and yet the treasury was nearly emptied by the multitude which poured in under the act of 1818. Under Mr. Barbour, none were admitted whose fortune exceeded three hundred dollars. General Porter, a short time before he went out of office, undertook to admit persons whose fortune did not exceed nine hundred and sixty dollars. The consequence was, the addition of several hundred names to the pension list within a few months; the appropriations failed; and one of the very first acts of General Jackson's administration was to rescind the order made by General Porter, and to bring back the system to the old standard.

But, sir, there are higher considerations connected with this question than any I have yet urged. I consider this bill as a branch of a great system, calculated and intended to create and perpetuate a permanent charge upon the treasury, with a view to delay the payment of the public debt, and to postpone, indefinitely, the claims of the people for a reduction of taxes, when the debt shall be finally extinguished. It is an important link in the chain by which the American system party hope to bind the people, now and for ever, to the payment of the enormous duties deemed necessary for the protection of domestic manufactures. It is obvious to every one, that a great crisis in the affairs of this country is at hand. The national debt, which now creates a charge upon the treasury of twelve millions of dollars per annum, is melting away, under the operation of our "sinking fund;" which, if not diverted from its course, will, in less than four years, totally extinguish it. One-half, therefore, of the whole amount of the revenue now collected through the custom house will no longer be wanted for national purposes; and the great question will be presented to the American people, whether they will submit to be taxed to the amount of twelve millions a year, merely for the purpose of enabling the manufacturers to fill their pockets at the expense of all other classes in the community, or for the still more preposterous purpose of paying back the taxes so collected to the people from whom they were taken.

The manufacturers know full well that such a question, whenever presented to the justice and good sense of the people, can receive but one answer. The duties will be reduced; and any party that sets itself in opposition to such a measure, will be swept away by the breath of popular indignation, like chaff before the wind. Seeing and believing this, all those who have an interest in the promotion of the restrictive system—all who derive a profit from the present unjust and unequal distribution of the public revenue, have been for the last two years anxiously looking about them, and are constantly contriving schemes for scattering abroad the public funds with a profuse hand. They are striving, above all things, to create heavy permanent charges upon the treasury, as an apology for high duties. The point aimed at is, to create demands upon the treasury, equal, at least, to the whole amount now annually absorbed by the public debt. The great effort will be, to accomplish this fully in the course of the ensuing four years; so that, when the debt shall be paid, the whole twenty-four millions of dollars now collected under our present unjust, unequal, and oppressive impost laws, may still be found necessary to meet the demands upon the treasury created by law.

It is impossible, sir, it seems to me, for any man to look around him, and see what is going on in both Houses of Congress, without perceiving that this is a fixed and settled policy, to which the attention of the party to which I have alluded is constantly and steadily directed. We witness the astonishing spectacle, in a free, popular Government, of constant and persevering efforts to increase the public expenditures; to spend money merely for the sake of having it expended; and we find the representatives of the people devising and contriving innumerable schemes to rivet upon them a system of taxation, which, both in its character and amount, is almost without a parallel in history. All the popular topics of the day are eagerly seized upon, and pressed into the service. Under the pretext of promoting the internal improvement of the country, gigantic schemes are brought forward, and the aid of the Government obtained for them to enormous amounts. The execution of all the plans of internal improvement proposed even during the present session of Congress, would absorb the whole amount now annually applied to the public debt. But the advocates of this system are unwilling to rely on one class of measures only. We have schemes for colonization, education, distribution of surplus revenue, and many others, all admirably calculated to promote the great end—the absorption of the public revenue. But, sir, of all the measures devised for this purpose, this grand pension system, got up last year, and revived during the present session, is by far the most specious, the most ingeniously contrived, and the best calculated for the accomplishment of the object. Here gentlemen are supplied with a fine topic for declamation. "Gratitude for Revolutionary services!" "the claims of the poor soldiers!"—these are the popular topics which it is imagined will carry away the feelings of the people, and reconcile them to a measure which must unquestionably establish a permanent charge upon the treasury to an enormous amount, and thereby furnish a plausible excuse for keeping up the system of high duties.

To prove that such is the true character of this bill, I will appeal to its liberal and most extraordinary provisions; its entire departure from all sound principles applicable to pensions; and, above all, to the time when, and the circumstances under which, it has been brought forward. These are, to my mind, entirely conclusive. When I show that the pensioners who will be embraced within the provisions of this bill, have no stronger claims to pensions than all the citizens of the country who rendered service in the Revolution, the answer is at hand. It is intended, in due season, to extend the system to them also. When I urge the experience of the country under the act of 1818, as conclusive, to show the unjust operation of the system, and the enormous charge created by it on the public treasury, I am told that though that act "ought never to have passed," yet this bill is necessary to carry out and extend its principles. But there is one fact which speaks volumes on this subject. How comes it, that this spirit of gratitude for Revolutionary services should have slumbered for fifty years? How has it happened that it has never been discovered until now, that the men who are to be embraced within the provisions of this bill are entitled to the bounty of their country? Why is it, that, without a single petition praying for such an addition to the pension system as this bill proposes, we should be seized with such a sudden and inveterate fit of gratitude to the old soldiers, that we seemed determined to seize them by force, and, taking no denial, to insist on their receiving our bounty, whether they will or no? Sir, the reason is obvious. The period for the final extinction of the public debt is at hand. Colonization has not yet been sanctioned; internal improvement advances too slowly; the distribution of the revenue meets but small favor; the existence of a surplus must, by some means or other, be prevented; and this must be accomplished without any reduction of duties. The friends of the system have therefore gone forth upon the highways, and "all are bidden to the feast."

There is another great object collateral to this, and having, I do verily believe, an important bearing on this measure. Sir, it is not to be denied that this country is divided into two great parts, the paying and the receiving States, or, as they have been sometimes called, "the Plantation States" and "the Tariff States;" the former paying by far the greater portion of the duties which supply the treasury, and the latter receiving nearly the whole amount expended by the Federal Government. The present system operates so as to lay the taxes chiefly on one portion of the country, and to expend them on another; and while, therefore, it is the interest of the former to diminish the expenditures, and to lessen the taxes, it is manifestly the policy of the latter to increase both.

I do not know that a more striking illustration of the unequal action of this Government can be adduced, than is furnished by the operation of the pension system. Sir, no one can doubt that the sacrifices and services, during the Revolution, of the Southern were in no respect inferior to those of the Northern States. In proportion to the extent of her population, South Carolina fought as hard and as long as any State in this Union, and suffered, perhaps, more. But when pensions came to be distributed, how did the account stand? I have before me official statements showing the whole number of invalid and Revolutionary pensioners in every State of the Union, and also the whole amount of money appropriated for the payment of these pensioners from the beginning of the Government to this time. These statements exhibit the following results:

Whole amount of appropriations for pensions under act of 1818, - - - $14,174,274 50
All other pensioners, from the beginning of the Government, - - - 6,361,396 03
$20,535,670 53

Making, in all, upwards of twenty millions of dollars.

The whole number of names now on the pension roll of invalid pensioners, is - - - 3,794
Revolutionary pensioners, - - - 12,201

15,995

Say, in round numbers, sixteen thousand. Of these, about twelve thousand reside in the ten States north of Maryland, and four thousand in the fourteen Southern and Western States. The number of pensioners in Connecticut exceeds those in Virginia—and Rhode Island nearly equals South Carolina and Georgia. Assuming these data as the basis of our calculations, it would appear that, of the twenty millions paid to pensioners, about fifteen millions have gone North, and only five millions have been expended in the South and West, and that three millions out of every four hereafter to be applied to pensions, will be expended north of the Potomac. Sir, although we know that the Revolutionary services of the North did not surpass those of the South, we never complained of this inequality in the expenditure, so long as the pension system was confined to the proper objects of national bounty. But when it degenerates into a mere scheme for the distribution of the public money, we have a right to complain of the gross inequality of the system. I will not say that it is the object of this bill to make a distribution of the public revenue among the people on unjust and unequal principles, but I will say that this will unquestionably be its effect.*

I know, sir, that these are unpleasant topics of discussion; but the truth must be told; and, whether acceptable or not, it is my duty, standing here as one of the representatives of a portion of the country oppressed and afflicted by unequal contributions and unequal expenditures, to expose the true character of the system, and to strive against it to the uttermost. Sir, I would, if I could, rouse the whole country to a due sense of its enormity. I would invoke gentlemen to put down that gross inequality in the benefits and burthens of this Government, which, if not corrected, will, in the end, impair the attachment of the people in the Union itself. I allude to this subject now, not for the purpose of spreading discontent, but to strike at the root of evil, by pointing out its enormity, and calling upon honorable gentlemen, as they love their country, to apply the remedy.

If the revenues of the United States were collected by direct taxation, or even by assessment upon the States, we should have some security against extravagant expenditures. If every portion of the country contributed its equal share to the national Treasury, we should not hear of so many propositions to squander millions upon local objects; we should not find gentlemen disposed to vote away the money of their constituents with as much indifference as if it could be created by a mere act of volition, and was not the fruit of the labor of their hands. It is the fact (well known and understood, at least in one quarter of the country) that the Southern States pay by far the greater portion of the taxes, while they receive hardly any part of the expenditures, which leads to that lavish distribution of the public treasure, which, we are told, has now become "the established policy of this country." The parents of the American System are unequal taxation and unequal appropriations; to them it owes its being; and without their sustaining influence it would be destined, after dragging out a brief and precarious existence, to "perish miserably."

I am sensible that this is not the appropriate occasion to enter at large into this deeply interesting question. I must reserve that task for another and more suitable opportunity. I must be permitted, however, to say, that I believe it to be susceptible of the clearest proof, that the plantation or anti-tariff States, containing, in round numbers, four millions of inhabitants, (only one-third of the whole population of the United States,) contribute, directly or indirectly, about two-thirds of the revenue, while the tariff States (containing eight millions of inhabitants) pay about one-third of the taxes. Sir, this opinion is founded chiefly upon the fact, that the Southern States furnish two-thirds of the whole amount of the domestic exports of the United States, thereby furnishing the articles of exchange for two-thirds of all the importations from foreign countries. Nearly the whole revenue of the country, equal, in round numbers, to twenty-four millions of dollars per annum, is levied in duties on these foreign goods. Now, if we consume the goods received in exchange for our cotton, rice, and tobacco, no one would deny that we must pay two-thirds of the taxes; and if we do not consume them, then, I would ask, how does it happen that our Northern brethren are enabled to consume the fruits of our labor and capital? Two-thirds of these foreign goods of right belong to us; and if we get, as is alleged, but one-third, and our Northern brethren obtain the remainder, surely we must be entitled to some remuneration. "Well, [say gentlemen] we pay you for these goods in Northern manufactures." True, sir; and it is the very burthen of our complaints, that we are compelled to receive, in return for our cotton, rice, and tobacco, shipped to Europe, either foreign goods, burthened with duties of from forty to a hundred per cent., or domestic manufactures protected by these duties, and charged with a price sufficient to indemnify the Northern manufacturers for all the duties paid on the articles of their consumption. However true, therefore, it may be in general, that "the consumer pays the duty," it is only true when a man is considered simply in his character as a consumer; but when he acts in the double capacity of consumer and manufacturer, under a system of laws which, at the same time that it taxes him on his consumption, enables him to re-charge the amount of the tax in the price of his manufactures, (which his customers are compelled to buy at the enhanced cost,) it is obvious that he may relieve himself entirely from the tax, by throwing it upon others. If, under a law which taxes a man one dollar, he receives two, it is clear that, instead of being burthened with a tax, he would receive a bounty. Under the actual operation of the American System, I do not think there would be any material difference between a tax upon exports or upon imports. I believe they would both fall substantially upon the producers of the articles exported, these being the only medium of exchange for our imports. That the tariff States, as such, under the operation of the tariff laws, are fully indemnified for the duties paid by them on foreign goods, is conclusively proved by the fact that they zealously support the "American System," and are perpetually crying out for more taxes. But how are the Northern States to relieve themselves from the operation of this system? There are no persons to whom they can transfer the amount of duties imposed upon them. They have no protection in foreign markets for their cotton, and are compelled to receive either the taxed or the protected article at the enhanced price secured to them by the tariff laws. The system, therefore, operates exclusively to the disadvantage of the exporting States, while the manufacturing States are indemnified for their burthens, by reaping all the benefits of the system.

But, as unequal as this system of taxation must be, the distribution of the money, after it is collected, is still more unequal. I have supposed that the plantation States pay nearly two-thirds of the taxes, (sixteen millions of dollars,) and the tariff States only one-third, (eight millions of dollars.) Of this amount of twenty-four millions of dollars, I am unable to discover that more than two or three millions go South, including every object of expenditure, pensions, fortifications, internal improvements, civil list, national debt, and every thing else to which the public money is applied, leaving upwards of twenty millions of dollars for distribution in the tariff States. The operation of the American System, therefore, in both of its branches, is plainly this, to impose an enormous burthen almost exclusively upon one portion of the community, and to expend the money drawn from their industry on a different portion of the community; in one word, to tax the South sixteen millions of dollars a year, in order to distribute twelve millions of dollars among our brethren; to lay our industry under contribution to an amount little short of the whole profits of our labor, in order to make profitable the pursuits of others. But, sir, I will not press this unpleasant topic farther. Before I leave it entirely, however, I must be suffered to remark, that, though the system of indirect taxation must, under all circumstances, operate unequally and most injuriously upon the exporting States, still the South has never objected to that system, while it was confined to the legitimate purpose of raising revenue for the necessary expenses of Government, whether in peace or in war. They will contribute to their last farthing, when the honor of the country is to be defended. They have not complained of the liberal appropriations for fortifications, for the army or navy, for the civil list, or for foreign intercourse. On all objects confessedly national, they are willing that the public money shall be expended any where; and they have never been found among those who would cramp the energies of any of our national establishments by an envious or illiberal parsimony. But they do object, in the strongest terms, to this system of indirect taxation, when converted into the means of levying contributions upon them for the benefit of others. They solemnly protest against the imposition of taxes for objects not properly belonging to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, for the promotion of manufactures, of internal improvements; or the distribution of money either among individuals or States. Believing firmly and conscientiously that we contribute more than our fair proportion of the taxes, and knowing that we receive hardly any part of the immense amounts annually expended by the Federal Government, we feel that it is our right and our duty to be on the watch to detect and expose every scheme calculated to extend unnecessarily the national expenditures. This pension bill, as it is one of the most imposing in its character, is certainly one of the most dangerous of all the schemes ever devised to perpetuate this system. I have asked for a statement of the annual charge upon the treasury which it will create. I have received no answer, except having my attention called to the letter from the officer at the head of the Pension Office, in which he says that a thousand persons will probably be added to the pension roll under the first section of the bill; about five hundred under the last section; and as to the third section, (by far the most comprehensive of the whole,) he has no data by which to make any estimate. Here, then, we have one thousand five hundred pensioners, with an annual charge of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. In another letter from the same officer, (quoted by the Senator from Maryland,) he speaks of two thousand as the probable number; which would swell the amount to two hundred thousand dollars. But under the third section, which we are told cannot be estimated, we may be assured that the amount will be at least equal to both of the other classes; and this would enlarge the amount to near half a million. But these are estimates merely. Now, in 1818, it was estimated that one hundred and sixty thousand dollars would cover all the pensions to be granted under that law; yet they were found to amount to between two and three millions of dollars. Who can tell whether the result may not be the same on the present occasion? At all events, it is certain that we are now about to commence a new system, which will not, and which cannot, stop short of creating a permanent charge of many millions upon the treasury. The introduction of the State troops will prepare the way for the militia. The abolition of the restrictions which have hitherto confined the pension system to "indigent circumstances," and "a fixed term of continuous service under one enlistment," will, and necessarily must, extend the system to all who served at any time during the Revolution. Civil pensions will follow next; and he must be wilfully blind who does not perceive that this system is capable of being easily enlarged, so as to create, in the course of the ensuing four years, a charge upon the treasury of from ten to twelve millions annually; of which amount, (judging from past experience,) nine or ten millions will go to the North, and two or three to the South and West. In such a scheme, the first step is all; once taken, it can never be retraced: and if it be taken now, by the passage of this bill, I shall give up the hope of living to see the day when any material reduction shall take place in the enormous amount of indirect taxation with which the people of the United States are now burdened, and under the weight of which the whole South is fast sinking into ruin. It will be in vain that the national debt shall be paid, (if, indeed, gentlemen intend to suffer it to be paid): its extinguishment will bring no relief from our calamities. We must go on forever in the same course which we have been pursuing for several years past, making vain efforts, by increased exertion and a more rigorous economy, to meet the constantly increasing demands of those who will never be satisfied while their gains shall be unequal to their desires, or we shall have any thing left to give. One other suggestion, [said Mr. H.] and I shall leave this bill to its fate. I take the liberty of asking gentlemen known to be friendly to the present administration, how they can consent to lend their aid to measures which have a direct tendency to involve, nay, which must inevitably involve, the administration in the most serious embarrassments, and possibly deprive them of public confidence. General Jackson came into power as the advocate of economy, retrenchment, and reform. The people were taught to believe that he would not only rectify all the abuses of the Government, but that he would bring back the administration to the simplicity of the days of Thomas Jefferson; that he would pay the public debt, reduce the taxes, and diminish the expenditures; and no one who knows the President can doubt for a moment that such were his views, and such are now his intentions. And yet, sir, with a decided administration majority in both Houses of Congress, we find his friends lending their support to a system of appropriations more extravagant than has ever before been witnessed under this Government. I have taken some pains in looking into this matter, and now assert, that appropriations to a greater amount have already been made by the present than by any former Congress; and if the measures now before both Houses, with every prospect of success, shall prevail, the expenditures of the present year will exceed, by two or three millions, those of any year since the war. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HOLMES] tells us, "the people will not judge of General Jackson's administration by such a test," and adds, "that General Jackson ought not to be held responsible for expenditures made under acts of Congress." But, sir, will the opposition out of the House hold this language? or shall we not find their presses, from one end of the Union to the other, holding up in strong contrast the promise and the performance of the party, whose watchwords have been "economy and reform?" Let gentlemen say what they will, my life upon it, the people will never be satisfied with any excuses that can be offered for expenditures during the first year of General Jackson's administration exceeding any year of his predecessor's; and if such a state of things shall be brought about by the friends of the administration in Congress, on them will rest the responsibility for the consequences. Let me tell gentlemen that, if this administration shall not fulfil, in some degree, the high expectations of the people in this respect, it cannot retain public confidence; and I will add, that it is as certain as the progress of time itself, that the course pursued here, in relation to internal improvements, rivers, harbors, lighthouses, and pensions, if not arrested, will inevitably prostrate any administration that stands charged with measures that must inevitably delay the payment of the debt, and establish charges upon the treasury, which will greatly aggravate the burthens of the people, and leave us without a hope for the future.

Mr. CHAMBERS and Mr. HOLMES replied in support of the bill.

Mr. TYLER said that he would very briefly state to the Senate his objections to the bill. Little was left for him to say after the able argument which had been urged against the measure, by his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE.] Every act of legislation should stand upon some general principle, and should embrace all who fell justly within that principle. This had been the case with most of the pension laws which had heretofore been passed. The invalid pension law extended to those who had sustained injury in the public service, which had contributed to incapacitate them from labor. This principle was just, since it applied as well to the man who had lost a leg, as to the one who had lost an arm. So with other pension bills. No one had proper cause to complain of the operation of the law, since the moment misfortune placed him within its influence, he felt its benefits. The revolutionary pension act of 1818 was, to a certain extent, founded in justice. The principle then was, inability on the part of the soldier to support himself without the assistance of the country. Each applicant for the governmental bounty, was called on to make oath to his inability. All who were thus incapacitated to earn their daily bread, fell under its provisions, with a limitation which he had considered unjust—to the nine months continental troops. Thus excluding from its benefits all the State troops and militia, without regard to the fact that they too had, in many instances, served for a longer period than nine months, and that their services had been as truly valuable as the services of the continentals. Here justice had halted, not to say that injustice had commenced. The gallant corps of Marion and of Sumpter, to mention none others, had great cause to complain. They had stood forth for the country, in its hour of greatest peril and deepest gloom. Strangers to every comfort, their tent was the canopy of heaven, and their encampment the morass. Theirs was a pure and unalloyed patriotism, stimulated by no prospect of reward either in land or money. Their idol was their country—their only wish, its emancipation. But still the principle of the law was well ascertained and easily to be understood. That principle was necessity—great penury on the part of the soldier. It rested upon charity. He was unable to see any just principle in the bill before the Senate. What was the condition on which the claim to the pension was proposed to be placed? The possession of property not exceeding one thousand dollars in value. Now where was the justice of this limitation? Why not extend it further? If a man have but so much over the one thousand dollars as would turn the scale in a degree however slight, he was to be excluded. This served to show that the bill was placed on improper ground. It was proposed to let go the principle of charity on which former laws had rested, and to assume an arbitrary landmark. Apply it to real life, and how would it work? One man, worth property amounting in value to one thousand dollars, is much more independent than another with a property of one thousand five hundred dollars. One might have no family, while the other might be surrounded with a numerous offspring. He had said that the bill proposed to give up the principle of charity in the Government, and necessity in the soldier. Could any Senator doubt it? Look throughout the Union, and this doubt would be dispelled. It might well be questioned whether more than half the citizens of the United States possessed estates of greater value than one thousand dollars; and yet they were independent; they had their fifty acres of land, and were surrounded by comforts. We were then to manifest our munificence, not our charity. Why then stop at the limits marked out by the bill? Why not embrace all who send in the resolution, without regard to their condition in life? He desired not to be misunderstood. He should not advocate the bill if it was thus modified. He was showing the unjust operation of that now before the Senate. The Government had no right to be munificent at the expense of the people, nor was there any proper occasion for it.

He had another objection to the bill, which was with him all-controlling. He took a view of it, which he was satisfied had not been taken by the committee. He was satisfied that the committee would recommend no measure which they believed to be corrupting in its tendency. And yet he considered this bill as obnoxious to that objection. By the acts of 1818 and 1820, the applicant was required to swear that he was in indigent circumstances, and required the assistance of his country for his support. Here, therefore, many who were, fortunately for them, in possession of property much less in value than one thousand dollars, had abstained from taking this oath. They could not reconcile the oath to their consciences. Now, what are we called on to do? We are required to say to these men, "lay aside your scruples—swear that you stand in need of the assistance of your country for support, whatever may be your opinion upon that subject, and although, in truth, all your neighbors know that you possess the means of living in comfort, yet Congress tells you otherwise, and you must, therefore, swear, in direct opposition to your own honest conviction." Was there ever held out to men a greater temptation to perjury? We actually offer a bounty for false swearing!

But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HOLMES] informs us that this measure is recommended by the President; and expresses surprise that he should be found enlisted in its support, while the Senator from South Carolina stands in his behalf opposed to the administration. Mr. T. in the first place, denied that the odium of this measure rested with the President. True, he had recommended some further provision for the Revolutionary soldier, in his message; but had the committee of either House consulted him as to the provisions of this bill? How then could this be called a measure of the administration? Whilst he did not recognise the finger of the President in this particular measure, he would say to the Senator from Maine, that he had but one light to guide his footsteps, and that was the light of his own judgment. He was alone responsible to those whom he represented here, and to none other; and while he was prepared to give to the administration a fair support, yet, when he believed it in error, his duty to the country would require of him a candid expression of his opinions.

Mr. CHASE followed in support of the bill; when, about four o'clock,

The Senate adjourned.

LAW DEPARTMENT.

On motion by Mr. ROWAN, the bill to re-organize the establishment of the Attorney General, and erect it into an Executive Department, was resumed in Committee of the Whole, with the amendment reported to it by the Judiciary Committee, which provides

For the establishment of an Executive Department, to be called the Law Department, and the Attorney General, for the time being, to be its chief officer, at a salary of six thousand dollars;

For the transfer thereto of the duties required by law from the "Agent of the Treasury," &c.

Mr. FORSYTH moved an amendment, excluding the Attorney General from the exercise of private practice; which was rejected.

A long debate took place on the proposed substitute of the Judiciary Committee, in which Messrs. ROWAN, HAYNE, JOHNSTON, SANFORD, and FRELINGHUYSEN, advocated it, and Messrs. BELL, FOOT, CHAMBERS, WEBSTER, and WOODBURY, opposed it and the original bill.

On the question to agree to the amendment of the committee, Mr. HOLMES asked for a division, and the question was accordingly taken on striking out of the original bill all after the enacting clause, and decided in the affirmative.

The question was then taken on inserting the substitute reported by the Judiciary Committee, and decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, 24 to 22.

Mr. FOOT then moved the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the offices of Second Comptroller and Second Auditor be, and are hereby, abolished, and the duties now performed by the Second Comptroller shall be performed by the First Comptroller, and the duties now required by law to be performed by the Second Auditor shall be transferred to the Third Auditor.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved that the bill and proposed amendment be laid upon the table; which was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, 29 to 17.

Mr. W. then gave notice that he would on Monday next ask leave to bring in a bill to establish the office of Solicitor of the Treasury.

PENSION LAWS.

The Senate then resumed the unfinished business of yesterday on the bill from the House of Representatives, "declaratory of the several acts to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FORSYTH moved that the bill and amendment be indefinitely postponed; which was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, 25 to 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Barton, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Burnet, Clayton, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Noble, Rowan, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Chambers, Chase, Dickerson, Dudley, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Knight, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Webster, Willey, Woodbury—20.

MONDAY, MAY 3, 1830.

Mr. WEBSTER, on leave, brought in a bill to provide for the appointment of a Solicitor of the Treasury; which was read, passed to a second reading, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGE PECK.

A message having been received from the House of Representatives, notifying that they had appointed Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, Mr. STORRS, of New York, Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, Mr. SPENCER, of New York, and Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, managers to conduct the impeachment of James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri,

On motion by Mr. TAZEWELL, it was

Resolved, That, at twelve o'clock to-morrow, the Senate will resolve itself into a Court of Impeachment, at which time the following oath or affirmation shall be administered by the Secretary to the President of the Senate, and by him to each member of the Senate, viz.

"I solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that, in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, I will do impartial justice, according to law."

Which Court of Impeachment being thus formed, will, at the time aforesaid, receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives, to exhibit articles of impeachment, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, pursuant to notice given to the Senate this day by the House of Representatives, that they had appointed managers for the purposes aforesaid; and that the Secretary of the Senate lay this resolution before the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That after the Managers of the Impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate, and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against James H. Peck, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri." After which, the articles shall be exhibited, and the President of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the amended bill to graduate the price of the public lands, to make provision for actual settlers, and to cede the refuse, upon equitable terms and for meritorious objects, to the States in which they lie.

Mr. BENTON requested that the Secretary of the Senate should read the memorial of the General Assembly of Missouri, praying its passage; which was done. Mr. B. then explained the different sections of the bill. He said that the bill applied, not to the mass or whole body of the public lands, but to that part only which had been offered at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and could not find a purchaser at that price. The quantity of these unsold and refuse lands he stated at about seventy millions of acres, and read extracts from the reports of the registers and receivers of the land offices, to show their quality and average value, and the length of time which they had been in market. These reports showed a large proportion of these unsold lands to be unfit for cultivation, and fixed their average prices at twelve or fifteen cents per acre in some districts, and in others as high as sixty or seventy cents. They showed that most of these lands had been a long time in market, many of them fifteen, twenty, or thirty years under the laws of the United States; and, in the countries acquired by the Louisiana and Florida treaties, they had been picked and culled for half a century, and, in some instances, a whole century, before they came into the hands of the United States. This was the character and value of the land to which the bill applied; and the idea was altogether croneous which gave it a wider scope, and made it applicable to the whole body of the public lands. The terms on which the bill proposed to dispose of this unsold and refuse parcel of land, was the next point to be considered; and on this head, [Mr. B. said,] there were two sets of provisions contained in two different sections, and applicable to two descriptions of purchasers. The first set of provisions was open to all purchasers, and offered the lands at annual periodical reductions of price, beginning at one dollar per acre, and falling twenty-five cents in the acre, at the end of each year, until the price fell to twenty-five cents. The second set of provisions, contained in the second section, was intended for the benefit of actual settlers, and gave them a preference over general purchasers. The preference was secured by offering to the actual settler the privilege of buying the land at twenty-five cents less in the acre, at each successive graduation of price. Thus, when the price to the general purchaser was one dollar per acre, it would be seventy-five cents to the settler; when seventy-five to the former, it would be fifty to the latter; when fifty to one, it would be twenty-five to the other; and when twenty-five cents to the general purchaser, it was only five cents to the actual settler; a provision which was intended to operate as a donation in favor of poor people. There were two other sections which might be considered as subsidiary to the others, and merely intended to give more full and complete effect to their intention; one of them contained a provision for gratuitous donations in favor of poor families, without the payment of any price; the other was intended to secure those who had taken permits as tenants at will to the United States, under the act of 1807, or who might not take such permits, a preference over all other settlers or occupants, in purchasing the land on which they were settled. Having stated the principles and provisions of the bill, Mr. B. went on to show that the prices fixed in the different sections were just and reasonable; that they were calculated to accelerate the sales, and to obtain a fair and full price for the land. He said that the two sections established a competition between purchasers, which would prevent any one from waiting for the land to fall below its just value. When it was at one dollar, the general purchaser could not wait for it to fall to seventy-five cents or fifty cents per acre, because the actual settler would have the preference at twenty-five cents less in the acre at each reduction, and would intercept the purchase. The competition would be keen and decisive throughout, the settler always having the advantage; both in point of price and of time. With the settlers themselves, who had made improvements, and considered the land as their home, they would be glad to take the land at its fair value, whenever it fell to it, and would be more apt to buy it at a rate above than below its value, in order to save their labor and their home. There was one point of view, [Mr. B. said,] which ought to be decisive in favor of these reductions of price; it was this: that every tract to which this bill was applicable, was a tract of inferior value, consisting of a few acres only fit for cultivation, the rest worthless and sterile; and if one dollar twenty-five cents all round is for ever demanded for these broken spots, where the bad land is five or ten times greater in quantity than the good, it would bring the good land to five or ten dollars an acre, instead of the minimum price, which is now demanded. He illustrated this idea, by saying that all the surveys were run out at right angles; that the lines paid no respect to the quality of the soil; that a quarter section would sometimes have a patch of twenty or thirty acres of good land in one corner, and the rest good for nothing; or it would lie across a creek, or a branch, where there would be a narrow bottom of rich ground, and the ends of the quarter section stretching into sterile hills and ridges.

Mr. B. adverted to the price of lands in the State of Maine, where the Legislature of the State fixed the prices, and adapted the price to the quality, and made that price, even at its highest minimum, as low as the lowest, and sometimes lower than the last minimum which the graduation bill proposed. To show this, he read the following advertisement for the sale of lands in Maine, in the year 1828.

THE ADVERTISEMENT.

Timber Lands.—The minimum prices at which the following townships and tracts of land may be sold, having, under the advice and direction of the Governor and Council, been fixed and determined upon, they will be offered for sale at public auction, at a price per acre not less than that set against each township or tract, on the terms and conditions provided by the sixth and seventh sections of the act entitled "An act to promote the sale and settlement of Public Lands," as follows:

Township No. 1, range 1, Titcomb's survey, containing 22,900 acres, 20 cents per acre.

Township No. 7, range 2, Titcomb's survey, containing 30,000 acres, 20 cents per acre.

Township No. 3, range 4, Norris and McMillan's survey, containing 23,163½ acres, 20 cents per acre.

Township No. 4, range 5, Norris's survey, containing 23,040 acres, 25 cents per acre.

Township No. 2, range 9, Norris's survey, containing 23,040 acres, 25 cents per acre.

Township No. 3, range 14, Norris's survey, containing 19,787 acres, 25 cents per acre.

Tract A 2, in ranges 13 and 14, Norris's survey, containing 17,920 acres, 25 cents per acre.

Tract X, range 14, Norris's survey, containing 5,778 acres, 25 cents per acre.

These lands are considered to be valuable for timber, and will be reconnoitered, and divided into parts of townships and tracts. No larger tract than a township of six miles square, nor a less quantity than would be contained in one mile square, can be sold to one individual or company. When a township or tract may be divided and sold in separate lots, the minimum price of each part will be regulated according to its relative value to the whole township or tract.

The terms of payment required by law, are one-fourth part of the purchase money at the time of sale, and the residue to be secured by notes of the purchaser, with good sureties, payable in three equal annual instalments with interest annually.

DANIEL ROSE, Land Agent.

Augusta, July 21, 1828.

Having read the advertisement, Mr. B. commented upon the advantage which the State of Maine had over the other new States, in being the mistress and sole disposer of her own public lands. Her own Legislature fixed the terms, and fixed them equitably; and put it into the power of every citizen to become a freeholder. Missouri would be glad to do the same, but her public lands were at the disposal of Congress, and he could only quote the example of Maine as one worthy for Congress to follow. But he said the advertisement he had read was only one out of thousands which had been put forth; that he had been told of others which fixed the minimum prices as low as ten and five cents an acre; and that Massachusetts, who owned half the public lands in Maine, also sold them at the same low and easy terms. Mr. B. said that he would quote Maine for another purpose—for the purpose of showing the groundless folly of being alarmed about speculators. There were no speculators in Maine; he had heard of but one large purchaser there, and he was injured by the purchase. It was a Mr. Bingham, who had bought two and a half millions of acres from Massachusetts, at ten cents an acre, and, from all reports, would rejoice to get rid of his bargain, (or rather his heirs would,) and get back the principal without interest, or interest without principal. Nothing in the graduation bill descended so low as these prices in Maine, yet the Maine lands were all fresh and unpicked, and sold upon a credit of one, two, and three years. Such were the advantages which the State of Maine derived from the prudence of Massachusetts, in withholding her public lands from the Federal Government. But justice was justice. Equity was the same under a federal or the State Government; and, therefore, the example of Maine and Massachusetts, in selling their lands at prices adapted to their quality, and on terms so moderate as to put it into the power of every citizen to become a freeholder, might well be quoted in this chamber, and held up as presenting an example which the Congress ought to follow.

Mr. B. said, there was another piece of information, necessary to enlighten the decision of the Senate, which he had taken pains to procure, and to procure in an authentic and unquestionable form, that the great fact which it presented might come before the Senate with the full weight of certain and undeniable truth; it was the great number of non-freeholders in the new States and Territories. His travels and personal observation had convinced him that this number was great, incredibly great, and that nothing but an accurate and official statement could produce a conviction of the fact. He had, therefore, taken measures to obtain this accurate statement; he had moved a resolution in the Senate two years ago, to obtain from the marshals in the new States and Territories a return of the number of the free taxable inhabitants who are not freeholders, as exhibited by the tax lists; the return had been made to the Department of State, and communicated to the Senate, printed by its order, and forms a document in the session of 1828-'29. He would read the table of recapitulation, which showed the number of these non-freeholders.

THE TABLE.

Having read the document, and shown the number of non-freeholders in each of these States and Territories, Mr. B. stated that the aggregate exceeded one hundred and forty thousand; and ventured to affirm that the like spectacle was not to be seen elsewhere upon the face of the earth; that there was not another country under the wide canopy of heaven, in which a government having more land than it could sell, or even give away to cultivators, would deprive so large a portion of its citizens of homes for themselves and families, by holding up refuse and inferior land for a price five times and ten times above its value. This was the exact case with the Federal Government. It held about seventy millions of acres of refuse lands in the States and Territories, where these one hundred and forty thousand non-freeholders live, and yet would not let them have an acre of it at its value! Mr. B. did not speak of the new lands which the Government possessed, and which would come hereafter into market; they amounted to hundreds of millions of acres, and would still continue to be sold at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; he spoke of the refuse lands only, those which had been offered at one dollar and twenty-five cents, and can find no purchaser; those which are the remains of all the sales which have taken place since the commencement of the land sales, and many of which had been previously picked and culled under foreign Governments, as in Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Florida, and a part of Mississippi, Illinois, and Michigan, before the United States acquired them. These were the lands of which he spoke, and for which he claimed a reduction of price. It was on these that the one hundred and forty thousand non-freeholders were chiefly settled, and where they were losing their time between hope and fear—hoping that the Government will reduce the price, to enable them to purchase, and fearing to make any beneficial or valuable improvement, lest it should excite the avarice of some unprincipled speculator to enter the land over their heads, for the sake of the improvement which had been put upon it. It was a mistake to suppose that this large body of non-freeholders were idle and vicious people; and that it was their vice and idleness which kept them too poor to buy land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. Mr. B. said that he knew better; he knew this class of people well; he had travelled among them, slept in their houses, ate at their tables, and knew them to be the best of citizens; men who did not think of living upon the public, but upon their own labor; whose object was to cultivate the earth, and to defend it; who were industrious farmers at home, and brave soldiers in time of war; who were hospitable, brave, and honest, and merited the esteem of all good men, as well as the favor and protection of the Government. How then, it might be demanded, did it happen that these persons were not able to buy land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre? Mr. B. would answer that inquiry with the precision and triumph of truth. In the first place, it is a difficult undertaking for a poor man, in a new country, where there is but little money, and few objects which will command it, to accumulate as much money as would buy a half-quarter section of land at that price. It would require one hundred dollars to make the purchase; and the greatest proportion of poor people, in new countries, never see the day when they have that sum on hand. They marry early; their daily labor is necessary to support their families; they have little to spare for market, and the proceeds of that little are absorbed in the purchase of salt and iron, in the payment of taxes, in small expenses when they go abroad, in the blacksmith's bill, sometimes in physicians' bills, or lawyers' fees, and in the various contingencies of fraud and accident and misfortune, to which the life of man is subject. This is a reason, a true and natural one, why so many people, without any fault of their own, are unable to accumulate the sum, to them an immense one, of one hundred dollars, to buy a piece of federal land. But it is not the only reason why they do not buy. There is another and most decisive reason why they should not if they could. It is this: That these refuse lands upon which they live are not worth one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and they ought not to give that sum for it, even if they had thousands! Look at the reports of the registers and receivers. See the quality and value of these lands as returned by them. The greater part returned as unfit for cultivation; the rest chiefly as second or third rate, averaging twelve and a half cents, fifteen cents, eight cents, twenty cents, five cents, three and a half cents, in most instances, per acre; and seldom rising as high as fifty, sixty, or seventy-five cents. The fact is, that these refuse tracts are mixed with good and bad, the greater part bad, often not more than twenty or thirty acres fit for cultivation, the rest fit for nothing; and it would be absurd, iniquitous, and cruel to the poor, to whom these little tracts are useful, to demand the same price all round, as if every acre was first rate. These refuse tracts are not worth the present minimum price. They are not worth what the first choices were, and it is a folly to ask it, as much so as it would be in a butcher to ask the same price for the shanks and necks and offal of his beef, as he demanded for the hind quarter. Individuals adapt the prices of the land they offer for sale, to its quality and actual value. All the States did the same when they had land to sell. Massachusetts and Maine are now doing the same. And it is out of the question for this Federal Government, which has become the great landholder of the West, and pays no taxes upon its hundreds of millions of acres, to have but one price for all qualities; to demand the same for first rate, second rate, third rate, and no rate at all; to demand the same for a quarter section of broken, hilly ground, half barren, part rock, part swamp, part sterile ridges, without a spring or well, which is demanded for a quarter section of rich, level land, well watered and timbered, and every acre fit for the plough. This is the case at present; this is the present mode of conducting land sales by the Federal Government; but it is an unjust mode, it is condemned by the common consent and universal practice of all mankind. It cannot be defended. No man can stand up and say it is right. Justice to the new States and Territories, and the interest of the federal treasury, requires it to be altered—requires the price to be adapted to the quality of this refuse land; and the bill which is now before the Senate is intended to accomplish that just and equitable object.

Mr. B. recurred to the early prices which had been proposed for the public lands, and showed that able statesmen had fixed lower prices than the graduation bill contained. He quoted General Hamilton's reports, when Secretary of the Treasury, the first of which fixed twenty cents, and the next one fifteen cents per acre, as the average value of the public lands. He quoted also the report of the first committee of the House of Representatives under the organization of the present form of Government, which recommended thirty cents per acre; and argued that it would have been better for the United States that these low prices should have been fixed when proposed near forty years ago, as the sales of the lands would have been rapid, and the proceeds of them promptly received and applied to the extinguishment of the public debt. Every sixteen years, he said, the price of the land was lost in the payment of interest on the public debt. The whole capital was sunk in every period of sixteen years, and the lands would have gone as far towards the payment of the debt at thirty cents an acre sixteen years ago, as at sixty cents now; and so in future. Mr. B. also adverted to the price fixed on the public lands by the ordinance of the old Congress in 1788, which was one dollar per acre, and to the vote then given by the States of New York, New Jersey, Maryland, and South Carolina, to reduce that price to sixty-six and two-thirds cents; and then contended, that if the price of one dollar per acre (and which, in the opinion of so many other States, ought to have been but little more than half that sum) was the original price when the lands were fresh and unpicked, it ought to be reduced at least as low as the graduation bill proposed to reduce it, after all the good tracts had been sold out, and nothing but broken and refuse tracts remained behind.

Judge Peck.

With respect to the donation clause, which the bill contained, Mr. B. advocated it at length, and with many facts and arguments. He stated that it was the policy of Mr. Jefferson, at the first acquisition of Louisiana, to make donations to actual settlers, for the purpose of populating the country and defending it. He had proposed that a donation of a quarter section should be made to the first thirty thousand settlers that should go to the country; and considered their services, in settling and defending the country, in subduing the wilderness, and spreading the blessings of civilization, as the most meritorious price which they could pay for the land.

Mr. B. considered the settlement of the country, and the cultivation of its soil, as the true wealth of the Union; the mere price of the land, received into the treasury, was a trifle compared to it. The whole amount of money received for the sale of public lands, was thirty-four millions of dollars; from which there was to be deducted the heavy expenses of surveying and selling it; while the amount received during the same time, from the cultivation of the land, in the shape of duties collected from the imports which were bought with the cotton, tobacco, rice, grain, provisions, and other articles, raised on the soil, and exported, amounted to five hundred and twenty millions of dollars. Such was the difference between the sale and the cultivation of the soil, but not all the difference; for the price of the land sold could be received but once, while the collection of duties from the produce of the land was perpetual and eternal. As long as crops are raised, duties can be collected. The greater the crops, the greater the revenue. And it certainly would be wise policy, in a mere money-raising point of view, for the United States to make a donation of a quarter section of land to every family that would settle and cultivate it. Instead of that, our citizens are not allowed to purchase at a fair price; they are not allowed to buy land at its first value; one hundred and forty thousand free taxable inhabitants are without land, in the new States and Territories abounding with vacant land. They are sighing for the waste land which lies around them; realizing the fabulous picture of the man who perished for a drink of water, while standing in water up to his chin. Nor was it these one hundred and forty thousand only that wanted to purchase, but almost every farmer in the new States and Territories. The whole of these, as their means and families increase, want more land. They wish to add to the size of their farms, either for the purpose of extending their fields, or securing wood, or keeping open an outlet, or keeping off an intrusive neighbor, or making pasture, or providing settlements for children. For some of these various purposes, almost every farmer and landholder, now in the West, would be desirous to make new purchases, and would make them, if the price of the land was adapted to its value. As it is, they take the public timber gratis, injuring the land, and paying no price to the Federal Government, nor any tax to the State Government. But this is not their fault, but the fault of the Government, which demands a price above the value, and which no man ought to give, or will give. Let the price be suited to the quality, and the sales will be rapid where they are now stagnant. Farmers will buy the land which they now use gratis; and, instead of waiting for it to fall to the lowest minimum, they will be careful to buy as soon as it falls to its true value, lest some other person should buy before them, and either hold the land to their annoyance and injury, or make them pay an advanced price for it. This would be the operation of the bill. One hundred and forty thousand occupants would be raised to the condition of freeholders; several hundred thousand farmers would buy additional tracts; the receipts into the public treasury would be doubled; the State taxes would be increased; the exports would be augmented; the revenue collected from imports would be augmented in the same proportion; and every interest, federal, State, and individual, would be promoted and confirmed.

Mr. B. said that he had spoken so often on this subject, that he was afraid of being tiresome to the Senate. This fear restrained him from following up the subject. He earnestly wished that every Senator could see the question in the light he did; could have the benefit of his own observation; and he would feel safe as to the result. In place of that personal knowledge, he must refer them to the voice of the members who came from the West; to the numerous memorials from the State Legislatures, which prayed for the passage of this bill; and to the reports of the registers and receivers, which showed the average value of the land to be less than the graduated prices which the bill proposed for it. The bill was a favorite one with him; but he was not blindly wedded to it. He liked it because he thought it was good; he preferred it because he thought it was best; but he was not madly enamored of it because it was his own. He was for the good of the people; he was for doing what was the best for the country; and if any member of the Senate could produce a better plan, he would gladly embrace it. One thing he was particularly anxious about; and that was, that this bill should be tried upon its own merits, and passed or rejected accordingly; that it should not be postponed for the final policy which might govern the disposition of the public lands after the payment of the public debt; but acted upon now, and with a view to the single and equitable object which the bill presented—that of reducing the price of the refuse land, which will not sell for one dollar twenty-five cents per acre, and making equitable provision for actual settlers and cultivators.

Mr. BARTON next rose. He said that he did not intend to enter into this debate; but, as no other member seemed disposed to take part in it, he would take this opportunity to put himself right before his constituents, with respect to an accusation contained in the postscript to a former speech upon this subject, [Mr. BENTON's speech upon the Graduation bill, May 16th, 1826,] which had been circulated throughout Missouri. As the postscript had not been spoken on this floor, he had no opportunity to refute the charge contained in it at the time; but would now call upon the Senators from Virginia and Louisiana [Messrs. TAZEWELL and JOHNSTON] to testify in his behalf as to its truth. Mr. B. said, the speech of 1826, alluded to, was made on the 16th of May, at the close of the session, when the Senate was much pressed with business, and concluded with an express declaration of the mover of the bill that he did not intend to ask for a decision upon it at that session. Under these circumstances, and no member showing any disposition to say any thing upon the subject, [Mr. B. said] he moved to lay the bill on the table, which was unanimously assented to as a matter of course; and the Senate proceeded to the great mass of business before it. Mr. B. said, the part of the postscript to which he now called the attention of the Senator from Virginia, was the following; in which the author [Mr. BENTON] says—

Controversies between States.

[SENATE.]

"After the delivery of this speech, a motion was made by one of the opponents of the bill, to lay it on the table; which motion, not admitting of debate, prevented many Senators, who were favorable to the main object of the bill, from declaring their sentiments. Among these was Mr. TAZEWELL, of Virginia, one of the most distinguished men in America, and whose sentiments, as a Senator from the State which was the greatest donor of the Western lands, are entitled to peculiar respect, and must have uncommon weight. Disappointed in his expectation of having an opportunity to declare his sentiments on the bill to graduate the price of the public lands, Mr. TAZEWELL afterwards deposited upon the table of the Senate the following resolution;

"Resolved, That it is expedient for the United States to cede and surrender to the several States within whose limits the same may be situated, all the right, title, and interest of the United States to any land lying and being within the boundaries of such States, respectively, upon such terms and conditions as may be consistent with the due observance of the public faith, and with the general interest of the United States."

After reading to the Senate the foregoing extract from the postscript, and the resolution, Mr. B. called on Mr. TAZEWELL, in his place, to say whether he had been prevented from delivering his sentiments on the graduation bill, by him, and driven to offer the resolution as an expression of those sentiments, as stated in the postscript, or not; and offered to send the postscript and resolution to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TAZEWELL rose, and said it was unnecessary to send them, for he remembered the resolution perfectly well; and that, in offering it, he was not influenced by any movement of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BARTON] nor had his movement any connexion with the motion of the Senator to lay the graduation bill on the table; that he had entertained the design to offer such a proposition for some time before the debate alluded to, and had drawn up the resolution and shown it to several members before offering it; and that he had no intention to take any part in the debate on the graduation bill, that had been referred to in the postscript.

Mr. BARTON also rose, and read the following from the postscript to Mr. BENTON's speech:

"Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, who had, in like manner, been disappointed, submitted a resolution to obtain from the General Land Office, by the commencement of the next session, a report upon the qualities and value of the public lands in Louisiana and Mississippi, preparatory to the discussion of the bill to graduate the price of the public lands, at the next session."

Having read the extract, Mr. BARTON called on Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, in his place, to say whether he had been prevented from delivering his sentiments on the occasion mentioned in the postscript, or disappointed, as represented by the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON said, in substance, that he did speak, at one session, on the graduation bill, which was probably the session after the one referred to. He did not remember to have been prevented at any time, and he was sure the motion to lay the bill on the table was not with a view to prevent his speaking; and that his resolution had in view to obtain a description of the lands in Louisiana, with a view to obtain a cession of them to the State, or to graduate the price to the quality at a subsequent session. [The bill was then ordered to lie on the table.]

CONTROVERSIES BETWEEN STATES.

The bill reported to the Senate, "prescribing the modes of commencing, prosecuting, and deciding controversies between States," being next under consideration, the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. ROWAN] made a motion for its indefinite postponement.

Against this motion Mr. ROBBINS spoke to the following effect:

This bill provides the process for enabling the Supreme Court to decide controversies between State and State, but does not provide any process for enforcing the decision. This omission, while it relieves the bill from exception, will not impair its efficacy. The question of right being settled by the Supreme Court, the bill leaves it to the voluntary justice of the State found to be in the wrong to make restitution of the right which had been withheld; presuming coercion to be unnecessary.

For my part, I cannot imagine any reasonable ground on which the adoption of such a law can be resisted. For, as no force is to be employed, no coercion to be resorted to, it cannot endanger the peace of the Union; it need not even disturb the fraternity of the contending States; and yet it will be sufficient to vindicate the national justice, and to redeem the pledge given to the several States when they adopted the constitution, and, by the constitution, that they should obtain this justice under its authority.

Besides, the law is limited to a period of five years; and if on trial it is found to be inconvenient, of which there is no probability, no possibility indeed, the inconvenience will be but temporary. It is to be but an experiment; an experiment which promises beneficial results, and these very important, and which may be made without the risk, so far as can be foreseen, of one possible evil.

In the course of five years, every subsisting controversy of the kind in question, may be, and probably will be, prosecuted and closed, and the continuance of the law become unnecessary. The constitution will then stand acquitted of its obligation to the States complaining of wrong and claiming redress, of its obligation to afford them that redress, and probably its power need never again be exerted.

The objection to this law, if any, should come, I think, from the complaining States, as being a law that may not be effectual to its end, as it provides no means for the enforcement of the decree when made. But it is these complaining States who apply for the law. They say, we wish no better. For they are confident it will be effectual to its end; that no State in this Union will consent to stand under the opprobrium of withholding that justice which has been decreed against her, in favor of a sister State, by the Supreme Court of the nation, under the authority of the constitution. That very State pride, which opposes itself to this bill, is their warrant for this confidence; for that pride never would brook, for a moment, the reproach of persisting in a wrong, pronounced by the constitutional voice of the nation to be a wrong, and which the State itself could no longer say was not a wrong. Besides, they have for this confidence the warrant of all past experience; both our own, and that of every other confederacy which ever has existed. The provision for settling controversies among the federal members by the authority of the federal power has been common to them all. Indeed, it would be preposterous to think of forming a federal constitution without such a provision. For one of the chief ends of forming a confederacy is, to preserve peace among its members; and this is one of the obvious and necessary means of preserving peace. In every instance of a confederated government, that ever has existed, except our own under the present constitution, that provision has been organized, and made effectual to its end; but in no instance has it ever been found necessary to execute by force the decree of the constituted tribunal. The decree alone has always been found sufficient to execute itself. The decree is itself the execution; has all the force of an execution; and, like the decrees of the Exchequer against the King of England, carries itself into execution. Such is the testimony of all experience upon the subject.

To notice this matter historically, but briefly, however, very briefly:

The Amphictionian council was the Supreme Court of Greece, and decided the civil controversies between the sovereignties which composed that celebrated confederacy; and though those controversies were frequently litigated before, and decided by, that august tribunal, yet history mentions no instance in which the decree was resisted, or in which force was found necessary to its execution, though that tribunal might arm itself with the whole force of the confederacy for this purpose.

In the Germanic confederacy, the decrees of the Aulic Council and Imperial Chamber, (which was, and I believe still is, the Supreme Court as to all civil controversies of that confederacy)—these decrees might be enforced by the ban of the empire. But when was that ban ever employed to enforce the decree in such controversies? We read of none.

In the Swiss confederacy, civil controversies between the cantons is settled by arbitration; and though the federal arm may be employed to enforce the award, it never is employed, because it never has been found necessary to employ it.

The same may be said of the United Netherlands. Under a similar provision, their civil controversies between their States are settled, and are peaceably settled; and though force may be employed to enforce the decree, it never is employed, because it never has been found necessary to employ it.

In our first, commonly called our old confederation, we had the same provision; and that provision was organized by the old Congress; and though the court appointed for this national object—which was to be appointed, and was appointed, occasionally, and for the case as it occurred, upon application to Congress)—though the court was clothed with no power to enforce its decree, and though no means were provided to enforce it, yet the decree went silently into complete effect. Witness the decree in the case of the controversy between the States of Connecticut and Pennsylvania, and some others, if I rightly recollect.

There is no reason, then, to doubt, as it appears to me, the efficiency of such a law as the bill proposes, to the great object of the constitution, though it only provides the process for enabling the Supreme Court to settle the question of right, and does not provide any process for enforcing the decrees which they may pronounce.

Now consider—I and I call particularly upon those States to consider, who have no present and direct interest in this question—that these controversies are so many sources of discord between the States who have this present and direct interest, which this remedy will quietly and expeditiously extinguish, and without which these sources of discord must remain eternal as the constitution itself, rankling in the bosom of the suffering States, and ranking the more because remediless, and because the keen sense of injustice is to be aggravated to them by the keener sense of hopeless despair. When they adopted the constitution, they surrendered that prerogative of a sovereign State which made them their own judges of their own rights, and their own vindicators of their own rights; and they made the surrender on the pledge, in that constitution, and by that constitution, that those rights should be vindicated by the federal authority. And are they now to be told, and by the Federal Government, too, that this was a piece of mockery played off upon them? that they are bound, but that the Federal Government is not bound? and that the pledge given is not to be redeemed? So it would seem, by the recommendation of the committee who reported the bill; for they recommend its indefinite postponement, which, in other words, is to say that this provision of the constitution ought never to be executed. For they do not say, and will not say, that any thing in the present time forbids it, which will not equally forbid it in all future time. And, if this recommendation is followed, this body also say this provision ought never to be executed.

Now let the Senate consider that this provision of the constitution is not a discretionary trust in the hands of the Government, to be executed or not executed at their discretion, but that the trust is imperative. The constitution says, "the judicial power shall extend to controversies between two or more States." That is the injunction of the constitution upon the Government, its functionary and trustee. To refuse to execute this provision, then, is to disobey this injunction; and you do refuse its execution, if you refuse the process necessary to the execution. For the Supreme Court have no power to provide it; the States have no power to provide it; the common law does not provide it, for the common law knows nothing of a suit by a State against a State, in a confederacy, before the common tribunal of that confederacy; it has, therefore, no forms for such a case. Without an authorized process, the Supreme Court cannot entertain jurisdiction of a suit by a State against a State; and Congress alone can provide it.

Suppose you had the power to obliterate this provision from the constitution, would you propose to do it? or, if proposed, would you consent to do it? Such a proposition, I am confident, would not find a patron in this House, nor a defender in this nation. And yet, if you do refuse to execute this provision, and on the principle that it ought never to be executed, it is blotted out from the constitution; for there is no difference between its remaining a dead letter for ever in the constitution, and its being blotted out for ever from the constitution. Now, where will gentlemen find a justification for destroying a trust put into their hands for execution, and that enjoined by the deed of trust under which they act? I know not; let gentlemen tell me where, if they can.

I beg gentlemen to consider, too, that this provision is not one of doubtful meaning, nor of doubtful intention: on the contrary, it is so direct and explicit that it can neither be misunderstood nor misinterpreted: no commentary can elucidate, no glossary can obscure it: for the plain short scripture is—"The judicial power shall extend to controversies between two or more States." And the intention of the parties is just as manifest as the meaning of the words. It was important to the States having or to have these controversies, to have them settled. It was the intention of the United States, therefore, that they should be settled; and it was the understanding of these States that they would be settled under this provision.

We all mean to be faithful to the constitution; our trust imposes it as an obligation, to which we have superadded the obligation of an oath. Now I ask whether resisting the execution of a provision in the constitution, intended to be executed by one party, and understood and accepted by the other as intended to be executed, is being faithful to the constitution? I put that to the conscience of the Senate.

Again, let me beg gentlemen to consider that this provision is, in fact, a stipulation made by the United States with these States, that they should have these controversies settled by the adjudication of the Supreme Court; a stipulation offered on one side, and accepted on the other, and solemnly ratified by both. Now one of the parties, the party for whom, and with whom, the stipulation is made, calls upon the other to perform this stipulation; he produces his title deed; he reads the covenant in the deed; it is explicit; it is undeniable; he claims its fulfillment; he invokes the faith pledged for its fulfillment. Now I ask you, gentlemen—you, the Senate of the United States—you, the depository of this pledged faith, and the functionary to discharge its obligation, whether this invocation shall be made to you, and made in vain.

If it could be said that no State controversies were now subsisting, it might be said that the execution of this constitutional trust was not now necessary. But this cannot be said. A number of these controversies do subsist, and have long subsisted, and must for ever subsist, without this remedy to determine them. I speak advisedly as to one in particular. The State, one of whose Representatives I have the honor to be in this body, contends that a portion of her territory and jurisdiction, and the resources involved therein, amounting nearly to one-tenth of that territory, is now occupied (she does not say is now usurped, for that she leaves for the competent tribunal to say) by a neighboring State. Long, and long, and long, have they endeavored to settle this controversy by negotiation, but all their efforts have proved fruitless; and always will and must prove fruitless. Finding negotiation hopeless, Rhode Island proposed to settle the controversy by arbitration. She was desirous that some distinguished civilian or civilians should be called in to settle for us what we could not settle for ourselves; but our neighbor declined the proposition. We then proposed an amicable suit to the Supreme Court of the United States, waiving, by agreement, all forms of process, and submitting only the abstract question of right to that tribunal. This, too, was refused. So her case, without this or some similar law, is without remedy, and without hope. If this, too, be refused by Congress, she must submit to her fate; hard as it is, she must submit. But she will think, for so it will be, that the faith of the constitution, pledged to her by the constitution, and trusting to which she accepted the constitution, has been forfeited, and that her confidence in that pledge has been a delusion.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 4, 1830.

THE IMPEACHMENT.

On motion by Mr. TAZEWELL, the Senate resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment, for the trial of James H. Peck, District Judge of Missouri; and the oath prescribed having been administered to the Vice President, and by him to the forty-five Senators following, viz.

Messrs. Adams, Barnard, Barton, Bell, Bibb, Brown, Burnett, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Knight, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Webster, White, Willey, Woodbury—

The Managers appointed by the House of Representatives then appeared at the bar of the Senate; and, having been conducted and seated within the bar, and the usual proclamation to keep silence having been made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, their Chairman, rose, and read the following article of impeachment, which had been agreed to by the House of Representatives, against James H. Peck, District Judge of the United States for the District of Missouri:

Article exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves, and of all the people of the United States, against James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE.

That the said James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, at a term of the said court, holden at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the fourth Monday in December, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, did, under and by virtue of the power and authority vested in the said court, by the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled "An act enabling the claimants to lands within the limits of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved on the twenty-sixth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, render a final decree of the said court in favor of the United States, and against the validity of the claim of the petitioners, in a certain matter or cause depending in the said court, under the said act, and before that time prosecuted in the said court, before the said Judge, by Julie Soulard, widow of Antoine Soulard, and James G. Soulard, Henry G. Soulard, Eliza Soulard, and Benjamin A. Soulard, children and heirs at law of the said Antoine Soulard, petitioners against the United States, praying for the confirmation of their claim, under the said act, to certain lands situated in the said State of Missouri; and the said court did, thereafter, on the thirtieth day of December, in the said year, adjourn to sit again on the third Monday in April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six.

And the said petitioners did, and at the December term of the said court, holden by and before the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, in due form of law, under the said act, appeal against the United States from the judgment and decree so made and entered in the said matter, to the Supreme Court of the United States; of which appeal, so made and taken in the said District Court, the said James H. Peck, Judge of the said court, had then and there full notice. And the said James H. Peck, after the said matter or cause had so been duly appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and on or about the thirtieth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, did cause to be published, in a certain public newspaper, printed at the city of St. Louis, called "The Missouri Republican," a certain communication, prepared by the said James H. Peck, purporting to be the opinion of the said James H. Peck, as Judge of the said court, in the matter or cause aforesaid, and purporting to set forth the reasons of the said James H. Peck, as such Judge, for the said decree; and that Luke Edward Lawless, a citizen of the United States, and an attorney and counsellor at law in the said District Court, and who had been of counsel for the petitioners in the said court, in the matter aforesaid, did, thereafter, and on or about the eighth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, cause to be published in a certain other newspaper, printed at the city of St. Louis, called "The Missouri Advocate and St. Louis Enquirer," a certain article signed "A Citizen," and purporting to contain an exposition of certain errors of doctrine and fact alleged to be contained in the opinion of the said James H. Peck, as before that time so published, which publication by the said Luke Edward Lawless was to the effect following, viz.

"To the Editor:

"SIR: I have read, with the attention which the subject deserves, the opinion of Judge Peck on the claim of the widow and heirs of Antoine Soulard, published in the Republican of the thirtieth ultimo. I observe that, although the Judge has thought proper to decide against the claim, he leaves the grounds of his decree open for further discussion.

"Availing myself, therefore, of this permission, and considering the opinion so published to be a fair subject of examination to every citizen who feels himself interested in, or aggrieved by, its operation, I beg leave to point the attention of the public to some of the principal errors which I think I have discovered in it. In doing so, I shall confine myself to little more than an enumeration of those errors, without entering into any demonstration or developed reasoning on the subject. This would require more space than a newspaper allows, and, besides, is not, as regards most of the points, absolutely necessary.

"Judge Peck, in this opinion, seems to me to have erred in the following assumptions, as well of fact as of doctrine:

"1. That, by the ordinance of 1754, a sub-delegate was prohibited from making a grant in consideration of services rendered or to be rendered.

"2d. That a sub-delegate in Louisiana was not a sub-delegate, as contemplated by the said ordinance.

"3d. That O'Reily's regulations, made in February, 1770, can be considered as demonstrative of the extent of the granting power of either the governor general or the sub-delegates, under the royal order of August, 1790.

"4th. That the royal order of August, 1770, (as recited or referred to in the preamble to the regulations of Morales, of July, 1799) related exclusively to the governor general.

"5th. That the word 'mercedes,' in the ordinance of 1754, which, in the Spanish language, means 'gifts,' can be narrowed, by any thing in that ordinance, or in any other law, to the idea of a grant to an Indian, or a reward to an informer, and much less to a mere sale for money.

"6th. That O'Reily's regulations were in their terms applicable, or ever were in fact applied to, or published in, Upper Louisiana.

"7th. That the regulations of O'Reily have any bearing on the grant to Antoine Soulard, or that such a grant was contemplated by them.

"8th. That the limitation to a square league, of grants to new settlers in Opelousas, Attakapas, and Natchitoches, (in 8th article of O'Reily's regulations) prohibits a larger grant in Upper Louisiana.

"9th. That the regulations of the governor general, Gayoso, dated 9th September, 1797, entitled 'Instructions to be observed for the admission of new settlers,' prohibit, in future, a grant for services, or have the effect of annulling that to Antoine Soulard, which was made in 1796, and not located or surveyed until February, 1804.

"10th. That the complete titles made by Gayoso are not to be referred to as affording the construction made by Gayoso himself, of his own regulations.

"11th. That, although the regulations of Morales were not promulgated as law in Upper Louisiana, the grantee in the principal case was bound by them, inasmuch as he had notice, or must be presumed, 'from the official station which he held,' to have had notice, of their terms.

"12th. That the regulations of Morales 'exclude all belief that any law existed under which a confirmation of the title in question could have been claimed.'

"13th. That the complete titles (produced to the court) made by the governor general, or the intendant general, though based on incomplete titles, not conformable to the regulations of O'Reily, Gayoso, or Morales, afford no inference in favor of the power of the lieutenant governor, from whom these incomplete titles emanated, and must be considered as anomalous exercises of power in favor of individual grantees.

"14th. That the language of Morales himself, in the complete titles issued by him, on concessions made by the lieutenant governor of Upper Louisiana, anterior to the date of his regulations, ought not to be referred to as furnishing the construction which he, Morales, put on his own regulations.

"15th. That the uniform practice of the sub-delegates, or lieutenant governor of Upper Louisiana, from the first establishment of that province to the 10th March, 1804, is to be disregarded as proof of law, usage, or custom, therein.

"16th. That the historical fact, that nineteen-twentieths of the titles to lands in Upper Louisiana were not only incomplete, but not conformable to the regulations of O'Reily, Gayoso, or Morales, at the date of the cession to the United States, affords no inference in favor of the general legality of those titles.

"17th. That the fact, that incomplete concessions, whether floating or located, were, previous to the cession, treated and considered by the Government and population of Louisiana as property, saleable, transferable, and the subject of inheritance and distribution ab intestato, furnishes no inference in favor of those titles, or to their claim to the protection of the treaty of cession, or of the law of nations.

"18th. That the laws of Congress heretofore passed in favor of incomplete titles, furnish no argument or protecting principle in favor of those titles of a precisely similar character, which remain unconfirmed.

"In addition to the above, a number of other errors, consequential on those indicated, might be stated. The Judge's doctrine as to the forfeiture which he contends is inflicted by Morales's regulations, seems to me to be peculiarly pregnant with grievous consequences. I shall, however, not tire the reader with any further enumeration, and shall detain him only to observe, by way of conclusion, that the Judge's recollection of the argument of the counsel for the petitioner, as delivered at the bar, differs materially from what I can remember, who also heard it. In justice to the counsel, I beg to observe, that all that I have now submitted to the public, has been suggested by that argument as spoken, and by the printed report of it, which is even now before me.

"A CITIZEN."

And the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, unmindful of the solemn duties of his station, and that he held the same, by the constitution of the United States, during good behavior only, with intention wrongfully and unjustly to oppress, imprison, and otherwise injure the said Luke Edward Lawless, under color of law, did, thereafter, at a term of the said District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, begun and held at the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the third Monday in April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, arbitrarily, oppressively, and unjustly, and under the further color and pretence that the said Luke Edward Lawless was answerable to the said court for the said publication signed "A Citizen," as for a contempt thereof, institute, in the said court, before him, the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, certain proceedings against the said Luke Edward Lawless, in a summary way, by attachment issued for that purpose by the order of the said James H. Peck, as such Judge, against the person of the said Luke Edward Lawless, touching the said pretended contempt, under and by virtue of which said attachment the said Luke Edward Lawless was, on the twenty-first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, arrested, imprisoned, and brought into the said court, before the said Judge, in the custody of the Marshal of the said State; and the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, did, afterwards, on the same day, under the color and pretences aforesaid, and with the intent aforesaid, in the said court, then and there, unjustly, oppressively, and arbitrarily, order and adjudge that the said Luke Edward Lawless, for the cause aforesaid, should be committed to prison for the period of twenty-four hours, and that he should be suspended from practising as an attorney or counsellor at law in the said District Court for the period of eighteen calendar months from that day, and did then and there further cause the said unjust and oppressive sentence to be carried into execution; and the said Luke Edward Lawless was, under color of the said sentence, and by the order of the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, thereupon suspended from practising as such attorney or counsellor in the said court for the period aforesaid, and immediately committed to the common prison in the said city of St. Louis, to the great disparagement of public justice, the abuse of judicial authority, and to the subversion of the liberties of the people of the United States.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any further articles, or other accusations or impeachment, against the said James H. Peck, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the article herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same, and every part thereof, and to all and every other articles, accusation, or impeachment, which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said James H. Peck may be put to answer the misdemeanors herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be thereupon had and given, as may be agreeable to law and justice.

The VICE PRESIDENT informed the managers that the Senate would take proper order thereon, of which the House of Representatives should have due notice; and they then withdrew.

On motion by Mr. TAZEWELL, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to issue a summons, in the usual form, to James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, to answer a certain article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives on this day; that the said summons be returnable here on Tuesday next the eleventh instant, and be served by the Sergeant-at-Arms, or some person to be deputed by him, at least three days before the return day thereof; and that the Secretary communicate this resolution to the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. TAZEWELL,

The court then adjourned to Tuesday next at 12 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 5, 1830.

THE GRADUATION BILL.

Mr. BENTON called up the bill to graduate the price of the public lands, to make provision for actual settlers, and to cede the refuse lands, upon equitable terms, and for meritorious objects, to the States in which they lie.

Mr. HAYNE said, that viewing this bill as an attempt to relieve the new States from the injurious effects of a system which keeps out of market, and consequently unsettled, all the public lands worth less than one dollar twenty-five cents per acre, he was perfectly willing to give it his support; so far at least as that object was embraced. It has been represented (and, in support of that representation, the reports of the registers and receivers of all the land offices in the United States had been referred to) that vast quantities of those lands have been liable to entry at the minimum prices for a great number of years, and have not been taken up, in consequence of their being worth less than the prices limited by law. This arose not so much from the inferior quality of the whole of the unsold lands, as the small proportion of good land in the tracts offered for sale. Nothing can be more just and proper [said Mr. H.] than that land found not to be worth the prices limited, should be sold for less. This, indeed, is the course which every private proprietor would pursue, and which the United States must pursue, unless this description of lands is to remain for ever unsold. He had no objection, therefore, to making a reasonable reduction in the price of these lands, as proposed, especially as the bill will embrace no lands that have not been for some time in market, liable to entry at one dollar and twenty-five cents, and which have not been taken up at that price.

It appeared to him, however, that, to accomplish this object, it was not necessary to provide for the gradual reduction, year after year, down to twenty-five cents per acre; and he would submit it to the friends of the bill, whether it would not make it more generally acceptable, and more consistent with the object of making early sales of these lands, to stop for the present at one dollar, or at least at seventy-five cents, making a distinction of twenty-five cents in favor of actual settlers. Let the experiment be tried of this reduction, and let us see how the system works before we go further. The object is to sell the land at a fair price, to fix a just and reasonable valuation, and to know whether one dollar or seventy-five cents is the proper amount; the experiment must be fairly tried. To try the sense of the Senate on this point, he should move to amend the bill by striking out the two latter resolutions, so as to fix the amounts at which the lands were to be offered for sale at one dollar and seventy-five cents, and twenty-five cents less to actual settlers. I would also [said Mr. H.] strike out the section which provides for donations to the States, five years hence, of the unsold lands, for the purpose of education and internal improvement. Without entering into the questions presented by a proposition to make donations for such subjects, it would be sufficient, for the present, to say, that a section of this kind was wholly unnecessary, and would present serious difficulties in the way of many gentlemen who might otherwise support the bill.

Mr. H. concluded, by moving to strike out the sixth section, providing for donations to the States, and, also, the tenth and eleventh lines, providing for a reduction, in two years, to fifty cents, and to twenty-five cents the year afterwards; which motions were agreed to without objection.

Mr. BENTON said, it was undoubtedly true, as stated by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE] that the clauses proposed to be struck out could not operate for several years, even if retained and passed; and it was highly probable, as suggested by him, that the rejection of these clauses may secure the passage of the others, which are of more immediate necessity, and will answer all the purposes of the bill for the present. Mr. B. therefore, would not oppose any objection to striking them out, seeing that the intention was friendly to the main object of the bill, and a part of the purposes of introducing them had been accomplished. One object of the graduation bill was to exhibit a plan for the full, complete, and final disposition of the public lands; and, to answer this purpose, it was necessary to draw the bill in all its details; but it would be sufficient, and answer every purpose to the purchasers of the public lands, to have the different reductions of price made at different times.

Mr. WOODBURY observed, that he had waited for such amendments to be adopted in the bill as would enable him, consistently with his notions of the constitution and the equal interests of the old States in the public lands, to vote for a measure so much desired by the new States as the present bill. But as such amendments had not yet been made, he should take the liberty to submit two or three for the consideration of the Senate. He would not enter now, at large, into his views about the public lands, or the policy of the proposed measure. Those views, as to the former, had been fully given on a former occasion, during this session. He would first move to strike out the whole of the fourth section; not that he could cherish a single feeling of unkindness to the objects of its bounty, but because he did not believe in our constitutional power to make mere donations of the domain of the Union to individuals, however indigent or meritorious. The reasons for this opinion it was unnecessary to repeat.

[The motion was then put, and carried.]

Mr. WOODBURY next moved to strike out the second sum, named as a graduation price in the first section.

This, he said, would leave the rate at which these lands should be sold to ordinary purchasers one dollar per acre.

Considering the circumstances, that all the lands within the purview of this bill had already been offered at public auction, and had failed to bring one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and that many of them, for many years, had since been held ready for entry at private sale, without finding purchasers who were willing even to pick and purchase any of them at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, he deemed it a fair presumption, that one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre exceeded their just value. He was, therefore, willing to reduce the price of this kind of lands to one dollar. Such a reduction would be useful to the Union at large, by rendering a speedy sale probable, and thus increasing the revenue; while, at the same time, it would be exercising only a rightful liberality to the capitalists, or to the enterprising yeomanry of the country, West or East, North or South, who might wish to settle their sons on these lands, but who ought not to be required to pay for them more than a fair price.

He further remarked, in the discussion on this motion, that much misapprehension seemed to exist abroad, if not in this body, about the real value of the lands to be affected by this bill. Although the quantity was large, yet it consisted not of our whole public domain, nor of all that had been surveyed, nor even of one-half that had been surveyed and not sold, but merely of the refuse of our sales ever since the organization of the Government. A patch here, and a morass there; a mountain in one place, and a barren in another; and these fragments scattered over six or seven States of the Union, and, up to this time, refused to be purchased by any one at the present price.

Besides these circumstances to indicate that their average value was less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, he had before him reports from the different land districts made in 1827-'8, by which it appeared that of the whole eighty millions of acres of these unsaleable and detached parcels, less than one million in the Southwestern States was first rate land, and less than five millions in the Northwestern States; that of the residue, about one-half, or nearly forty millions of acres, was considered unfit for cultivation. The average value in all the Southwestern States was under twenty-five cents per acre; and, in all the Northwestern States, it equalled a dollar in only four districts, and was less than seventy-five cents in all but six districts. In many of those districts in the Northwest, where it was most valuable, this land had been offered for sale from six to twenty years and upwards; and for a less time, from two to ten years, at the Southwest, where its value was less, and when no probability existed that much of what was left would ever be sold as high as one dollar per acre.

But considerable portions of this description of land in the Northwest, he believed, could be sold at one dollar per acre, and, at least, that it was worth the experiment to offer it for purchasers at a dollar before we reduced the price to seventy-five cents. He did not, however, hesitate to say, that he would hereafter agree to seventy-five cents, or even a lower sum, when all the lands worth over those sums had been disposed of. All he wanted was to act justly by the old States, in not taking from them any of the lands under their just value, and, at the same time, to act justly by the purchasers, whether in the new or old States, by not exacting exorbitant prices, and not thus driving them from purchasing here at all, into Mexico, Canada, or elsewhere. He would, therefore, fix the reduced price at first to one dollar, and not go lower till the lands worth one dollar had been sold.

He was against a graduation of seventy-five cents the second year for another reason. No body could wink out of sight, that, if this graduation was retained, the lands worth a dollar would not probably be purchased till the second year, as they could then be had for seventy-five cents. Twenty-five per cent. gain, for a single year's delay, would be a temptation not easily resisted.

While he was willing to fix the price at the true value of the best lands unsold, he was influenced by a still further consideration from going below that, either by graduation or at the first starting post. He thought it impolitic to hold out any extraordinary inducement for new settlers to purchase second, third, or fourth rate lands, by reducing the price below the actual value of those best fitted for cultivation. When poorer lands, in particular districts, accommodated old settlers, it might be proper to allow them to be sold at a fair price; but it was much better, as a general rule, in political economy, both in a public view, and in reference to the durable interests of new settlers, that labor should be expended on first rate soils, while we have such soils, rather than on those of an inferior quality.

For this, as well as other reasons, which had been referred to, on former occasions by himself, and by other gentlemen to-day, he was willing, likewise, to relieve the present actual settlers. They had, by our present system, been driven to cultivate poor land, in order that they might not be in danger of expulsion from it. This land they might keep at a reduced price, proportioned to its reduced value; and to prevent this course, in some degree, hereafter, he would allow the future purchasers for actual settlement to enter at first a quarter section of the best lands yet unsold, and within the purview of the bill, at seventy-five cents per acre. Coming from any quarter of the Union, in search of a freehold and of subsistence, they would expend their hard toil on better soils, and the treasury, by getting the pay at once, instead of waiting for years without principal or interest, would realize a larger sum than to permit them, as is now the practice, to enter their lands, at some future period, at the present minimum price.

He had the misfortune to differ with his colleague in relation to the proper policy due to these actual settlers. But he consoled himself with the reflection that his own views were more in conformity with the previous and liberal policy of our Government on this subject; and while it worked no inequality or injustice to the old States as joint proprietors of the land, it tended to the happiness, and improvement, and security of many with whom most of us were connected by the strongest ties of society. But he thought fifty cents per acre was too low a price for even the actual settlers, if they selected, as they now ought to, the best lands included in the bill. He wished to keep up a due proportion between the purchasers to sell again or to speculate, and an actual settler, and should, therefore, move to strike that graduation from the bill if the present motion prevailed. That would leave twenty-five cents difference, which was all he could think just.

The motion prevailed.

He afterwards moved to strike out the second graduation as to actual settlers, and to alter the phraseology in other parts, to conform to the amendments already made; which motion succeeded.

Mr. BENTON was himself under the deep and full conviction that the bill would do best with this clause retained; but he could not dissemble that it came under the same course of reasoning which applied to the motion to strike out the two lower prices. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. McKINLEY] was correct in his opinion of the difference of the operation of the act in the two great divisions of the West. The face of the country was essentially different in the Northwest and Southwest. In the former, the great body of the land was intermediate in its quality, between best and worst; the principal part of it was mixed with good and bad, constituting what is called second rate; and for this section of the West the price of one dollar to non-settlers, and seventy-five cents to actual settlers, would find a great deal of land to operate on, and for which it would be a fair price. But not so in the Southwest. There the land was chiefly divided into two qualities, best and worst, river bottoms of great fertility, or pine woods of extreme sterility; the good, worth more than a dollar, and already sold; and the bad scarcely worth anything. In such a country there would be but little land for the one dollar clause to operate on. Still, if the motion prevailed, and the seventy-five cents clause was struck out of the first section, the same price was intended to be left untouched in the second section for the benefit of actual settlers. This would still do well; for the mass of the purchasers are now actual settlers; and all these will be able to get one quarter section (one hundred and sixty acres) for seventy-five cents per acre. If they wanted more, they must pay a dollar for it. A quarter section will make a good home for a man of small, or middling property, and the great body of the West consists of those descriptions. The bill will, therefore, accommodate the great body of the people, at one dollar for general purchasers, and seventy-five cents per acre to actual settlers. It will do well in the Northwest at those prices; it will be of some little benefit to the Southwest, and, eventually, may be the means of doing full justice to that section of the Union; for the passage of the bill, with the two first clauses, will lead to the adoption of the lower rates—the fifty and twenty-five cent clauses, which suit the inferior qualities of the bad land there.

Mr. McKINLEY moved to amend the bill, by striking out seventy-five cents per acre to actual settlers, and inserting fifty cents per acre in lieu thereof.

Mr. McKINLEY said that the bill, without the amendment which he had just offered, could not benefit his constituents much, as the most of the lands in Alabama, which had not sold for the minimum price at the public sales, was of very inferior quality. He would vote for the bill, however, if the amendment did not prevail, because he believed it would benefit the poorer class of population in the other new States, if it failed to effect that object in Alabama; and his policy was to make as many freeholders as possible in every part of the United States. He considered the policy heretofore pursued in relation to the inferior qualities of public lands, essentially wrong. The best lands have not, for several years past, brought but little more than one dollar and a quarter an acre at the public sales; and how can it be expected that land of inferior quality, which is passed over at those sales, and has remained subject to entry for many years, should now sell for as much as the best land in the market? The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BELL] says, there are seventy millions of acres of this refuse land now in the market, and the reason why it does not sell is, because there are not people to purchase it; that great quantities of lands are offered for sale every year; and that just as much is sold as there are people willing to purchase. The last proposition is true, as far as it applied to the choice lands offered at public sale, but entirely erroneous when applied to the refuse lands.

It has been shown that there are about one hundred and forty-four thousand white inhabitants in the new States, who pay taxes, and are not freeholders. A great portion of these are now residing on this refuse land, and many of them would become purchasers if the land was offered at its value. Of the seventy millions of acres of refuse lands, there is not one-third fit for cultivation, and not one-fourth now worth fifty cents an acre. If this one-fourth were divided among those citizens who are not freeholders, in the new States alone, they would have about one hundred acres each. Put this land at fifty cents an acre to actual settlers, and you will make freeholders of nearly the whole of them. For there are a great number of men who would pay forty dollars for eighty acres of land, who never can pay one hundred dollars, the present price; and, if they could, they would not take the refuse land.

Sir, look for a moment at the effect of the present system. A great portion of these refuse lands have been in the market for more than twenty-five years, and still remain unsold. Suppose they had been sold twenty-five years ago, at fifty cents an acre, what would be the state of the account now at the Treasury? Simple interest on the principal, at six per cent., would yield, with the principal, one dollar and a quarter an acre, the price you now ask for them. During the whole of that time, you have been paying six per cent. interest on the public debt; which the proceeds of these lands was intended to aid in paying, and which the United States promised to apply to that object. How the United States have performed this promise, will be seen in the sequel. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BELL] admits that this refuse land cannot be sold for fifty years to come, at the present price, for want of purchasers. How will the account stand at the end of seventy-five years? At the end of that period, twenty-eight cents an acre, and the interest upon it, would yield, at the Treasury, one dollar and twenty-six cents an acre. It ought to be reflected, too, that payment of money into the Treasury from this source, while the interest is running on the public debt, operates so as to entitle every dollar of principal paid in, to compound, instead of simple interest; because the interest on the public debt is paid semi-annually. If compound interest were calculated, the principal sum would be doubled in less than eleven years; fifty cents an acre would pay a dollar and a quarter in less than fourteen years, and twenty-five cents would pay a dollar and a quarter in less than twenty years. If this estimate be correct, the United States would now be in a better condition, in a pecuniary point of view, than they really are, if they had sold the whole of this refuse land twenty years ago, at twenty-five cents an acre.

But, sir, these are not all the national benefits which would have resulted to the United States from this course of policy; thousands of individuals who are now tenants in the old States, or squatters on the public lands in the new States, would long since have been respectable and prosperous freeholders of lands which, by a narrow and illiberal policy, have been held up at a price greatly above their intrinsic value.

But the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BELL] says these settlers upon the public lands are intruders, violators of the laws, and trespassers against the United States; and, therefore, entitled to less favor than any other class of purchasers. I beg leave [said Mr. McK.] to differ with the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, upon all of these points. In the first place, the act of Congress of 1807 was intended to protect the United States against the adverse possession of those who claimed titles to the lands ceded to the United States by Georgia and France, upon titles derived under either of those powers, previous to the cessions, until the titles could be adjudicated; and the power granted to the President by that act never has been exerted, except for those purposes. I therefore say, that those who have settled upon the public lands, not claiming title adversely to the United States, are not violators of law, nor trespassers. And I say further, sir, that they are meritorious individuals, because they have been the pioneers to all the new settlements in the West and Southwest. They have penetrated the forest, cultivated a portion of the lands, built cabins, and afforded facilities to those who wished to purchase, to explore the lands before the sales, and to obtain supplies of provisions for the first year after purchasing. The enhanced value given to the land thus improved and settled by these unfortunate people, has been put into the public Treasury. The lands were sold from under them, which, but for the improvements they had made, and the facilities they had afforded for settling the country, would not have sold for one-half the price they brought, and, in many instances, would not have sold at all; they have been deprived of, and the United States have greatly profited by, their labor. After suffering the hardships, fatigue, and privations incident to the settlement of a new country, and being unable to purchase the lands they had thus rendered valuable, what have they done? Precisely what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McLEAN] has told you. They have sought out some tract of this refuse land, which, having a little spot upon it fit for cultivation, and which the limited improvements necessary for the support of a family would not, in their estimation, tempt any one to give a dollar and a quarter an acre for it; and there they are now living, and constantly afraid to extend their comforts, lest they tempt some individual to enter the land, and turn them adrift again.

Sir, this is a true history of these unfortunate individuals who have been stigmatized as violators of the law—as trespassers, against the United States, and who, it has been said, ought to be punished rather than rewarded. It is true, sir, they are poor; and, if that be a crime, the proper way to punish them is to hold up the land at such a price that they cannot purchase it. But let gentlemen recollect that they inflict this punishment at the expense of the Treasury of the United States. For, if the calculation of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BELL] be correct, when he says that all the public lands belonging to the United States cannot be sold in a century at one dollar and a quarter an acre, leaving the refuse lands unsold, I presume he means, and all those who are unable to give a dollar and a quarter an acre, without land, then it would be well to sit down, and deliberately calculate the number of individuals who will probably be without land at that period, and what sum per acre, counting interest upon it for a century, would, at the end of that time, give a dollar and a quarter an acre for these lands, and how many of them would have been able to have paid the principal sum.

In addition to this, it would be well to calculate how much the United States would have gained by the taxes upon this unsettled land; how much the national wealth and prosperity would have been increased by the improved condition of their citizens, and their increased wealth and multiplied subjects of taxation. A few figures made upon these subjects might aid the statesman in coming to a just conclusion upon this subject. I hope, sir, the amendment will be adopted, and those unfortunate citizens be provided for, and all others contemplated by this bill.

Mr. BENTON spoke with great ardor and zeal in favor of letting the settlers have their homes at fifty cents an acre. He dwelt upon the meritorious character of their claims and their services. He said, many of these settlers had been ten, fifteen, and twenty years in possession of their little farms. They had sought for broken and inferior tracts, in order to enjoy in security their little homes, free from the cupidity of speculators, to whom such small spots, as stated by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. McKINLEY] would not be an object, but the improvements gave them value; and for the sake of these improvements there were many ungenerous persons who would enter over the head of the settler, and take the home and the labor from a poor man, or a widow and her children. Mr. B. said that these settlers had made improvements which cost them the labor of many years; that parents had buried their children, wives had buried their husbands, and husbands their wives, on these little spots; that their affections, as well as their interest, bound them to them; that no good man would take away their little homes, and no bad one ought to be allowed to do it. Mr. B. argued that all such settlers ought to have donations, and that this section was intended at all events to give them a preference. Fifty cents difference in the price would give a decided preference; it would operate partly as a donation, by giving up a part of the price. If, then, the price stood at fifty cents to the settlers, they would be entirely safe from speculators. If the fifty cent clause was rejected, and the price to settlers stood at seventy-five cents, the preference to the settler would only be twenty-five cents in the acre; an advantage surely, and one for which he would be grateful, but not sufficient in all instances to secure him against ungenerous speculators.

Mr. BELL said, he was opposed to any innovation upon the present system of selling the public lands. They are the common property of all the States, and should be disposed of only with a view to the common benefit of all, and not for the advantage of the inhabitants of the new States exclusively. They are sold by the existing laws at a price so low, that it is within the reach of every man possessed of a common share of industry and prudence, to acquire a quantity sufficient to enable him to support a family by agricultural labor. I am opposed to any reduction of the price of these lands; but if they must be reduced, I hope it will not be below the price of one dollar per acre, the sum proposed by my colleague as the price to common purchasers. I am still more opposed to that part of his amendment which proposes to fix the price to actual settlers at seventy-five cents per acre. There is no good reason why we should make a discrimination in their favor.

These settlers have taken possession of the public lands, in direct violation of the laws of the United States, and without any pretext of title. They are intruders—mere trespassers, who have selected and seized upon the best and most eligible of the public lands. Can we be justified in giving them the best lands at the lowest price, and thus reward them for a violation of the laws? If you make a discrimination of twenty-five or fifty per cent. in favor of actual settlers, you will sell no land but to actual settlers. No purchaser will buy land at one dollar per acre, when he can obtain the same land at seventy-five cents per acre, by making an actual settlement upon it. If the immense tracts of land in the market, beyond the actual wants of purchasers, should be offered for sale at the reduced prices proposed by this bill, or even by the amendment offered, no man will purchase on speculation, or with the expectation of selling to actual settlers at a profit. Such speculations have nearly ceased to be made under the existing laws, and none would be made at the reduced prices proposed by this bill.

The actual operation of this bill, as proposed to be amended, will inevitably reduce the price of all the public lands from one dollar and twenty-five cents to seventy-five cents per acre. We have more than seventy millions of acres of public lands already in the market, upon which this bill will operate.

Are we aware of the great reduction of the annual revenue from the sales of the public lands which must result from the passage of this law? The people of the old States are aware of the value of the public lands as a source of revenue, to be appropriated for the common benefit, and for their relief from the burthens of taxation; and they will require us to render to them a reason for unnecessarily lessening or bartering it away for any object or motive unconnected with the common and general interest.

We have been told that these lands cannot now be sold, because they are held at a price above their value. This is not the true cause why more extensive sales of these lands are not made at present prices. That cause is to be found in the immense quantities which have been thrown into the market beyond the actual demand for cultivation. The price of land, as of every other description of property, depends upon the quantity in market, compared with the number of purchasers. When a surplus, beyond what is required by purchasers, is thrown into market, a reduction of price is the inevitable effect; and that reduction will be in exact proportion to the amount of such surplus. This has been the unsound policy of this Government in relation to her public lands. We have put seventy millions of acres of the public lands into the market, when the average annual sales are only one million of acres.

We have a quantity of land in the market sufficient to supply the wants of purchasers for the next fifty years; and we are daily increasing this quantity. The friends of this bill have mistaken the source of the evil of which they complain, if such evil exist. The new States have really increased rapidly in wealth and population. That they have not increased more rapidly, has not been occasioned by a high price of the public lands, but from a deficiency of purchasers at any price. The increase of the quantity of lands thrown into the market has gone far beyond the increase of our population. If the bill could create men to become purchasers, the object expected from it might be attained; but if not, the lands would not be sold, even if offered at twenty-five cents per acre.

Mr. CLAYTON moved the indefinite postponement of the bill. I am not [said he] hostile to a judicious and equitable graduation or reduction of the prices of these lands, according to their value. It is true that, of the seventy millions of acres which will be offered for sale under the provisions of this bill, a part is worth much less than the minimum price established by law, while a part is worth more than that price. As the bill now stands, all the lands which shall not be disposed of in June next will be offered to purchasers at one dollar per acre, and to actual settlers at seventy-five cents per acre. This bill never offered a graduation of these prices on any equitable principle. It never did offer lands to purchasers with a just discrimination between good and bad land. Before the bill, as it originally stood, met its death blow from its own friends, it was, in substance, a proposition to give away the public domain—not to sell it by a fair graduation of prices, distinguishing between lands of the best and of inferior qualities. The proposition now contained in it, is not absolutely to give away these lands, but so to reduce the prices, that such as remain unsold at the present minimum shall be now offered—all at the same price—without the slightest reference to the quality or value of different parcels, in different districts of country.

There are some districts where large quantities of land, not worth fifty cents per acre, will be offered for sale under the provisions of this bill, at one dollar per acre, and when the actual settler cannot buy them for less than seventy-five cents. There are others, where those lands, which are the best in the country, will be offered at the same prices. Where the land is not worth the price proposed by the bill, it must remain unsold; or, if it be sold, is it just to extort from the purchaser the same price for it which you ask for the finest tracts you own? The great danger, however, is, that should this bill pass, it will cause the destruction of the whole land system of this Government, and deprive this nation of a revenue exceeding a million of dollars per annum. I will not repeat the objections which I formerly urged against the original proposition as it stood before the amendments this day adopted had so materially changed its nature. That proposition had failed; but, after the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY] had consoled its friends for its defeat, by informing them, in the hearing of the Senate, that the present project would be a good starting post, from which they might move hereafter in the business of reducing these prices year after year, I am bound to consider this measure as the entering wedge to the same system of universal donation which they have just been compelled to abandon, and liable, therefore, to the same objections. The injustice of so great a reduction of these prices, in its effect on former purchasers, is manifest. Congress, while they reduced the minimum in 1821, virtually gave a pledge to those purchasers, that the value of their property should not be destroyed by underselling them, as this bill now proposes, at a sum nearly fifty per cent. below the prices paid by them.

The kind of graduation which I am disposed to adopt, is that which is founded on an honest discrimination between the value of different quantities of land. We can get information from our land offices, to enable us to make that discrimination. We can ascertain what the land is intrinsically worth; and, so far from entertaining a hostile feeling to the West, when I have that information I will go as far as others, who make much greater professions of friendship to that section of the country, in offering these lands at a price most liberal to the purchaser, in order to augment their population and the number of freeholders, on whose increase we have been told so much depends. But I am unwilling to make a man in one district pay one dollar per acre for land worth not half the value of a tract in another district, which another man may purchase for the same price. I view the bill as unjust to the citizens of those districts where the land is poor. In my judgment, we ought to put it in their power also, by an honest graduation of these prices, to buy the public land for sums not exceeding their actual value; but, under the operation of this bill, those who have settled on the best lands of the country will pay but seventy-five cents per acre, while the citizen of Ohio, for example, who may reside near a tract which has been thirty years in market, and which could not hitherto be sold because of its inferior quality, cannot purchase what is worth only fifty cents, for less than seventy-five cents per acre. This is no graduation. It is an unequal distribution of public favors; and its injustice, in diminishing the value of all the lands in the country, will cause a loss, amounting, in the aggregate, to millions among the citizens of the new States, as well as a great falling off in the public revenue. He concluded, by urging some objections to another principle of the bill, which, as he considered, under pretence of favoring actual settlers, held out great inducements to trespassers upon the whole public domain, and contravened the established policy of the Government, which had always been to protect these lands from waste and pillage.

[Mr. KANE replied. After some conversation between Mr. CLAYTON and Mr. McKINLEY, Mr. C. agreed to suspend his motion, to enable Mr. McKINLEY to move an amendment, restricting the operation of the bill to lands which had been in market before June, 1827.]

Mr. CLAYTON said that he would now renew his motion, which had been waived for the time, to enable the friends of this bill to make it as free from objections as they could. He would not debate with the honorable member from Illinois, whether it was good policy to encourage trespassers on the public lands, by offering bounties for the purpose. In reference to that, he would only say, that from the earliest history of this Government there appeared a continued series of acts of the Legislature, and proclamations of the President, against the commission of waste on the public property. Nor did he desire to be understood as opposing the system which gave preference in the purchase of settled lands to the actual settler at a fair price. He did not design to protract the debate by further discussing with the gentleman from Missouri, who advocated this bill, [Mr. BEXFORD] whether the inequality of value of these lands in different districts was not a sufficient objection to the passage of this bill, which offered all the lands at one price. But he again urged the impolicy and injustice of underselling the former purchasers, who had paid full value for their lands, having bought them at one dollar and twenty-five cents, and much of them at two dollars per acre; and who, after having paid taxes on them for many years, would now find millions of acres of equal value, in market around them, at seventy-five cents per acre. He urged that the price at which the lands were to be offered to settlers, was to be regarded as the true minimum established by the bill, as most of the lands would be taken up under the pretence of settlement. He observed, also, that the bill could not pass the other House, if it were now acted on in the Senate; and the effect of its passage here would be to increase an illusion on this subject, which had already spread too far.

Mr. BENTON objected most decidedly to the indefinite postponement. The idea that there was not time to act upon the bill in the other House, was entirely fallacious. The subject was well understood there. The two Houses of Congress, for many sessions, had proceeded, with equal steps, in this matter. The graduation bill had been reported in each, at the commencement of each session, for years past. As it now stood, the provisions were so few, brief, plain, and simple, that every person could understand them at one reading; and the subject was so familiar to the mind, that every member will have his opinion made up as soon as he understood them. The provisions were now reduced to the single clauses which reduced the price of the land, which had been offered for three years and upwards at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and could find no purchaser at that price, to one dollar to non-settlers, and seventy-five cents per acre to settlers. This is the sum total of the bill; and surely it would not take five minutes for any member of either House to make up his mind for or against it.

Mr. B. concluded, by asking for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. KANE expressed his gratification at the course adopted by the honorable gentleman from Delaware. His motion for indefinite postponement, [said Mr. K.] is made for the avowed purpose of deciding the fate of the bill. This course, on every account, is more acceptable than that suggested by the Senator from Maine, of laying it upon the table, for the purpose of printing the bill as amended. The session is near its close, and delay will be fatal. Where is the necessity for printing? Is it difficult to comprehend the amendments? The whole length and breadth of the bill as it now stands, its entire substance, consists in a simple provision, which reduces the price of the public lands to one dollar an acre, with an exception favorable to the actual settler, who is permitted to purchase at seventy-five cents. Every body can understand this; and every Senator has a view of the whole ground upon which he is about to act. Why, then, delay for printing? Next in importance to the measure itself, is an early decision upon it—a decision at this very session of Congress. Year after year have the people of the new States, in all the forms which can give expression to their deep and solemn convictions of its necessity, presented the subject before you. Over and over again has the matter been seriously and fully discussed. The varying complexions of things here, has for years alternately aroused their hopes, and alarmed their fears. But to this session of Congress have they looked with an intensity of expectation, which none but their own Representatives can fully appreciate, for decisive action. Let the fate of the bill then be what it may, a speedy decision is not an unreasonable request. There are considerations of interest, of general and national interest, too, which recommend despatch. Those who have the means of purchasing land at the present price, have delayed the purchase, on account of the expectations so long held forth from this chamber, and they will delay until you decide. Those unable to purchase at high prices, have been led to believe (a belief, too, founded upon the most reasonable grounds) that such reductions would be made as to enable them to buy, and as should bring the acquisition of a freehold within their competency. To one or other of these descriptions of men belong the one hundred and forty thousand tax-paying individuals who are not freeholders, and who reside, as we are officially informed, in the new States and territories. Each of these has the determination to become a landholder, according to his wants and his ability. A decision, then, and especially a favorable decision, is of some consequence to the public revenue. I [said Mr. K.] am unwilling again to go home, and feel compelled to give doubtful answers to the thousand inquiries which will be made of me regarding the prospect of reducing the price of the public land. I wish to understand the true feeling of Congress about it, and be enabled to let my constituents know what that feeling is.

Some objections have been made to the passage of the amended bill, by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON] which require an answer. He objects, first, because a uniform price is fixed upon lands of various quality; secondly, on account of what I consider its best feature, the discrimination in favor of the actual settler. The bill, as first reported, was free from the first objection, certainly in form it was free from it; for it contained a graduation of price to the quality to be fixed, in the only mode which appears to me at all practicable. So far as it was in the power of the friends of the bill to retain that feature, their duty had been performed to the best of their ability. The Senate have just decided against it, and to that decision we most respectfully submit. It may be satisfactory to gentlemen, however, to know, that that decision has only re-affirmed the principles of our land system, as it has ever existed, and as it now exists. By that system, whenever, in the judgment of the President, the public interest requires it, a district of surveyed land, upon long and general notice first given, is offered for sale by public auction, and is sold for the highest price which can be obtained, but not for a less sum than a legal and arbitrary minimum. Lands thus offered, and not sold, are subject to entry at that minimum, without regard to quality. All the lands to which this bill applies, have already undergone this operation. If there be any thing wrong, then, in this uniformity of price, in the judgment of the gentleman from Delaware, he must do something more than indefinitely postpone this bill, to correct the error. He must repeal the old, long continued, and existing law, which fixes a uniform minimum upon all sorts of lands. Postponing this bill will leave matters just where they stand; and the passage of it does not alter the objectionable feature, nor increase the evil. Surely, then, sir, if this be in itself an objection, this is not the time to urge it; for, upon this occasion, it cannot accomplish any other object than to destroy this bill, without curing the evil which constitutes the objection. I pass on to another topic. A discrimination in favor of the actual settlers is made, and that is a cause of complaint, particularly with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BELL.] He calls these settlers trespassers and squatters. In his opinion, they have violated the law in settling upon the land, and are, therefore, entitled to no favor. It is true, sir, that a law was passed in 1807, to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States. The reason of that enactment has been often stated on this floor, and is fully established by the uniform conduct of the Government with regard to its execution. It was intended to accomplish a particular purpose. A case had arisen, or was about to arise, in New Orleans, which gave origin to that law. No attempt has ever been made by the Executive of the United States to enforce, generally, the provisions of that act; and Congress have expressed, in repeated instances, a determination to prevent its enforcement. The very next year after that law passed, settlements made in violation of its letter were legalized, and pre-emptions were secured to these men who are called trespassers. More than twenty laws have since passed, granting, in different forms, pre-emption rights to settlers. Wherever the public property is about to be seriously invaded, and some great injury to be inflicted upon the public interests by settlers, this law ought, and no doubt will, be put in force against these aggressors. But a sound view of the true interests of the people of this country forbids a further execution of it—so says the conduct of every President, and every Congress from that time to this. People unable to buy land settle upon public land, upon the faith of all the past practice of the Government. They feel security in its justice, which promises to them the same forbearance and favor which have ever been extended to others. I have, sir, another answer to this suggestion, which I think emphatic. We have this session, without much opposition, passed a bill through this body, extending a right of pre-emption to every man in the United States settled upon public land. If these settlers are trespassers now, they are not likely long to remain so. The principle of a pre-emption bill is a principle of discrimination in favor of the actual settler. It is no new thing. The truth, sir, is, that these trespassers, as they are called, have always been the favorites of the Government, and will continue to be so, so long as sagacity, good sense, and patriotism shall prevail in its councils. Need I go into particulars to explain this sentiment? Does not every man know and see that the value of the public property is enhanced by cultivation and improvement; that the strength of the community, moral and physical, is augmented by every encouragement given to agriculture; that the security of your frontiers is promoted by a settled population upon them; that the heavy evils of poor rates and pauperism are avoided by a liberal disposition of the soil; that a general spirit of industry and independence is diffused by it; and that the strength, and vigor, and health of the whole country is improved? Permit me, sir, to ask the gentleman what he would do with these settlers? Remember, they are numerous. Shall the marshal, accompanied by the military strength of the Government, be directed to remove these men, women, children, and all? Where will he send them to? Into the Indian country, to the Mexican States, or to Canada? These neighbors of Mexico and Canada will be glad to receive them, and give them land into the bargain. They are not powerful enough yet, and you will add greatly to their strength; and if it be desirable to make our neighbors more powerful than ourselves, the plan will answer that object in due course of time. But I dismiss this part of the subject with a single remark: Such a policy is short sighted, injurious to the best interests of the whole country, inhuman, and impossible of execution.

The competition created by this bill between the settler and speculator must hasten sales, and add to the revenue. The former will use all his exertions to save his improvements from the grasp of the latter, and the latter will be anxious to secure lands before the more sacred claims of the cultivator shall attach. There is something noble in the law which suspends the rapacity of a speculator, by assigning privileges to honest industry. The mandate of the Government, which compels the jobber to pay at a rate of discrimination, before he possesses himself of the labor and comforts of another, conveys a just rebuke. Mr. K. said, he had so frequently given his views at large upon the subject, that he felt it wrong to occupy more time. He could not conclude, however, without bringing to the view of the Senate, once more, the fact, that the receipts into the treasury, from the sales of lands, had in no one year been equal to a moderate interest upon the sum which the lands, all things considered, had cost the Government. If revenue was the object, some change must be made. Throughout, it had been a losing concern. What so likely to increase receipts as a reduction of price? and what more consoling to the benevolent mind, than the consideration that increased receipts will be accompanied by the increased comforts of one hundred and forty thousand freemen?

Mr. BENTON replied to the suggestions of Mr. WEN-DEN, and stated that if the bill was to be confined in its application to lands which had been seven or eight years in market, it would have very little operation except in the State of Ohio. In that State, all the lands (with a very small exception) had been in market at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for eight years or upwards; but in Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and the Territories of Michigan, Arkansas, and Florida, the mass of the lands have come into market since that time, and would be excluded from the operation of the bill. Mr. B. referred to official tables to show this fact, and went on to say that a motion had been made in the Senate two years ago, when the graduation bill was under consideration, to introduce this principle; and that it was then rejected by a decisive vote of the Senate, because it was shown that its operation would be partial and unequal. Mr. B. was entirely friendly to the State of Ohio, and had given stronger proofs than words, that he would promote her prosperity. The bill, as it stood, would be highly advantageous to her, for she had fifty-seven thousand non-freeholders, as was proved by the return of the marshal of the State; and she had upwards of six millions of acres of public land which had been offered at one dollar and twenty-five cents for many years without finding purchasers, and which were reported by the registers and receivers to be chiefly second and third rate land, and generally worth less than one dollar per acre. The bill, therefore, could not but be highly advantageous to Ohio, as it stood. It would enable many of these fifty-seven thousand non-freeholders to become freeholders; it would give the State revenue from the taxes, and increased strength and wealth from increased cultivation.

Mr. JOHNSTON hoped the bill would not be postponed at this stage; it had been fully discussed, and was perfectly understood. Most of the objectionable and most of the beneficial provisions of the bill had been stricken out; it contained but two propositions, simple and distinct. He hoped the direct vote of the Senate would be taken upon them.

Mr. J. said, it appeared to him there was a general concurrence of opinion upon two principles; first, that the price of the public lands ought to be reduced or graduated to the quality; and, secondly, that the actual settler ought to have the lands at a less price than the minimum selling price. He thought there was a great approximation of opinion upon these two points. The reason and expediency of the measures seemed obvious. But the difficulty which presented itself was in the detail—the mode of effecting the object. It is not pretended that an acre of first rate land, or a tract composed of a reasonable proportion of that quality, is not worth the present price, but for that reason the inferior qualities are worthless. It is due to justice, to individuals, and to the States having large quantities of second and third rate land, to reduce the price to the relative value of the lands, so as to give them an equal opportunity of settling their lands and increasing their population. You have sold twenty millions of acres of the first quality, and most advantageously situated. Those States having these lands have been preferred, and were first sold and settled, while the other States have been, and must be, postponed until lands rise in value, from the increased demand arising from increased population. The price ought to be graduated to the quality, so as to put the States upon a fair equality, by bringing their lands into the market upon terms of equal competition, and so as to give every class of people lands suited to their wants and their condition, upon fair relative terms. The great difficulty is not in the recognition of the truth of these principles, but how to effect the object. The idea of classing them into three qualities suggests itself as the most natural mode; and this will probably be finally adopted and carried into effect, but it will require time and reflection to devise a plan which will be safe, practicable, and fully comprehended and approved by the people of the United States. Such a system may be carried into effect, to the great benefit of the people and of the States. The great object of all, however, seems to be to provide a moderate and inducing price to the actual settler, who is in general poor; just commencing the world; who is the pioneer that goes forth to subdue the wilderness, to open and prepare the way for the march of civilization; who encounters all the hardships, and performs all the labor of extending your settlements and improving the country.

Sir, the people must have lands, and you must let them have them at such price as they can pay; if they cannot buy, they must settle on the public lands, where they have no inducement to labor, and where they will be always anxious until they obtain the land, or they will be an idle, dependant tenantry, unfit to exercise the rights of freemen.

The payment of the public debt will now allow Congress, in making a disposition of the lands for the common benefit, and not merely with a view to the revenue, to take a more enlarged view of the public interest. What is the view which the statesman, looking to the whole country, and all our interests, to the happiness of the people, and the power of the Government, would take? To the million of dollars a year, drawn reluctantly from the poorest class of people? or would he look to the number of independent freeholders, the cultivation of the soil, the improving condition of the country, and the rise of flourishing States, and the addition of new republics to the Union? How would a great man, (Napoleon, for example,) presiding over this great country, and looking only to power, view this question? Would he look to the millions of dollars? No; but to the extent of territory, the population, the productions, the trade, the commerce, the capital, the capacity to pay taxes, and the means of increasing all these national objects. He would look to the real elements of power, the number of people, the amount of productive labor, the mass of wealth. But we have other and higher objects—to make citizens, and render them happy and prosperous.

The system heretofore pursued illustrates, under all disadvantages, the effect on the people and the Government. In forty years the wilderness of the West has been converted into a cultivated country; eight States have been formed, with four millions of people, paying eight millions of revenue a year, and the whole rapidly advancing. In this short space we have founded and established an empire out of a population of four millions.

You have, at the same time, drawn forty millions of dollars from this region, which has distressed the people, drawn from them the circulating medium, deprived the inhabitants of the very means they wanted to cultivate and improve the lands, and thereby greatly retarded the growth of the country, as well as individual prosperity.

More enlightened views are now taken of this interest. We begin to see the wisdom of inducing our people to settle as soon as they arrive at manhood; which is done by giving them the lands on easy, moderate terms; the less price and the greater inducement, the better. The new generation, arriving at manhood, go forth into the new States. The first object is independence, and a home, and a habitation, which is obtained as soon as they acquire land. They then begin the work of life; they become citizens, they marry; and, while they subdue the earth, also multiply and replenish it. As soon as the land produces fruit, it goes into your trade, furnishes the elements for navigation and commerce, and these furnish revenue; and this revenue is the shape in which the people should make their returns for the bounty of the Government.

The West now pay you eight times as much, in the form of duties, as you obtain a year for the lands. They pay you, in yearly revenue, four times as much as the interest of the whole capital drawn from the sales of the public lands, and this disproportion will be annually increasing; but how greatly you would have increased the production, trade, commerce, and revenue, if you had left the forty millions, as active capital, in the hands of these industrious citizens; how far you would have thrown the country forward!

I believe the propriety of giving the settler lands at a reduced price, is acknowledged; and I have no doubt a general law would pass to give them the land, wherever they choose to settle, at fifty cents.

It is the object of this bill partially to effect these two objects, of reducing and graduating the price. It is founded on the idea that those lands, having been offered for sale, and not having been bought, are not worth the price, and, therefore, in justice, ought to be reduced one dollar, and that the actual settler ought to have the lands cheaper than the purchaser.

The first objection is to the quantity of land embraced in the bill, which is about seventy or eighty millions of acres. But it must be remembered that this is the remains of thirty years' sales; that twenty millions have been selected out, and that a large quantity of this land is unfit for cultivation—a very large proportion of third rate lands that no one would pay the taxes for; and of the remainder, where there is some good land, the cultivable part will be a small proportion to the whole. A very large quantity of land has been surveyed; a much greater quantity than necessary, through mismanagement, neglect, or fraud. They have surveyed large quantities of pine woods, prairie, and other inferior qualities, as a matter of speculation—lands which can never sell, because unsuited to habitation and cultivation. But that has been corrected within a few years, and will be better guarded in future.

The second objection is, that it will have an effect upon the value of property in the Western country.

I do not think this small reduction can have any sensible effect, or that the public price has much effect on the price of estates. Farms in the Western country vary from two to thirty dollars an acre, and depend upon the quality of the soil, local advantages, and proximity to market or navigation; but in a great measure upon the real value of the improvements. Farms may, in general, be purchased for the value of the labor expended on them. Those estates are, in general, bought by men of property, and never by that class of settlers who go into the woods to buy their farms, to improve by their own labor, because they have not the means to purchase the improved lands; and it is their poverty and necessity that compels them to encounter the hardships of settling a new place, and in a new country. The price of lands can never rise much above the value of the improvements, although they will often fall below; while we have an immense quantity of land that must remain in the market for a great number of years. There is an intrinsic value in the production and in the comfort and enjoyment of a cultivated farm in an improved country, which will not be materially changed by the reduction proposed.

But, sir, this bill is only a partial provision, and not adequate to the exigency of the case. It is a matter of justice to the people, and to the States, to class these lands, and graduate the quality and the price, so that all the States may have a fair opportunity of settling, and all the people of the different conditions of life an opportunity of procuring the kind of land that suits them, at a proper and just price. There is a large class of people that prefer the middle quality of land; the oak, hickory, and pine lands, because it is more healthy, and better adapted to their habits and mode of life.

It is a partial remedy for the settler, because it is limited to the lands already offered for sale, which ought to have been extended to all lands that have been or may be surveyed; and the price to the actual settler, who shall reside permanently on the land, and make improvements, ought to be reduced to fifty cents.

Officers, &c. of the Revolution—Virginia line.

[SENATE.]

Sir, it is in the hope of seeing these two objects obtained that I vote for this bill, the benefit of which will not be felt in Louisiana. The lands offered for sale there would not bring the minimum price, because they are inferior lands, and will not be sold or settled until the price is graduated to the quality of the soil.

Sir, I hope this bill will not be postponed.

Mr. BARTON said, the bill was no longer "a bill to graduate the price of the public lands, to make donations to actual settlers, and to cede the refuse to the States in which they lie." The motions of the Senators from South Carolina and New Hampshire [Messrs. HAYNE and WOODBURY] had divested it of that character, and reduced it to a mere proposition to reduce the price of the lands that had been heretofore offered for sale, and give a preference to actual settlers. The bill, as it now read, [Mr. B. said] was nothing but his own project, offered the Senate in 1828 as a substitute for the graduation bill, strenuously opposed by the friends of the graduation bill. Nay, it was less favorable than the substitute he had then offered; for his amendment proposed this same reduction of price to one dollar, and also to make a small donation to actual settlers upon five years' inhabitation and cultivation. That amendment was, therefore, more favorable to the actual settler than the bill as now amended; but he was content with the preference here given to actual settlers.

Mr. B. said, he had then declared on this floor that there would be no difficulty in reducing the price of public lands if the other scheme were out of the way. If the matter had been left to the Committee on Public Lands, as it should have been without interference from other quarters, the situation of the emigrants to our new lands would at this day have been better than it now is.

He would vote, he said, against the motion to postpone the bill, not because it now embraced his own project of reducing the price; but because he did not consider revenue from the lands as the greatest object to be attained in disposing of them. The facilities to our citizens to become freeholders was a greater object. The inequality in the operation of the law, mentioned by the gentleman from Delaware, was unavoidable. Theoretical equality was unattainable in practice. When land was reduced, in 1820, from two dollars to one and a quarter, a like inequality existed. The elder State of Ohio had paid two dollars for most of her land; while the younger ones, that bought since that reduction, paid but one dollar twenty-five cents. So, in this reduction, should it be passed, a like inequality would be found unavoidable.

He had little hope [he said] that this measure, at this late period of the session, could be got through the other House. It ought to have been introduced and acted on sooner. It ought to have been accepted when he offered it in 1828, when it was practicable.

This matter ought to have been left to the control of the Committee on the Public Lands, who never were in favor of the impracticable project held forth in the now abandoned graduation bill. As the abandonment of that bill, however, freed him from the shackles of those instructions he had heretofore mentioned to the Senate, he would vote for this, his own old measure, hopeless as it now was at this late period of the session; hoping, that if it did not pass at this session, it, or some more judicious plan of reduction, would be adopted at the next, as to those lands that had been long in market more especially. His great object was to keep the lands out of the hands of monopolists, and use them rather as a fund to make our citizens freeholders, than as a source of revenue.

The question was then put on Mr. CLAYTON'S motion to postpone indefinitely, and decided in the negative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Bell, Burnet, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Knight, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Tyler, Willey—20.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Barton, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Noble, Rowan, Ruggles, Tazewell, Troup, White, Woodbury—24.

THURSDAY, MAY 6, 1830.

[The Senate was this day chiefly occupied in the discussion of bills of a private nature.]

FRIDAY, MAY 7, 1830.

OFFICERS, &c. OF THE REVOLUTION—VIRGINIA LINE.

The bill for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia State line in the war of the Revolution was taken up; when

Mr. TYLER said, that he felt it to be his duty briefly to explain to the Senate the grounds on which he rested his support to this bill. He would premise this explanation, by stating that Virginia asked nothing of the liberality or the bounty of this Government. He should make no appeal to its gratitude in favor of those whose descendants were interested in the passage of the measure now before the Senate. If they had no claim either in justice or equity; if, in plainer words, they were not entitled to obtain, provided this Government was suable, a decree or judgment in a court of law or equity, for that which is now demanded for them, he desired that the bill might be rejected. The General Assembly of the State, one of whose representatives he was on that floor, had adopted certain resolves upon this subject, not in the character of a suppliant for Congressional bounty, but from a desire to fulfil her engagements solemnly entered into with men who had evinced their fidelity to her and the cause of American independence, by long and faithful service. That State would scorn to be a suppliant to a Government which has no power to bestow charity, or to exercise a spirit of munificence. He had premised thus much, not only in justice to his State, but to himself.

He then entered into an exposition of the grounds on which the bill rested. The State of Virginia, by sundry legislative resolves, commencing at an early period of the Revolutionary war, had held out inducements to her citizens to enter into the military service. Amongst the most prominent of which was, the promise of land bounties to her officers and soldiers, as well upon the State as continental establishment. She was then the mistress of an extensive region; and if she had continued to retain her sovereignty over it, no murmur of complaint would ever have been uttered against her by those who fought not her battles only, but those of the confederacy. She drew no discrimination between her State and continental troops. None in truth existed. The only difference between them was, a mere difference as to the Government by whom they were to be paid. The service of the State troops was as trying and as perilous as that of the continentals. The same fields were embued with their blood; and when victory perched on the banner of the one, it alighted also on those of the other. In fulfilment of her plighted faith, a resolution was adopted by her Legislature, on the 19th of December, 1778, appropriating all the lands lying between Green river, the Cumberland mountain, the North Carolina line, the Tennessee and Ohio rivers, exclusively to the purpose of satisfying the claims to military bounty; and, in 1781, she added the lands lying south of Tennessee river, and between the Ohio and North Carolina line and the Mississippi. He recited these facts to show distinctly to the Senate that she had ever considered the claims of both her lines as inseparable and undistinguishable—a fact which it was necessary to bear faithfully in mind.

In 1781, she adopted the policy of ceding to the United States her extensive territory northwest of the river Ohio, which had been conquered exclusively by her own arms; and, on the second day of January, passed a resolution authorizing her delegates in Congress to make the cession on certain conditions. Here [Mr. T. said] the difficulty appertaining to this subject had commenced—a difficulty which had heretofore prevented her from doing full and ample justice to her gallant sons. By the resolution authorizing the cession, (he would call it the power of attorney under which her agents acted,) her reservation of lands appertained as well to the benefit of her State as continental troops. This was the only authority with which she ever invested any one, in relation to the lands ceded.

Here Mr. T. read from a copy of the original resolution the following words: "That in case the quantity of good lands on the southeast side of the Ohio, upon the waters of the Cumberland river, and between the Green river and the Tennessee river, which have been reserved by law for the Virginia troops upon continental establishment, and upon her own State establishment, should (for the reasons therein stated) prove insufficient for their legal bounties, the deficiency shall be made up to the said troops in good land, to be laid off between the rivers Scioto and the Little Miami, on the north side of the river Ohio," &c. &c. No one will doubt that her agents were bound by their positive letters of instructions; and that if the deed varied in any essential particular from the terms of the authority by which, and by which alone, it was executed, waiving the question whether the deed might not be entirely avoided thereby, a court of equity would correct such variation, and supply all defects. This was the fact in regard to this transaction. The deed assigned recited the whole of the conditions expressed in the resolution, totidem verbis, but omitted all mention of the State troops. How could this have arisen? The Legislature of Virginia gave no authority to any one, other than that which he had just mentioned. She had never contemplated a measure of justice for her continentals, which she did not, at the same time, deal out to her State troops. There was but one mode of accounting for it. There must have been an omission, either in the copy recited, or in the recital of the copy. No other rational explanation could be given. He had, in fact, if his memory did not most egregiously deceive him, seen a certificate to that effect, from Mr. Monroe, who assisted in executing the deed. He had not been able, recently, to lay his hand on that document, nor did he esteem it material. The narrative into which he had entered served fully to establish it. In fact, the journals of Congress, of 1783, showed how the mistake had originated. A committee was appointed to consider of the terms of cession, and to report thereon; and they undertook, in their report, to set forth, in the very words of each, the various conditions on which Virginia had proposed to make the cession. The fifth condition was that appertaining to this subject; and in the recital of that, the error was committed which ran into the deed afterwards. That committee had the resolution of the General Assembly before them; and it is not to be credited, for a moment, that they intentionally recited falsely its terms. It is much more creditable and just towards that committee to ascribe the omission to a mere oversight. If he was right in this, it followed that the State troops had a full right to enter upon the reserved lands northwest of the river Ohio, in order to locate their warrants. The lands reserved in Kentucky had proved insufficient, from two causes. First, in running the division line between Kentucky and Tennessee, the territory of Tennessee had encroached considerably on those reserved lands; and, secondly, a portion of that tract of country was inhabited by the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, up to 1819, when a treaty was negotiated with them; whereupon, Kentucky claimed exclusive jurisdiction over the country, and forbade the location of the military warrants. In the mean time, the State troops were not, and have not, at any time, been permitted to avail themselves of the reservation on the northwest of the river Ohio, and now the permission to do so would come too late.

The continental troops have taken up all the undisputed land, of any value, contained in that reservation; and, by reason of a mistake in running the first boundary line, the United States have sold a large portion of what properly fell within that reservation. Thus it is that many of the State troops have never been satisfied in their just demands. Not by any fault on the part of Virginia, but from accidental circumstances, over which she had no control. There remains now within the reserved territory no lands which would remunerate the labor and expense of location. The Government itself has sold a large portion of them; and, so far as a deficiency is produced from that cause, no one can doubt but that the United States are bound to make it good. But if the reservation, the interposition of this Government apart, had proved deficient, this Government ought to make it good. It paid down no valuable consideration for that extensive domain. It received it as a gratuity. If the reservation had exceeded the demands of the officers and soldiers, all the surplus would have belonged to this Government. Surely the rule should work both ways. If you would take the surplus, if any, you ought to supply the deficiencies, if any.

But these claims rested upon another ground, which he considered equally strong. The contract with the soldier created on his behalf a lien on all the unlocated lands held by Virginia at the time of entering into that contract. The whole Northwestern Territory was subject to his claim. Virginia could not make void that lien. This Government, therefore, must have been subject to it, since it was prior, in point of time, to the deed of cession. In a court of justice, in a case between individuals, he apprehended that but one judgment could be pronounced in this matter; and he trusted that the Senate would not hesitate in fulfilling the demands of justice. No deep concern need be felt as to the amount of these unsatisfied warrants. He was in possession of a document which enabled him to arrive with something like accuracy at the quantity of land. It was a statement of the Register of the Land Office, from which the warrants had issued, furnished in 1822. There issued to the State troops, prior to the year 1792, warrants, amounting in all to one million one hundred and forty thousand five hundred and eighty-three and two-thirds acres: and between 1792 and 1828, others amounting to thirty-seven thousand four hundred and nine and one-third acres; making in all one million one hundred and seventy-seven thousand nine hundred and ninety-three acres. Of these, one million thirty-one thousand one hundred and thirty-four and two-thirds acres were located; leaving of unsatisfied warrants one hundred and forty-six thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight and one-third acres. Some small addition has, no doubt, been made since; but when it is seen that, in thirty years, warrants covering but thirty-seven thousand four hundred and nine and one-third acres have been issued, it may justly be inferred that those which have been issued since are of inconsiderable amount. When it is recollected that the Congress, but two years ago, appropriated one million of acres in aid of the Ohio canal, and is engaged almost daily in making extensive grants to other objects, he could not persuade himself that it would hesitate to pass this bill, in fulfilment of such a purpose as that which it proposed to accomplish.

Mr. KNIGHT said, he rose to obtain information on the subject under consideration, and to ask the Senator from Virginia whether a reservation was made in the deed of cession in favor of the State troops, and whether they were placed on a footing with the Virginia continental troops, in regard to the land or location of the military warrants. He understood no reservation was made in the deed of cession in favor of the State troops. Then why should be given to the State troops of Virginia more than is given to other State troops? Other States had troops who were also found valiantly contending by the side of the continental troops, and who have applied here for aid, in the form of pensions, out of the common fund, and they have been refused. They have been told to go to the States for compensation; that they were State troops, and, therefore, the State must pay them.

Sir, it was stated that a reservation of lands was made for the troops of Virginia, west of the Ohio, between the Miami and Scioto, and that the United States had interposed, and sold a part of the land reserved. It is conceived that the United States could not sell these lands to the prejudice of these claims. If Virginia made the reservation, she will hold them notwithstanding these sales. The Virginia State troops have no right, either in justice or equity, to more than the troops of other States; and if the gentleman would consent to amend the bill, so as to include all the State troops, he would vote for it; but to give these lands to the Virginia troops alone, would be doing more than the Senate had been willing to do for others. Why should be given to the State troops of Virginia that which is withheld from others?

Sir, it is said that it was intended to have included the reservation for the State troops as well as those on the continental line. Was it so done by the deed of cession? It is not pretended. No, sir, it was not. Did no other States make cessions to this Government but Virginia? Sir, the United States ceded what they had; they ceded revenue, Virginia ceded lands. The revenue, it is believed, will amount to as much as these lands; and if the revenue be given back, compensation will not be asked for the State troops. We then should be able to reward them ourselves; but to give to Virginia troops alone, is doing more than is required, in my opinion. I have not looked at the deed of cession, nor the conditions on which the cession was made; but I have understood that the continental troops only were provided for by that instrument.

Mr. KANE moved to amend the bill, in the seventh line, by inserting, between the words "any" and "unappropriated" the word "unsettled." [The effect of the amendment was intended to restrict the locations of Virginia land warrants to public lands unappropriated and unsettled; which amendment was agreed to.]

Messrs. NOBLE and HENDRICKS opposed the location of these land warrants in Indiana; not because of any hostility to the principles of the bill—those they did not question—but they objected to their location in Indiana, in consequence of the difficulties which grew out of a former similar bill, for the relief of the "Canadian volunteers." They feared that similar dissatisfaction and confusion would arise under the provisions of the present bill; and would, therefore, move that it be amended by striking out "Indiana."

Mr. KANE then said, that so far from its being an objection to him that any of these locations should be made in his own State, he was decidedly in favor of them. He believed that, in expressing his own sentiments, he did those of his constituents, whose interests would be promoted by emigration to the State.

Mr. BENTON said that the persons who were interested in these claims lived in different States, some of them in Missouri; and he had letters requesting him to get leave to locate in that State. He had no objection to it. He would be willing that the whole quantity should be located in Missouri. It would increase the settlement and cultivation of the State, and augment the number of taxpayers. These were desirable things in a new State. Even a non-resident proprietor was a more profitable landholder to the State than the Federal Government; for such proprietors paid taxes, which the Federal Government did not.

He should make no motion to amend the bill by enlarging the sphere for the location of the warrants; he left it to the Senators from Virginia, who had charge of the bill, to conduct it as they pleased. He would vote for it in any shape, either confined to the territory which Virginia formerly ceded to the Federal Government, or extended to the whole body of the public lands. Upon the United States he conceived the obligation to be the same, to yield land for the satisfaction of the warrants, whether it was requested in one place or in another. To the holders of the warrants, who were now the children and grandchildren of the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, and who were dispersed through many States, it would be more convenient to have leave to locate in other States besides those mentioned in the bill. Doubtless we shall have applications next winter, if the bill passes as drawn, for leave to locate elsewhere, and I shall be for granting it. The only reason that the Senators from Virginia have given for confining the locations to the land which Virginia formerly owned, is the difference between strict right and equity; they contend for a strict right to locate on the old Northwestern Territory; and, on this there seems to be reason; but it is the same to the Federal Government to pay out of any portion of her lands.

Messrs. TAZEWEIL and BURNET severally opposed the motion of Mr. HENDRICKS; which, on the question being taken, was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Barnard, Barton, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Burnet, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hayne, Holmes, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Rowan, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Webster, White, Willey, Woodbury—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Hendricks, Knight, Noble, Rugles—4.

THE GRADUATION BILL.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, the graduation bill was taken up, yeas 22, noes 18; and after, the blanks in the fourth section were filled with twenty five cents and fifty cents.

Mr. FOOT moved to refer the bill to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with instructions to report at the next session of Congress the quantity of land in each district, which has been offered for sale and remains unsold; the length of time the same has been in market, and subject to entry at private sale at the minimum price; the quantity and value of the land, and the prospects of settlement; the number of land offices in which no sales have been made during the last, or previous years; and what will be the effect of this bill upon the present land system, and upon the revenue arising from the sales of public lands. He said, we are told by almost every Senator from the Western States that we do not understand this subject. Sir, we have asked information, and it has been refused. Senators express great surprise and astonishment that we should even ask information. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] when, at the close of his speech, on the resolution instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire and report on this subject, he moved its indefinite postponement, probably was not aware of the fact, that every member of this committee resided in those States in which the public lands are located, and that their mouths were sealed up by instructions from their own Legislatures! and that no report could be expected from them, without instructions from the Senate! This motion has been pronounced extraordinary. Sir, it is surely not more extraordinary than the course adopted by the Senators who opposed the resolution for inquiry, and the debate which followed. Mr. F. said, that while he held a seat in the Senate, he should take the liberty of deciding for himself as to the propriety of his course in relation to the interests of his own State and the whole Union, within the rules of the Senate. Since the resolution for inquiry had been so strongly opposed, he had examined the subject as far as his time would permit; but could not go through the voluminous land laws embracing 1,000 pages or more. But he had found one provision in the act of 24th April, 1820, which had not been noticed by any of the Senators, either on this bill or the resolution, and which was sufficient to prevent him from voting for the bill in its present shape. Mr. F. read from the third section: "But no lands shall be sold, either at public or private sale, at a less sum than one dollar twenty-five cents per acre." Here the Government has pledged its faith to the purchaser under the system of cash sales—that these lands shall not be sold at a less price, to the injury of the purchaser. He was not prepared to say whether this pledge would embrace lands in market previous to the act of 1820. But they certainly did embrace all lands since brought into market. He wished to ascertain the quantity in market previous to the passage of that act, and its quality, and what provisions might be properly made for the disposition of the lands which had been long in market for the benefit of the actual settler. This bill furnished no system. It only reduced all lands in market prior to 1827 to one dollar to purchasers, and seventy-five cents to settlers; and we had no information on which we could calculate the effects, either upon the revenue or the land system. This was his object in the motion—not from motives of hostility to the West. Some of his nearest friends resided in the West.

Mr. WOODBURY said, it was obvious to the Senate, from what took place at the former reading of this bill, that his position in relation to it was very peculiar.

This position made the remarks of gentlemen from the East against the measure bear so directly on him personally, and on the solitary vote from that quarter, his sense of public duty had required him to make, as to furnish, he hoped, a sufficient apology for a few seconds, a reply to the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.]

The motion now under consideration, for a reference, and consequently a defeat of the bill the present session, is professed to be grounded on the want of information as to the real value of the lands within the purview of its provisions; and the member from Massachusetts seems to support the motion on the hypothesis that there is no evidence now before the Senate, to show these lands to be of an inferior quality to those which have already been sold, at the price of one dollar twenty-five cents per acre.

It gave him pleasure to find that the second section, making a discrimination in price favorable to the actual settlers, was thought judicious; and, therefore, he should only attempt to recal to the recollection of the Senate those circumstances which were now in their possession, and which, to his mind, furnished plenary proof that these lands were inferior in quality, and ought to be sold at a reduced price.

He should not go over the detail of a former day's debate, but state, generally, that the lands had all been offered at public auction, and a purchase refused of those remaining. They had since been picked over and culled at private sale, from three to thirty years, and nobody had been found willing to buy the refuse left, at one dollar twenty-five cents. Did not these facts alone warrant a presumption that the lands thus left were less valuable than those which had been taken? Could any inference be more fair or legitimate? But, beside this, we had already had the full and accurate statements of the land officers, which this motion appeared to suppose were not before us; we already had, and, on the second reading of the bill, it would be remembered, he read those statements on a number of points, as they had been laboriously condensed into a tabular form by one of the friends of the bill. From them it appeared, by persons most competent to judge, that the average value of all these lands was not only low at one dollar per acre, but that in only five or six districts were they worth seventy-five cents per acre. How then could any person argue, with these returns before them, that there was no evidence of the inferior quality of these lands, or that they were not worth over one dollar per acre?

Another singular circumstance in these returns was, that the lands which had been the longest in the market, say from eight to twenty years, and which the gentleman from Massachusetts thought might be less valuable, and should be put lower than those which had been offered a shorter time, were, in truth, the most valuable of the whole.

If a discrimination was made at all, it should be against them; because they were situated in the oldest States at the Northwest in smaller parcels, and, though of inferior quality, were enhanced in value by the improvements in their neighborhood, and by the utility of them as appendages to the farms of old settlers. But only a single district of all those was appraised at an average value, over a dollar per acre, while the great mass of the lands embraced in this bill was appraised as low as, if not lower, than fifty cents per acre.

Gentlemen could examine these official statements in detail; and it would be found, that they not only rendered the motion for a reference unnecessary, but they contained decisive testimony in support of the fair presumption of common sense, that when large tracts of land had for years been offered for sale, both in public and private, in large or small quantities, at one dollar twenty-five cents per acre, and many millions of acres picked out and purchased, the residue must be of inferior quality.

On such proof, he thought the bill a just measure, and would frankly avow, that after all the lands worth a dollar per acre had been sold in conformity to its provisions, he should not hesitate, in equal satisfactory testimony, to support a reduction of the price of the remaining refuse tracts to what might be proved to be their fair value.

This would be right, as regards the interests of all. He made no claims for it, as peculiarly liberal, but should never shrink from advocating what he believed to be right.

Mr. WEBSTER supported Mr. FOOT'S motion in a speech of considerable length, to which Mr. KANE replied.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, that the proposition now before the Senate was to refer the bill to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for a report, which it would require much time to make. It was well known that that officer, for many weeks past, had been unable to attend to the duties of his office, and that this direction of the bill would be its certain postponement for the present session. He appealed to the magnanimity of the Senate, on the unfairness of such a course, and hoped that the Senate would not indirectly defeat a bill which was most certainly favored by a majority of the body. The information wished for was in possession of the Senate, and had been referred to in progress of the debate. The Commissioner of the General Land Office could have no other infer-mation, and could do no more than refer to it on our files, or, perhaps, throw it into a more condensed form. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WENSTER] seems to be favorable to the principles of this bill, but the details do not please him. He believes that lands of inferior quality ought to be diminished in price; but seems unwilling to admit, that having been long in market, and remaining unsold, is evidence of inferior or bad quality. Why, sir, if we wait till we entirely agree on the details of bills, we can never legislate; we may adjourn and go home. When did the Senate, or even a majority of the Senate, agree on the details of any bill? All we can expect is, to agree on the principle of such bills as this. The details are less important. The details of this bill, perhaps, please not a single member. They do not please me. The bill is not what I think it ought to be, but I shall vote for it, as the best which can at present be done. Because it contains two important principles—that of reducing the price on lands which have been three years and more in market, without purchasers, to one dollar per acre, and that of giving advantages to actual settlers. I shall vote for it, because it goes further than any provision heretofore enacted, in putting the public lands on easy terms, into the hands of the poor—into the hands of the emigrating classes of the old States, and of the agricultural portions of the community in general. This is the proper destination of the public lands. By so appropriating them, we do the greatest good, induce the greatest degree of happiness and national prosperity, with the means placed at our disposal. The Senator from Massachusetts would go further than the bill; but yet he cannot vote for this bill.

Mr. H. said, that he, too, would go further than this bill; and it was his purpose to have moved an amendment to it. He had one prepared; an amendment proposing that lands which had been twenty years in market should be sold at fifty cents per acre. But, after all the lower minimims of the bill had been stricken out, and the proposition of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. McKINLEY] to reduce to fifty cents per acre, in favor of actual settlers, had also been rejected, he saw it was useless to offer any further amendment. He regretted, at the time of it, the rejection of the second minimum, that in the descending scale; but now believed that that rejection was fortunate, because the bill had yet as much weight as it could get along with. It was [said Mr. H.] a proposition to which all would agree, that lands of inferior quality ought not to be kept in market at the same price as the best lands.

The districts of country, for instance, bordering on the Ohio river, were more rough, and of worse quality, than lands further back. In the State he had the honor to represent, a large portion of these lands had been in market from twenty to thirty years. These lands were still held at the same price as the best lands in the country; and the consequence was, that the country remote from the river was more densely settled than many portions of it near the river.

It had been stated, in the progress of this debate, [said Mr. H.] that lands remaining a long time in market, unsold, was no evidence of bad quality; but of the fact that there were not purchasers, that there was too much of the article for the demand. But surely the opinion, that the surplus population of this country requires no more of the public lands than have heretofore been sold, cannot be correct. Who could look abroad in the community, without seeing thousands, and tens of thousands, who would better their condition, by abandoning their present pursuits, and becoming cultivators of the soil? The people of this and every country would betake themselves to agriculture, just in proportion to the means within their power of engaging in it; for that, more than any other, was the occupation to which man was naturally inclined. Then let the public domain be put more certainly within the power of the poor, and we would see thousands taking up the line of march to the new States, who had not before thought of it; and this state of things would not only better the condition of those who go, but of those who stay in the old States: for, to those who stay, industry would have the more sure and liberal reward, as the hands that were engaged in it should be diminished in numbers. It was the duty of the Government so to manage its affairs, as to increase, in the greatest degree, the happiness of the people: and, connected with the public lands, this could best be done, by increasing the means of becoming freeholders to those who are already in the country; increasing facility to the emigrating classes of the old States; to the sons of industrious farmers and mechanics of the old States; men of industry and enterprise, whose sphere of action was too much confined in the old States, who have not capital to become farmers, or manufacturers, or merchants, there—such men as have energy enough to change country and climate, and to enter upon new theatres of life. It is to such as these, more than any other, both of the old States and of the new, that the public lands of right belong. They promise to make the best possible use of them.

In this view of the subject, [said Mr. H.] I feel surprised that Senators from the old States should hesitate about supporting this bill. It is in favor of your constituents, gentlemen, as well as the people of the new States, that this bill provides; and perhaps in a much greater degree in your favor than in ours. The great mass of settlers which this bill invites, must come from the old States. In this view, the interests of the old States and those of the new are precisely the same. It can never be the policy of the Government to chain the citizen to his paternal country and soil, in the dread of transferring political power west of the mountains. The great error is, in viewing the old States and the new as having separate and distinct interests in this bill; and in looking at the subject in a pecuniary point of view, instead of that which a paternal bosom feels for the welfare, and happiness, and prosperity of its offspring.

Let, sir, the emigrating classes of the old States, and those who are identified with them by the ties of consanguinity and affection, once take a right view of this question, and all will be right. It will then be seen that the just views of the new States, in reference to the public lands, are not appreciated by the Representatives of the old States, because by them not well understood, or, if understood, that they are kept in the back ground by the natural prejudices of the old States—prejudices in favor of wealth and political power; honest prejudices, entertained by the most enlightened and the best of men. This subject seems right in the old States; and the young men of those States would, with one voice, declare in favor of the policy of the West. Every one of the community, not fettered by property—not to the land of his birth, would accord in declaring in favor of an asylum in the West, to be procured on the easiest terms, for the surplus population of the East and the South. Then there would be a union of opinion in our favor; and in this state of public sentiment, their Representatives would unite with us, in preparing, in the new States, homes and firesides for such portion of their population as can never expect to enjoy these inestimable blessings in the land of their fathers.

Mr. BENTON rose to say, that all the information possessed to be called for by the resolution was already in possession of the Senate, obtained by it long since, and printed by its order; and that any reference that should now be made of the bill, by sending it to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in search of information, would be to send it from the place where the information was, and to the place where it was not. He considered the motion of reference as a motion to get rid of the bill altogether, and that not in the usual way, by a direct and responsible vote, but in a most unusual and extraordinary mode. He hoped the Senate, by a decisive vote, would discountenance that mode of proceeding, and bring the bill to its issue in an open, fair, parliamentary way, by a direct vote upon its passage. The bill was now at the very last stage; it was ready for the very last—for the yeas and nays on its final passage. Its friends are ready, and willing, to risk its fate; and its enemies should let them have fair play and decisive action. Mr. B. remarked upon the length of time which the bill had been depending, the fulness of the discussions which had heretofore taken place, and the complete knowledge which every Senator must have of the subject in 1824. He had first moved the subject in a bill containing nearly similar provisions to the graduation bill as now amended. The first bill provided for the reduction of the price of public lands, after five years' exposure to sale, to a minimum of fifty cents per acre, and a denation to actual settlers out of the land which would not sell for fifty cents. That bill was condemned in toto by the land committee; and its chairman,* in a verbal report which he was directed to make, censured the whole plan as premature and improper, and stated that he was instructed to move its indefinite postponement. After this decisive condemnation of the plan of reducing the price of the unsold and unsaleable lands, and making donations to actual settlers, the graduation plan was adopted, being copied from the land laws of the State of Tennessee, where the system of graduated prices had been tried, and worked well. The plan had been submitted to the Western States and Territories, and met their approbation; it had been repeatedly discussed in the Senate, and very nearly adopted by it. The amendment now made retained its two first clauses and distinguishing characteristic; they retained the one dollar price to non-settlers, and the seventy-five cents price to settlers. The remaining clauses, struck out, could not be used at present, even if retained, and the bill should pass. They could only come into operation several years hence, and before that time they can be adopted. Their rejection, at present, is a postponement to obviate the objections of some gentlemen, and does not prevent their adoption at a future day, if the people desire it, and Congress should be convinced of its justice. If the bill should pass as amended, there will be three prices for the public lands, instead of one price, as at present. The first price will be for the new lands, and will be one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. The second price will be for the old lands, which have been exposed both to public auction and afterwards to private sale, for three years and upwards, and will be one dollar per acre to non-settlers. The third price will be for actual settlers, at seventy-five cents per acre, and will be limited to the old lands; and restricted to the quantity of one quarter section. This would be doing something for the people; it would be a great deal, and would command the thanks and benedictions of ten States and Territories. It would present a just graduation of prices as far as it went, and would establish the obvious distinction between old and new lands, the picked and the unpicked districts, which the nature of things requires, and would also make the discrimination between actual settlers and speculators, which all profess to admire, but which our laws have never yet recognised.

Mr. B. read a letter from a gentleman in Maine, to show the terms on which that State and Massachusetts were selling their public land, which Massachusetts had not given up when Virginia and other States gave up theirs, and proved by the letter that the prices which they sold for were far below the prices in the graduation bill, and yet that speculators could not buy, even at their low rates, without being ruined. The letter said, "The average price of land by the township, meaning townships unsettled, and not particularly valuable for timber, is from fifteen to sixty cents per acre." "About thirty years ago, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts sold to the late William Bingham two and a half millions of acres at ten cents, (I believe,) and his estate will never be able to obtain the interest of the capital, and the expenses of management."

Mr. B. adverted to the advertisement which he had read some days ago, fixing the minimum prices of many districts of the public lands in Maine at twenty and twenty-five cents per acre, and to the fact that these were new lands, never before in market, and offered on credits of one, two, and three years at these low prices, and drew the inference that the graduation, as it originally stood, and much more since its amendment, had gone too high instead of too low in its prices; for it demanded more for refuse lands which had been picked many years under the laws of the United States; and some of them, as in Missouri, Illinois, Arkansas, Louisiana, Florida, and part of Mississippi, for fifty and a hundred years under the British, French, and Spaniards, before the United States acquired the possession of them.

Mr. B. read the bill which he had first introduced for selling the refuse lands of the United States, and making provision for actual settlers; and argued that it was, in principle, nearly the same with the graduation bill as now amended.

The following is the bill, and the report of the committee against it:

"IN SENATE OF THE U. S. April 28, 1824.

"Agreeably to notice, Mr. BENTON asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bill; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

"A bill to sell and dispose of the refuse lands of the United States.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the lands belonging to the United States, which have been heretofore, or shall be hereafter, offered at public sale, and shall remain five years after being so offered, without being sold at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, shall be again offered at public sale, but shall not be sold for a less sum than fifty cents per acre.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any head of a family, or young man, above twenty-one years of age, or widow, being citizens of the United States, may demand and receive from the Register and Receiver of the proper land office, a written permission to take possession of, and settle upon, any half-quarter section of land which shall remain unsold, after having been offered for sale at the minimum price of fifty cents per acre; and, upon inhabiting and cultivating the same for three successive years, shall be entitled to receive a patent therefor, as a donation from the United States.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lands which shall remain unsold, after having been offered at public sale at the minimum price of fifty cents per acre, may be sold at private sale for that sum, at any time before a permission shall have been granted to settle on the same."

"MAY 3, 1824.

"Mr. BARTON, the chairman of the committee, stated that the committee believed the system proposed in this bill incompatible with the full and fair execution of the present system of raising revenue from the public lands for the discharge of our national debt; as the promulgation of the system now proposed would have the effect of preventing public sales, and private sales at the present minimum price; for few would buy when, by waiting a few years, they might get the lands at fifty cents per acre. However proper the proposed plan might become hereafter, the committee deemed it premature and improper at this time; and had, therefore, instructed him to move the indefinite postponement of this bill when it should be taken up for consideration."

The bill was further debated by Messrs. DICKERSON, SPRAGUE, McKINLEY, NOBLE, and ELLIS.

When the question was taken, the motion of Mr. FOOT was rejected by the following vote:

Mr. BARTON said he had before given his reasons why he should vote for the bill as it was; but it seemed to be his fate to have all he said or did, on this subject, misunderstood or misrepresented. Only a few days ago, he said he had been under the necessity to call upon two members of this body to put down a falsehood in relation to his course on the graduation bill.

The Senators called on had effectually put that misrepresentation to rest. This morning he found that even the National Intelligencer had, by mistake, put him down as having moved to lay the bill on the table yesterday.

He was now under the necessity of calling on the whole Senate, without regard to party, to bear witness to a falsification of the debate and proceedings upon this bill on the 6th instant, by the Printer to the Senate, in an editorial article. He had then publicly stated his reasons why he would vote for the reduction proposed, and why he would vote for the minimum of seventy-five cents per acre to actual settlers; that he thought a difference of twenty-five cents per acre, between the person who had gone on the land and the other common owners of this public property, was a sufficient preference to the actual settler over the other purchasers of the public lands; and should therefore vote for that minimum, although he had proposed small donations to such settlers in 1828, being disposed to take what seemed to be practicable.

But, he asked, would the Senate believe that not a word was mentioned of all this in the Telegraph?

He did not complain of not having been noticed by the Public Printer; but he complained of his having fixed his eye upon him, and, like a mere spy, watched his rising or sitting, in a silent vote on the gentleman from Alabama's motion to reduce that minimum to fifty cents, and reported that vote alone, without any of the concomitant and explanatory statements which accompanied that debate. This, he believed, was the first time an editor, whether public printer or not, had fixed his eye, like a mere hireling spy, upon a member in his seat, seized on a vote silently given, and blazoned it to the public alone, suppressing all the explanations that accompanied the vote. No man disposed to tell the truth, and the whole truth, would be guilty of such a garbled and falsified account of the proceedings of the body. The only notice taken by the Public Printer of his course on that day, was the following—speaking of the motion to reduce the minimum to fifty cents:

"The vote on this motion was not taken by yeas and nays, but the West was not sufficiently unanimous in favor of it, Mr. BARTON, of Missouri, being against it."

Thus placed between two indices, with the single vote given, and all the accompanying explanations and debate cut off and suppressed, there could be no room for doubt of its being a wilful and intentional falsification of the debate and proceedings of the Senate upon that subject. It proved that the editor of the Telegraph had fixed his eye, as a spy, on him; watched a silent vote, which it was thought would be unpopular; and, contrary to the universal practice of reporters, had given that vote in the paper, garbled and disconnected—without even naming him on the occasion, except with that view of misrepresentation.

This, he said, was a question for the employers of the Public Printer: whether he should be permitted thus to garble, misrepresent, and falsify the debates and proceedings of the Senate, in a manner to which no man, above the grade of a hireling spy, and falsifier of the debate, would descend.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Barton, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Noble, Rowan, Ruggles, Tazewell, Troup, White, Woodbury—24.

The title was then amended, to read "An act to reduce the price of a portion of the public lands heretofore in market, and to grant a preference to actual settlers."

SUNDAY MAILS.

On motion by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, the resolution submitted by him on the 10th March last, and subsequently laid on the table, "to instruct the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report a bill repealing so much of the act on the regulation of post offices as requires the delivery of letters, packets, and papers on the Sabbath, and further to prohibit the transportation of the mail on that day," was resumed, and an interesting debate arose, in which Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN advocated, and Mr. LIVINGSTON opposed, the resolution; after which, it was laid on the table, at four o'clock, on motion by Mr. BIBB.

MONDAY, MAY 10, 1830.

TURNPIKE ROAD TO FREDERICKTOWN.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill authorizing a subscription of stock in the Washington and Rockville Turnpike Road Company, was resumed.

Mr. DICKERSON opposed the bill chiefly because another company had proposed an equally eligible route, and to make the road at an expense considerably below that proposed by this company.

Mr. NOBLE inquired whether the gentleman from New Jersey would vote for the bill under any circumstances, even although he should be privileged to select the route.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that there was no other company in existence, but the one named in the bill. It was true, however, that certain persons who interfered to delay the passage of this bill at the last session, had applied to the Legislature of Maryland for an act of incorporation, which he believed was refused.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that he did not rise to discuss the merits of the bill, as his health, if inclination served, would prevent him; but simply to remark that the Senate was as well prepared to act on the subject at this time as they would ever be, and hoped it would be now decided.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dudley, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, King, Knight, Livingston, McKinley, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Robbins, Rowan, Rug-

TEA AND COFFEE.

On motion by Mr. KING, the bill from the House of Representatives "to reduce the duties on coffee, tea, and cocoa," was taken up in Committee of the Whole, with the amendments of the Committee on Finance of the Senate thereto.

The first of these amendments, proposing a reduction of the duty on salt from twenty to ten cents the bushel, was opposed by Mr. MARKS, on the ground that as the same proposition had been rejected by the House of Representatives, in the progress of the bill there, it was not probable that any change of sentiment had taken place on the subject since, and thought that the only effect of any amendment to the bill, at this late stage of the session, would be to defeat it.

After some remarks by Mr. HAYNE, in favor of, and by Mr. SILSBEE, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. JOHNSTON, against the amendment,

Mr. GRUNDY moved to lay the subject on the table, in order that the Senate might proceed to the business specially assigned for this day; which motion was negatived by yeas and nays, 19 to 28.

Mr. HOLMES renewed the motion to lay the bill on the table, for the purpose of considering Executive business, which he thought would occupy the time of the Senate but a short time, when the bill might be resumed; and this motion having prevailed, the remainder of the day was spent in Executive business.

TUESDAY, MAY 11, 1830.

The bill "to reduce the duties on coffee, tea, and cocoa," was, on motion by Mr. SILSBEE, considered in Committee of the Whole, with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Finance; and the amendment being in part agreed to,

On the question to agree to the second amendment, as following:

Section 1, line eight, after the word "more," insert, And from and after the thirty-first day of December, 1830, the duty on salt shall be ten cents for every fifty-six pounds, and no more—

It was rejected, 20 to 26.

[The following remarks of Mr. BENTON, in connexion with this bill, are all that have been preserved.]

Mr. BENTON commenced his speech, by saying that he was no advocate for unprofitable debate, and had no ambition to add his name to the catalogue of barren orators; but that there were cases in which speaking did good; cases in which moderate abilities produced great results; and he believed the question of repealing the salt tax to be one of those cases. It had certainly been so in England. There the salt tax had been overthrown by the labors of plain men, under circumstances much more unfavorable to their undertaking than exist here. The English salt tax had continued one hundred and fifty years. It was cherished by the ministry, to whom it yielded a million and a half sterling of revenue; it was defended by the domestic salt makers, to whom it gave a monopoly of the home market; it was consecrated by time, having subsisted for five generations; it was fortified by the habits of the people, who were born, and had grown gray, under it; and it was sanctioned by the necessities of the State, which required every resource of rigorous taxation. Yet it was overthrown; and the overthrow was effected by two debates, conducted, not by the orators whose renown has filled the world—not by Sheridan, Burke, Pitt, and Fox—but by plain, business men—Mr. Calcraft, Mr. Curwen, and Mr. Egerton. These patriotic members of the British Parliament commenced the war upon the British salt tax in 1817, and finished it in 1822. They commenced with the omens and auspices all against them, and ended with complete success. They abolished the salt tax in toto. They swept it all off, bravely rejecting all compromises when they had got their adversaries half vanquished, and carrying their appeals home to the people, until they had roused a spirit before which the ministry quailed, the monopolizers trembled, the Parliament gave way, and the tax fell. This example is encouraging; it is full of consolation and of hope; it shows what zeal and perseverance can do in a good cause; it shows that the cause of truth and justice is triumphant when its advocates are bold and faithful. It leads to the conviction that the American salt tax will fall as the British tax did, as soon as the people shall see that its continuance is a burthen to them, without adequate advantage to the Government, and that its repeal is in their own hands.

The enormous amount of the tax was the first point to which Mr. B. would direct his attention. He said it was near three hundred per cent. upon Liverpool blown, and four hundred per cent. upon alum salt; but as the Liverpool was a very inferior salt, and not much used in the West, he would confine his observations to the salt of Portugal and the West Indies, called by the general name of alum. The import price of this salt was from eight to nine cents a bushel of fifty-six pounds each, and the duty upon that bushel was twenty cents. Here was a tax of upwards of two hundred per cent. Then the merchant had his profit upon the duty as well as the cost of the article; and when it went through the hands of several merchants before it got to the consumer, each had his profit upon it; and whenever this profit amounted to fifty per cent. upon the duty, it was upwards of one hundred per cent. upon the salt. Then, the tariff laws have deprived the consumer of thirty-four pounds in the bushel, by substituting weight for measure, and that weight a false one. The true weight of a measured bushel of alum salt is eighty-four pounds; but the British tariff laws, for the sake of multiplying the bushels, and increasing the products of the tax, substituted weight for measure; and our tariff laws copied after them, and adopted their standard of fifty-six pounds to the bushel.

[Here General SMITH, of Maryland, rose, and said that he had led the Senator from Missouri into an error, in telling him, some time back, that the weight of alum salt was eighty-four pounds. Subsequent reflection had shown him that it was below eighty.]

Mr. B. resumed his speech. He said, the Senator from Maryland was not so far wrong in his first information as he supposed; that he [Mr. B.] was informed from other sources that Turk's Island salt weighed above eighty pounds; and he had a report before him of a committee of the British House of Commons, made in 1817, by Mr. Calcraft, the chairman of the committee, in which the weight of the best Bay of Biscay salt is stated at eighty-four pounds. But let us assume the weight at eighty pounds; and at this weight it is incontestible that the tariff laws have been the means of defrauding the consumer of thirty pounds in the bushel. For these laws reduce the bushel to fifty-six pounds; and the retail merchant and salt manufacturer, improving upon this hint, have made a further reduction of six pounds, and reduced the bushel to fifty. This is a loss of three parts in eight—very nearly one-half—and making the salt cost nearly one hundred per cent more. Putting all this together—the duty, the merchants' profit upon that duty, and the loss in the bushel—and the duty on alum salt is shown to be near four hundred per cent; in other words, the tax is four times the value of the article, and makes it cost the consumer four times as much as it would cost without the tax. This is a cruel oppression upon the people; one which they ought not to bear without necessity, and which there is no necessity, as shall be fully shown, for bearing any longer.

Mr. B. entered into statistical details, to show the aggregate amount of this tax, which he stated to be enormous, and contrary to every principle of taxation, even if taxes were so necessary to justify the taxing of salt. He stated the importation of foreign salt, in 1829, at six millions of bushels, round numbers; the value of seven hundred and fifteen thousand dollars, and the tax at twenty cents a bushel, one million two hundred thousand dollars; the merchant's profit upon that duty at fifty per. cent. is six hundred thousand dollars; and the secret or hidden tax, in the shape of false weight for true measure, at the rate of thirty pounds in the bushel, was four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Here, then, is taxation to the amount of about two millions and a quarter of dollars, upon an article costing seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and that article one of prime necessity and universal use, ranking, next after bread, in the catalogue of articles for human subsistence.

The distribution of this enormous tax upon the different sections of the Union, was the next object of Mr. B's inquiry; and, for this purpose, he viewed the Union under three great divisions—the northeast, the south, and the west. To the northeast, and especially to some parts of it, he considered the salt tax to be no burthen, but rather a benefit and a money-making business. The fishing allowances and bounties produced this effect. In consideration of the salt duty, the curers and exporters of fish are allowed money out of the treasury, to the amount, as it was intended, of the salt duty paid by them; but it has been proved to be twice as much. The annual allowance is about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the aggregate drawn from the treasury since the first imposition of the salt duty in 1789, is shown by the treasury returns to be five millions of dollars. Much of this is drawn by undue means, as is shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of the present session, page eight of the annual report on the finances. The Northeast makes much salt at home, and chiefly by solar evaporation, which fits it for curing fish and provisions. Much of it is proved, by the returns of the salt makers, to be used in the fisheries, while the fisheries are drawing money from the treasury under the laws which intended to indemnify them for the duty paid on foreign salt. To this section of the Union, then, the salt tax is not felt as a burthen.

Let us proceed to the South. In this section there are but few salt works, and no bounties or allowances, as there are no fisheries. The consumers are thrown almost entirely upon the foreign supply, and chiefly use the Liverpool blown. The import price of this is about fifteen cents a bushel; the weight and strength is less than that of alum salt; and the tax falls heavily and directly upon the people, to the whole amount of their consumption. It is a heavy burthen upon the South.

The West is the last section to be viewed, and it will be found to be the true seat of the most oppressive operations of the salt tax. The domestic supply is high in price, deficient in quantity, and altogether unfit for one of the greatest purposes for which salt is there wanted—curing provisions for exportation. A foreign supply is indispensable, and alum salt is the kind used. The import price of this kind, from the West Indies, is nine cents a bushel; from Portugal, eight cents a bushel. At these prices, the West could be supplied with this salt at New Orleans, if the duty was abolished; but, in consequence of the duty, it costs thirty seven and a half cents per bushel there, being four times the import price of the article, and seventy-five cents per bushel at Louisville and other central parts of the valley of the Mississippi. This enormous price, resolved into its component parts, is thus made up: 1. Eight or nine cents a bushel for the salt. 2. Twenty cents for duty. 3. Eight or ten cents for merchant's profit at New Orleans. 4. Sixteen or seventeen cents for freight to Louisville. 5. Fifteen or twenty cents for the second merchant's profit, who counts his per centum on his whole outlay. In all, about seventy-five cents for a bushel of fifty pounds, which, if there was no duty, and the tariff regulations of weight for measure abolished, would be bought in New Orleans, by the measured bushel of eighty pounds weight, for eight or nine cents, and would be brought up the river, by steamboats, at the rate of thirty-three and a third cents per hundred weight. It thus appears that the salt tax falls heaviest upon the West. It is an error to suppose that the South is the greatest sufferer. The West wants it for every purpose the South does, and two great purposes besides—curing provision for export, and salting stock. The West uses alum salt, and on this the duty is heaviest, because the price is lower, and the weight greater. Twenty cents on salt which costs eight or nine cents a bushel is a much heavier duty than on that which costs fifteen cents; and then the deception in the substitution of weight for measure is much greater in alum salt, which weighs so much more than the Liverpool blown. Like the South, the West receives no bounties or allowances on account of the salt duties. This may be fair in the South, where the imported salt is not re-exported upon fish or provisions; but it is unfair in the West, where the exportation of beef, pork, bacon, cheese, and butter, is prodigious, and the foreign salt re-exported upon the whole of it.

Mr. B. then argued, with great warmth, that the provision curers and exporters were entitled to the same bounties and allowances with the exporters of fish. The claims of each rested upon the same principle, and upon the principle of all drawbacks—that of a reimbursement of the duty which was paid on the imported salt when re-exported on fish and provisions. The same principle covers the beef and pork of the farmer, which covers the fish of the fisherman; and such was the law in the beginning. The first act of Congress, in the year 1789, which imposed a duty upon salt, allowed a bounty, in lieu of a drawback, on beef and pork exported, as well as fish. The bounty was the same in each case; it was five cents a quintal on dried fish, five cents a barrel on pickled fish, and five on beef and pork. As the duty on salt was increased, the bounties and allowances were increased also. Fish and salted beef and pork fared alike for the first twenty years. They fared alike till the revival of the salt tax at the commencement of the late war. Then they parted company; bounties and allowances were continued to the fisheries, and dropped on beef and pork; and this has been the case ever since. The exporters of fish are now drawing at the rate of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, as a reimbursement for their salt tax; while exporters of provisions draw nothing. The aggregate of the fishing bounties and allowances, actually drawn from the treasury, exceeds five millions of dollars; while the exporters of provisions, who get nothing, would have been entitled to draw a greater sum; for the export in salted provisions exceeds the value of exported fish.

Mr. B. could not quit this part of his subject, without endeavoring to fix the attention of the Senate upon the provision trade of the West. He took this trade in its largest sense, as including the export trade of beef, pork, bacon, cheese, and butter, to foreign countries, especially the West Indies; the domestic trade to the Lower Mississippi and the Southern States; the neighborhood trade, as supplying the towns in the upper States, the miners in Missouri and the Upper Mississippi, the army and the navy; and the various professions, which, being otherwise employed, did not raise their own provisions. The amount of this trade, in this comprehensive view, was prodigious, and annually increasing, and involving in its current almost the entire population of the West, either as the growers and makers of the provisions, the curers, exporters, or consumers. The amount could scarcely be ascertained. What was exported from New Orleans was shown to be great; but it was only a fraction of the whole trade. He declared it to be entitled to the favorable consideration of Congress, and that the repeal of the salt duty was the greatest favor, if an act of justice ought to come under the name of favor, which could be rendered it, as the salt was necessary in growing the hogs and cattle, as well as in preparing the beef and pork for market. A reduction in the price of salt, next to a reduction in the price of land, was the greatest blessing which the Federal Government could now confer upon the West. Mr. B. referred to the example of England, who favored her provision curers, and permitted them to import alum salt free of duty, for the encouragement of the provision trade, even when her own salt manufacturers were producing an abundant and superfluous supply of common salt. He showed that she did more; that she extended the same relief and encouragement to the Irish; and he read from the British statute book an act of the British Parliament, passed in 1807, entitled "An act to encourage the export of salted beef and pork from Ireland," which allowed a bounty of ten pence sterling on every hundred weight of beef and pork so exported, in consideration of the duty paid on the salt which was used in the curing of it. He stated, that, at a later period, the duty had been entirely repealed, and the Irish, in common with other British subjects, allowed a free trade with all the world, in salt; and then demanded, in the most emphatic manner, if the people of the West could not obtain from the American Congress the justice which the oppressed Irish had procured from a British Parliament, composed of hereditary nobles, and filled with representatives of rotten boroughs, and slavish retainers of the King's ministers. Having shown the enormous amount of the tax, its unequal operation in different sections of the Union, and the superior claims of the West for its abolition, Mr. B. proceeded to examine the reasons for keeping it up. These grew out of the "American system;" for the duty was no longer wanted for revenue. The plea of revenue was cut off by our own conduct. We had voted, two years ago, to reduce the duties one-half on wines, and were now voting to reduce them to a fraction on coffee, tea, and chocolate. This is proof decisive that the revenue can dispense with a part of the taxes. The objection, then, to the repeal of the salt duty, stands upon the "American system;" and thus this system is presented to the people by its own warm friends and zealous champions, as reducing the moderate duties on Champagne wine and imperial tea, which the rich and luxurious alone use, and leaving the enormous and unequal duties upon salt, without which the farmer cannot raise his stock or cure his provisions; without which the laboring man cannot eat his dinner, nor the beggar boil his greens! Thus this system is presented as favoring the rich and luxurious, oppressing the poor and laborious! But let us examine into it, and see with what justice, and with what conformity to its own declared principles, the "American system" has taken the salt tax under its shelter and protection. The principles of that system, as I understand them, and practise upon them, are to tax, through the custom house, the foreign rivals of our own essential productions, when, by that taxation, an adequate supply of the same article, as good and as cheap, can be made at home. These were the principles of the system [Mr. B. said] when he was initiated, and, if they had changed since, he had not changed with them; and he apprehended a promulgation of the change would produce a schism amongst its followers. Taking these to be the principles of the system, let the salt tax be brought to its test. In the first place, the domestic manufacture had enjoyed all possible protection. The duty was near three hundred per cent. on Liverpool salt, and four hundred upon alum salt; and to this must be added, so far as relates to all the interior manufactories, the protection arising from transportation, frequently equal to two or three hundred per cent. more. This great and excessive protection has been enjoyed, without interruption, for the last eighteen years, and partially for twenty years longer. This surely is time enough for the trial of a manufacture which requires but little skill or experience, to carry it on. Now for the results. Have the domestic manufactories produced an adequate supply for the country? They have not; nor half enough. The production of the last year, (1829,) as shown in the returns to the Secretary of the Treasury, is about five millions of bushels; the importation of foreign salt, for the same period, as shown by the custom house returns, is five million nine hundred and forty-five thousand five hundred and forty-seven bushels. This shows the consumption to be eleven millions of bushels, of which five are domestic. Here the failure in the essential particular of an adequate supply is more than one-half. In the next place, how is it in point of price? Is the domestic article furnished as cheap as the foreign? Far from it, as already shown, and still further, as can be shown. The price of the domestic, along the coast of the Atlantic States, varies, at the works, from thirty-seven and a half to fifty cents; in the interior, the usual prices, at the works, are from thirty-three and a third cents to one dollar for the bushel of fifty pounds, which can nearly be put into a half bushel measure. The prices of the foreign salt, at the import cities, as shown in the custom house returns for 1829, are, for the Liverpool blown, about fifteen cents for the bushel of fifty-six pounds; for Turk's Island and other West India salt, about nine cents; for St. Ubes and other Portugal salt, about eight cents; for Spanish salt, Bay of Biscay and Gibraltar, about seven cents; from the Island of Malta, six cents. Leaving out the Liverpool salt, which is made by boiling, and, therefore, contains slack and bittern, a septic ingredient, which promotes putrefaction, and renders that salt unfit for curing provisions, and which is not used in the West, and the average price of the strong, pure, alum salt, made by solar evaporation, in hot climates, is about eight cents to the bushel. Here, then, is another lamentable failure. Instead of being sold as cheap as the foreign, the domestic salt is from four to twelve times the price of alum salt. The last inquiry is as to the quality of the domestic article. Is it as good as the foreign? This is the most essential application of the test; and here again the failure is decisive. The domestic salt will not cure provisions for exportation, (the little excepted which is made, in the Northeast, by solar evaporation,) nor for consumption in the South, nor for long keeping at the army posts, nor for voyages with the navy. For all these purposes it is worthless and useless, and the provisions which are put up in it are lost, or have to be repacked, at a great expense, in alum salt. This fact is well known throughout the West, where too many citizens have paid the penalty of trusting to domestic salt, to be duped or injured by it any longer. In proof of this, Mr. B. read a statement from a citizen of Indiana, Mr. J. G. Read, whose respectability he vouched for, alleging that he had sustained a loss of near three hundred and fifty dollars upon a cargo of three hundred barrels of pork, at New Orleans, in the year 1827, in consequence of putting it up in domestic salt. The pork began to spoil as soon as it arrived in the warm climate of the South. To save it, Mr. Read had to incur the expense of repacking in alum salt—a process, which cost him one dollar and twelve and a half cents on each barrel, besides twelve and a half cents for replacing each hoop that got broke in the operation, and the expense of the drays hauling the pork to and from the place of repacking. Mr. B. said that this was the case with one and all. They must repack, in alum salt, at New Orleans, at the same expense that Mr. Read did, or procure that kind of salt beforehand, burthened as it was with duty, and diminished in the bushel by the tariff laws. Surely the West cannot present this picture of imposition to the Congress, and ask in vain for the relief which the Irish, proverbial for oppression, received from the British Parliament. And here he submitted to the Senate, that the American system, without a gross departure from its original principles, could not cover this duty any longer. It has had the full benefit of that system in high duties, imposed, for a long time, on foreign salt; it had not produced an adequate supply for the country, nor half a supply; nor at as cheap a rate, by three hundred or one thousand per cent.; and what it did supply, so far from being equal in quantity, could not even be used as a substitute for the great and important business of the provision trade. The amount of so much of that trade as went to foreign countries, Mr. B. showed to be sixty-six thousand barrels of beef, fifty-four thousand barrels of pork, two millions of pounds of bacon, two millions of pounds of butter, and one million of pounds of cheese; and he considered the supply for the army and navy, and for consumption in the South, to exceed the quantity exported.

Mr. B. examined another ground of claim for the continuance of the duties, founded on the amount of capital which the manufacturers had embarked in the business. They had returned this capital at upwards of three millions of dollars; but when you come to analyze the particulars of this imposing sum, two millions of it are found to be taken up with wooden vats, and their scantling roofs, which are in a state of daily deterioration, and must rot in a few years, whether used or not. Such items could not be counted as capital, unless when new, or nearly so; and it is not to be presumed that any new works have been erected since the problem of paying the public debt has been discussed and solved; and a great reduction of taxes looked to as a consequence of that event. Another portion of the capital was in kettles, also a perishable item, to which the same remark extends as to the wood in vats. A third large item in the estimate of capital is a great number of wells and furnaces, left to stand idle on purpose, in order to make less salt and demand higher prices for it. Deducting all these items, or so much of each as ought to be deducted, and it would probably turn out that the boasted capital in these works did not exceed the amount of one year's tax upon the people to keep them up. That tax has been shown to be, for 1829, one million two hundred thousand dollars of direct duty; merchant's profit upon that sum, at the rate of fifty per cent., making six hundred thousand dollars; and four hundred and fifty thousand dollars more for the loss of thirty pounds in every bushel: in all, two millions and a quarter of dollars. The real capital, in all human probability, does not reach that sum. The capital to be affected by the repeal of the duty cannot be the half of it; for all the interior works—all those in upper Pennsylvania, in Western Virginia, in Ohio, in Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, are beyond the reach of foreign salt, except at an advance of from two to three hundred per cent. upon its cost. They are protected without a tariff, by locality, by distance, and by the expense of transporting foreign salt into the fair and legitimate sphere of their supply and consumption. Doubtless it would be better for the consumers to buy all the works, and stop them, than to go on paying the present enormous duty, and its accumulated burthens, to keep them up. But this alternative cannot be necessary. The people cannot be driven to this resort. After reducing the duties on tea, coffee, wines, and chocolate, the duty upon salt must fall. The American system cannot keep it up. It cannot continue to tax the first necessary of life, after untaxing its luxuries. The duty was repealed in toto, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson. The probable extinction of the public debt enabled the Government at that time to dispense with certain taxes, and salt took precedence then of tea, coffee, chocolate, and wine. It cannot be necessary here to dilate upon the uses of salt. But, in repealing that duty in England, it was thought worthy of notice that salt was necessary to the health, growth, and fattening of hogs, cattle, sheep, and horses; that it was a preservative of hay and clover, and restored moulded and flooded hay to its good and wholesome state, and made even straw and chaff available as food for cattle. The domestic salt makers need not speak of protection against alum salt. No quantity of duty will keep it out. The people must have it for the provision trade; and the duty upon that kind of salt is a grievous burthen upon them, without being of the least advantage to the salt makers.

Mr. B. said, it was an argument in favor of keeping up these duties, that in time of war we should have to depend upon the home supply. He said we had no war at present, nor any prospect of one, and that it was neither wise nor beneficial to anticipate, and inflict upon ourselves beforehand, the calamities of that state. "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." When the war comes, we will see about the price of salt; in the mean while, the cheaper we get it now, the higher we shall be able to pay for it then. But he did not admit the argument. The making of salt was a plain and easy business. It required no skill or experience. If a part of the works stop when the price becomes low, they will start again the day it rises. If the whole were stopped now, they would all be in full operation in the first few months of war. Besides, many works were stopped now. On the Kenhawa, twenty-four furnaces, capable of making four hundred thousand bushels per annum, are returned by the owners as idle. On the Holston, only one well is worked, making five hundred bushels a day, when ten thousand could be made. At many other places a part of the works are stopped, and for the purpose of making a less quantity, and getting a higher price. If the owners thus stop their works for their private advantage, they must not complain if the interest of the people should require more of them to stop.

Mr. B. said, there was no argument which could be used here, in favor of continuing this duty, which was not used, and used in vain, in England; and many were used there, of much real force, which cannot be used here. The American system, by name, was not impressed into the service of the tax there, but its doctrines were; and he read a part of the report of the committee on salt duties, in 1817, to prove it. It was the statement of the agent of the British salt manufacturers, Mr. William Horne, who was sworn and examined as a witness. He said: "I will commence by referring to the evidence I gave upon the subject of rock salt, in order to establish the presumption of the national importance of the salt trade, arising from the large extent of British capital employed in the trade, and the considerable number of persons dependant upon it for support. I, at the same time, stated that the salt trade was in a very depressed state, and that it continued to fall off. I think it cannot be doubted that the salt trade, in common with all staple British manufactures, is entitled to the protection of Government; and the British manufacturers of salt consider that, in common with other manufacturers of this country, they are entitled to such protection, in particular from a competition at home with foreign manufacturers; and, in consequence, they hope to see a prohibitory duty on foreign salt."

Such was the petition of the British manufacturers. They urged the amount of their capital, the depressed state of their business, the number of persons dependant upon it for support, the duty of the Government to protect it, the necessity for a prohibitory duty on foreign salt, and the fact that they were making more than the country could consume. The ministry backed them with a call for the continuance of the revenue, one million five hundred thousand pounds sterling, derived from the salt tax; and with a threat to lay that amount upon something else, if it was taken off of salt. All would not do. Mr. Calcraft, and his friends, appealed to the rights and interests of the people, as overruling considerations in questions of taxation. They denounced the tax itself as little less than impiety, and an attack upon the goodness and wisdom of God, who had filled the bowels of the earth, and the waves of the sea, with salt for the use and blessing of man, and to whom it was denied, its use clogged and fettered, by odious and abominable taxes. They demanded the whole repeal; and when the ministry and the manufacturers, overpowered by the voice of the people, offered to give up three-fourths of the tax, they bravely resisted the proposition, stood out for total repeal, and carried it.

Mr. B. could not doubt a like result here, and he looked forward, with infinite satisfaction, to the era of a free trade in salt. The first effect of such a trade would be, to reduce the price of alum salt, at the import cities, to eight or nine cents a bushel. The second effect would be, a return to the measured bushel, by getting rid of the tariff regulation, which substituted weight for measure, and reduced eighty-four pounds to fifty. The third effect would be, to establish a great trade, carried on by barter, between the inhabitants of the United States and the people of the countries which produce alum salt, to the infinite advantage and comfort of both parties. He examined the operation of this barter at New Orleans. He said, this pure and superior salt, made entirely by solar evaporation, came from countries which were deficient in the articles of food, in which the West abounded. It came from the West Indies, from the coasts of Spain and Portugal, and from places in the Mediterranean; all of which are at this time consumers of American provisions, and take from us beef, pork, bacon, rice, corn, corn meal, flour, potatoes, &c. Their salt costs them almost nothing. It is made on the sea beach by the power of the sun, with little care and aid from man. It is brought to the United States as ballast, costing nothing for the transportation across the sea. The duty alone prevents it from coming to the United States in the most unbounded quantity. Remove the duty, and the trade would be prodigious. A bushel of corn is worth more than a sack of salt to the half-starved people to whom the sea and the sun give as much of this salt as they will rake up and pack away. The levee at New Orleans would be covered—the warehouses would be crammed with salt; the barter trade would become extensive and universal; a bushel of corn, or of potatoes, a few pounds of butter, or a few pounds of beef or pork, would purchase a sack of salt; the steamboats would bring it up for a trifle; and all the upper States of the Great Valley, where salt is so scarce, so dear, and so indispensable for rearing stock and curing provisions, in addition to all its obvious uses, would be cheaply and abundantly supplied with that article. Mr. B. concluded with saying, that, next to the reduction of the price of public lands, and the free use of the earth for labor and cultivation, he considered the abolition of the salt tax, and a free trade in foreign salt, as the greatest blessing which the Federal Government could now bestow upon the people of the West.

The remaining amendments reported by the committee being agreed to, the bill was further amended; and, the amendments being concurred in, were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended.

IMPEACHMENT OF JAMES H. PECK.

At 12 o'clock the Senate resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. CHAMBERS, who were absent on the organization of the court, being present, the VICE PRESIDENT administered the usual oath to them.

The Sergeant-at-Arms was then directed to make proclamation in the usual form, to keep silence; after which,

The Sergeant-at-Arms returned the writ of summons, with his proceedings thereon; that is, he had served the same on James H. Peck, on Thursday last, in the city of Baltimore, and had left with him a copy thereof; to the truth of which he was sworn by the Secretary.

Proclamation was then made that James H. Peck appear and answer the article of impeachment, and he accordingly appeared, attended by Mr. Wirt, as his counsel; and being seated within the bar.

The VICE PRESIDENT informed Judge Peck that the Court was ready to receive his answer.

JUDGE PECK rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: I appear, in obedience to a summons from this honorable Court, to answer an article of impeachment exhibited against me by the honorable the House of Representatives; and I have a motion to make, which I request may be done by my counsel.

The VICE PRESIDENT having signified the willingness of the Court to receive the motion,

Mr. WIRT rose, and, having read reasons therefor, submitted the following motion in behalf of Judge Peck:

1. That a reasonable time may be allowed me to prepare my answer and plea; and, for this purpose, I ask until the 25th day of the present month.

2. That, after my answer and plea shall be filed, process for witnesses may be awarded to me, and a reasonable time may be allowed to collect my witnesses and proofs from the State of Missouri.

Mr. WEBSTER then submitted the following order:

Ordered, That James H. Peck file his answer and plea with the Secretary of the Senate, to the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, on or before the second Monday of the next session of Congress.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the foregoing order to the House of Representatives, and to James H. Peck.

Mr. BIBB moved to amend the order, by striking out the "second Monday of the next session of Congress," and inserting the 25th day of the present month, which was agreed to; and the order was then made as amended.

On motion by Mr. CHAMBERS, the Court adjourned to meet on Tuesday, the 25th instant, at 12 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 12, 1830.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL, &c.

The bill "making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacons, and monuments, placing buoys, and for improving harbors and directing surveys," was taken up in Committee of the Whole, as amended on motion by Mr. WOODBURY; and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, on Mr. GRUNDY'S motion to recommit the bill, with instructions to class the several subjects embraced in it, and report a bill on each.

Mr. HAYNE called for a division of the question, and it was accordingly taken on recommitting the bill, and negatived by the following vote: Yeas 16, nays 30.

This motion was advocated by Messrs. GRUNDY, HAYNE, TYLER, BENTON, and SMITH, of South Carolina, on the ground that the subjects embraced in the bill were incongruous in their character, and ought to be considered in separate bills, in order that gentlemen might not be forced either to vote for objects or measures which they did not approve, or, by such union, to reject such as they might approve.

Mr. WOODBURY thought the contrary; that it was a perfect congruity in uniting in one bill all the subjects named in this. Light-houses, &c. were necessary to facilitate and protect commerce; surveys were necessary preparatory to appropriations for improving the navigation of rivers, &c.; and navigation indispensable to commerce, &c. Mr. W. also thought, that if the motion prevailed, the bill could not be passed during the present session, &c.

MAY 13 to 15, 1830.]

Maysville Turnpike Road.

[SENATE.]

Messrs. WEBSTER, SILSBEE, HOLMES, SANDFORD, and FOOT, also opposed the recommitment.

Mr. BARNARD moved to amend the amendment of the Committee of Commerce, which appropriates three hundred dollars for surveying Back creek, in Maryland, to ascertain the expense of improving its navigation, by inserting, in place of it, "forty thousand dollars for the improvement of the navigation of Back creek."

This motion was supported by Messrs. BARNARD, CHAMBERS, MARKS, WEBSTER, and CLAYTON, and objected to by Messrs. WOODBURY, SMITH, of Maryland, and HAYNE.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the proposed amendment, so that the sum appropriated should be a grant to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, to aid them in improving the navigation of the creek; which was rejected.

Mr. WOODBURY then moved to strike out "forty thousand dollars," and insert "twenty-five thousand dollars."

Mr. HAYNE called for a division; and the question to strike out was lost by the following vote: Yeas 21, nays 25.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BARNARD was then agreed to by the following vote: Yeas 26, nays 21.

Sundry other amendments having been made to the bill, it was reported to the Senate; and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended.

[On the 13th, 14th, and 15th of May, there was much business done in Senate, and a number of bills were passed. Among other bills under consideration was that authorizing a subscription of stock in the Maysville, Washington, Paris, and Lexington Turnpike Road. The publishers have, in their possession, only the following remarks by Mr. TYLER.]

Mr. T. stated that he did not rise to enter into a constitutional argument on the bill now under consideration. He should wait for more favorable auspices, before he ventured to detain the Senate by such an argument. The period might be near at hand, when the principles of the constitution would once more be invoked, and the true democratic party be called upon to rally around the standard which was unfurled in times long since gone by. Whenever the day should arrive in which the country would be so far relieved from the unhappy spell in which it had been bound, as to listen with attention to an exposition of this subject, on constitutional grounds, he would not be wanting in his duty. I was [said Mr. T.] in that Congress which was the first to enter gravely into the discussion of the constitutional power of this Government to make roads and canals. I then attentively weighed all that was urged by the advocates of the system—if system that may be called, which is none—and my decision was against them. Every subsequent reflection has confirmed the opinion then expressed; and the experience of the last six years has satisfied me, that, in its exercise, all that is dear and should be considered sacred in our institutions is put to hazard. Experience is the parent of true wisdom, and the lights which she has furnished upon this subject ought to be bright enough to conduct our footsteps back to the path from which we have strayed. Can any man say in what this system is to end? Formerly, it was held to be national. I have no such word in my political vocabulary. A nation of twenty-four nations, is an idea which I cannot realize. A confederacy may embrace many nations; but by what process twenty-four can be converted into one, I am still to learn. Yes, sir, formerly it was contended that the road-making powers could only be exerted over national objects, but now it is gravely contended that every thing is national, and that the bounty of this Government may be exerted in aiding to construct a road but sixty miles long. And what do we hear? Why, that the stock thus taken up by the Government is destined, in the end, to yield a handsome dividend; that this road runs through the most fertile district of country in the world, and is the great thoroughfare through the State of Kentucky. Let me remark, that it is by no means the least surprising circumstance connected with it, that, when its advantages are so decidedly great, and the promised dividend on the stock so large, the State of Kentucky itself, if its citizens are reluctant to subscribe, should not take up the stock. Why permit this Government, already possessed of such abundant sources of revenue, to engross this also? Why suffer it, from this time and for ever, to levy a tax for the benefit of other portions of the confederacy, on the good people of Kentucky? Let the truth be spoken. The benefits of the contemplated subscription are destined to arise to certain individuals, who have been incorporated by the Legislature of that State to construct this road. Their fortunes are to be advanced, and they are earnestly urging us to aid them in this enterprise. Now, sir, I desire Senators to reflect upon the consequences of passing this bill. In all our legislation, we should act upon an enlarged principle—the principle of equal justice. If we subscribe to this undertaking, where shall we stop? What company shall we deny, or what work shall we refuse to aid? Will you aid all works of equal extent—every road of sixty miles in length? If we do not, shall we not be justly chargeable with injustice? But, sir, upon what principle is it that we shall limit our subscriptions to roads of precisely the same extent with this? Why not, if they shall fall a little short of this? I ask of gentlemen to show me the limit of their principle. Pass this bill, [said Mr. T.] and no man can set bounds to the applications which will be made to us at the next session. We shall have a perfect jumble of all manner of schemes and plans; national and local; public and private; in lawyers' phrase, a perfect hodgepodge. Can any Government bear such an operation? Can any community exist in peace under such a system? It will terminate precisely as has done another magnificent scheme. Four or five years ago, our ingenious politicians found the power in the constitution to improve harbors, and to make our rivers navigable. They began with roadsteads for the navy; and in what has it terminated? Let our observation this session illustrate. We have got now to surveying creeks which have not water enough to keep at work a common grist mill. The appropriation made but the other day, for the survey of Mousen river, in the State of Maine, in the very face, too, of an explanation of its actual condition, made by the chairman of the Committee of Commerce, has left me no room to hope that any opposition to the bill now under consideration will be successful. It is, nevertheless, my duty, as a member of the committee who reported this bill, to state to the Senate the objections which I have to it. When the subject was before the committee, it was attempted to show that it was but the part of a scheme, more enlarged and more extensive. It was said to be but a link in a great road hereafter to be finished by this Government from Zanesville, in Ohio, to a point opposite to Maysville, on the Ohio river; and from Lexington to Nashville; and from thence on to Florence, in Alabama. On this ground, it claimed nationality of character. The chain was broken by the interposition of the Ohio river; and what was to be done to supply it, I do not know. A bridge would scarcely have been thought of, and a ferry, founded by authority of this Government, might subject to too severe a test this road-making power. Now, sir, it is the easiest thing imaginable to make a road a national road. Every road in the country readily becomes so. Each is connected with every other, whether by a straight line or otherwise, is not material. The angle at which the county road passing by my door intersects the principal road leading from this city to Richmond, and from thence to Huntsville, in Alabama, whether it be a right angle or an acute angle, must be wholly immaterial. It is a part of a national road, and is immediately or immediately connected with every other road in the United States. If this Maysville road rested on a pivot, and could be turned round from its present posture of east and west, to north and south, it would be still as much a national road as it now is. The only difference would be, that it would lead to other States and to other cities. Here, then, is the termination of this stupendous national scheme—this great American system of road making and canal digging—this system, in support of which, the constitution was carefully scanned through all its provisions. Here is exhibited the rightful exercise of this power under the authority to raise an army, and, ex vi termini, to construct a permanent road for military purposes. Here the great power of regulating commerce, not in truth by making rules or regulations by which it shall be carried on between the States, but by affording facilities in travelling from Maysville to Lexington, a distance of sixty miles. Splendid and magnificent, truly, has this great American system become, now that this Government is set down by the side of some few of the citizens of Maron, Bourbon, and Fayette counties, to deliberate upon the important questions which must arise in the construction of this road, whether there shall be a cart load of sand or gravel, more or less, deposited on this spot or on that.

It has pleased one gentleman in this debate to indulge in certain remarks relative to the condition in which Virginia is placed from its want of good roads; and he has been pleased to denounce our prejudices, as he has thought proper to call them. I have but one reply to make to the Senator, and it is, that we as little desire his sympathies, as we deserve his denunciation. If we are content with our situation, surely no one else has any right to complain of it. The Senator might have drawn very different conclusions in reference to us, from the very facts which he has stated. Sir, I will not deny that my native State would be greatly benefited by the application of governmental resources to its improvement. No State in this confederacy requires the expenditure of larger sums of money to objects of internal improvement; and none would be more benefited by such application. When then we stand aloof from this system; when we close our ears to the syren voice which has won so many others to the support of these measures, what is the true attitude in which we stand before the world? Can we be charged with interested or selfish designs or feelings? If we were actuated by any such, we should reach forth our hands, and gather this golden fruit. Instead of this, we give no vote for those measures, even which appertain to our immediate benefit; against the appropriation in aid of the Dismal Swamp canal, the Senators of Virginia on this floor have uniformly voted. No, sir, we will never consent to sacrifice the constitution of this land to a mere ephemeral policy. Pleasure has ever more been represented by poets and by painters as clothed in perpetual smiles, and adorned with the richest jewels; and in real life, we have known many who, allured by her deceptions, blandishments, and hollow but showy temptations, have followed as she pointed, until ruin has befallen them. So will it be with us as a confederated republic. These are the feelings and sentiments of those whom I represent on this floor. Unmoved by the whispering of a seductive policy, Virginia can only regard that course of governmental action as sound, which falls clearly within the pale of the constitution. Think you, sir, that we were more insensible than others to the advantages of good roads and canals? Not so, [said Mr. T.] let them be made out of the proper treasury—that of each State; and they will find in no quarter a more devoted advocate than myself. But when the interposition of this Government is invoked, and the high reward which an exuberant treasury offers, is held out, I say nay to the exercise of the power. It is in vain that gentlemen represent to me the benefits of the system. It is vain that I am told of its being a harmless policy. Show me the grant in the constitution in plain terms, not extorted by a forced interpretation, and not until then will I listen to you. In my youth, I remember to have read in that wisest of all wise books, if the moral be well observed, I mean Æsop, the fable of the cock and the fox; and as it serves to illustrate my feelings and views on this particular subject, I beg leave to repeat it as well as my memory enables me to do it. A fox, in search of prey, passed by the door of a hen roost, and, finding the door locked, resolved to try his skill in obtaining admission. He resorted to an expedient, sir, which so often proves successful in the affairs of the world, that of flattery and hypocrisy united. His salutation was friendly and courteous. He expressed his great concern at having heard that the cock had been indisposed. The cock assured him that his health was perfectly good, and much the better from the circumstance of Mr. fox being on the outside of the door, and the door being locked. The fox pretended not to credit this, and desired permission to see him, so that he might bear testimony to the fact from ocular demonstration; and such was his great anxiety to look in upon him, that he urged the very humble request of being only permitted to get his nose in at the door. The cock very wisely refused this permission, declaring to him at the same time, that, if he permitted him to get his nose in, his whole body would soon follow. Such were my feelings when this road-making power was first claimed for this Government. But, sir, it was vain that Virginia protested against it. Vain that she urged upon others the moral of the fable which I have just recited. The good and true State; North Carolina, reasoned as did Virginia; but all in vain. This harmless and beneficent power was yielded; and what has followed, let the whole South testify. She can bear witness throughout all her borders; measure after measure has followed; until powers as supreme and as universal are claimed for this Government, as if the parchment upon your table had never been executed. The internal policy of the States prescribed, the industry of the country regulated, and all the mere charities of life exercised as fully by this Government as by an imperial monarch. The States sinking every day with accelerated velocity into the condition of mere provinces; and a great national government to grow out of the ruins of the confederacy. Can the people of these States be reconciled to this? Or, will they continue supine until the whole fabric of the Government is changed? Sir, does any one believe that we can exist under a consolidated national government? Look to the present condition of things, and the question is answered. I ask every member of this House, whether it could have been conceived, that, when this American system was entered upon, the results which are now constantly transpiring would have arisen. What scenes are exhibited on the legislative floor under the influence of the feelings of local interest? I do but glance at them, and will not dwell upon them. When were sectional lines ever before so strongly drawn? But I forbear, sir, I forbear. Let those who believe that a national government will best suit our condition, turn to the map, and his doubts will be solved. A country embracing so great an extent of territory—possessing such a diversity of interests; one extremity congealed by the frosts of an almost perpetual winter, the other parched by almost tropical suns. Can a national legislature know the interests of these extremes, feel their wants, or advance their wishes? It is in vain to disguise it; a central government here, call it by what name you please, which shall attempt to legislate for local interests, is an open and manifest despotism. Ingenuity is tortured to bring this Government to this. The first fruits are bitter enough; combinations have arisen, and combination will follow combination, to the end of the chapter. The South now suffers, and anon it will be the turn of the North and of the West. Suppose that all Europe existed under a consolidated government, each State being degraded to the condition of a mere principality, what scenes would not be exhibited, and how tremendous a tyranny would be created, wielded not by a single man, but by stern, inflexible, immovable majorities? Russia, Prussia, Sweden, and Denmark, uniting with Austria, would evermore wage a war of plunder against France and the southern provinces. The more fertile the country, and more genial the climate, the greater temptation to combine against it with a view to legislative plunder. Who can doubt this? And yet the States of this Union are not differently circumstanced. A national government, acting here through the instrumentality of law, in other words, in obedience to an under-league of interests, will operate as forcibly and as fatally. The gentleman has in these considerations the true foundation of our prejudices, if so they are to be called. We oppose ourselves to every strained construction of the constitution, under the knowledge that the concession of one power, however slight, leads to the claim of another, and another, until all will be gone.

It has become customary, of late years, to ridicule the Virginia doctrines, as they are called. That State which has stood by this Union, through good and through evil report, is sneered at and reviled. So was it in former times. Under the first Adams she was declared rebellious and factious; and it was said that her republicans should be trampled into dust and ashes. She, nevertheless, with Kentucky, raised her voice against the infractions of the constitution. She does the same now. And what were the infractions against which she then protested, in comparison with those against which she now protests? Bad enough they were, it is true. But the art of construing the constitution, and the efforts to make it a nose of wax, was then but barely commenced. The sedition law was passed, and thereby the principle of force was resorted to. Now, sir, a more insidious, and a more dangerous principle is brought into action. Money is now relied upon; cupidity—avarice, are the infernal agents now invoked. These are the fatal sisters who weave the web of our destiny; and, if we do not destroy that web before we come to be more fully entangled, if we permit first an arm and then a leg to be tied up, there will be left to us no means of escape. Let us now begin the effort, and, by drawing back this Government to its legitimate orbit, save our institutions from destruction. My untiring efforts shall not be wanting in so holy a cause. But if we surrender ourselves into the hands of ingenious politicians, those aspirants for high office who seek evermore to enlist in their support the strongest passions of human nature, with a view to their individual aggrandizement, the ark of the covenant will be destroyed, and the temple rent in twain. Let us expel the money changers from that temple, and introduce the only true worship. In this way only, I am fully satisfied, can we preserve the Union of these States, and secure their unceasing happiness.

The Senate is indebted for these remarks to the gratuitous attack which has been made upon Virginia in this debate. They have been as unpremeditated as that attack was unexpected; but I could not forego the opportunity thus afforded me of expressing my feelings.

[The bill, as it is known, passed the Senate.]

[On the 17th, 18th, and 19th of May, the Senate acted on various bills; there was some debate, but nothing of sufficient interest to be inserted in the Register of Debates.]

THURSDAY, MAY 20, 1830.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

On motion by Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. FOOT, as proposed to be amended by the mover: when Mr. ROB-BINS said, that thinking, as he did, that some constitutional doctrines advanced in the debate were erroneous—were dangerous to the Union—and the more dangerous, as coming from high and respectable names in the country—and gone, and to go forth under the sanction of such authority—he had felt it to be a duty to manifest his dissent to those doctrines; and to state the grounds on which that dissent was predicated. The State, one of whose Representatives I have the honor to be in this body, [said Mr. R.] being a small State, beside her common, has a peculiar interest in this Union; in its integrity, its endurance, its strength—that strength is her strength; on that, her being, as well as her well-being, depends. I take a share in this debate for this sole purpose, and shall confine myself to this object. As to other topics introduced into this debate, however interesting they may be to this country—and interesting, very interesting, some of them are—I shall spare to the patience of the Senate any remarks of mine upon them, satisfied that their opinion upon them would not be further enlightened by any thing in my power further to offer.

Whether a State can decide upon the constitutionality of a law, and upon its obligation within a State, which has been so frequently affirmed or assumed in this debate, must depend upon the theory of the constitution. And here the inquiry is not, what that theory ought to be, but what it is; if it be not what it ought to be, the people, who made it, have the power, by an amendment, to make it what it ought to be. That theory may not be perfect, (though I think it is nearly so, as any thing human ever devised for the rule and happiness of mankind ever was, or probably ever will be; and that this is demonstrated by its results,) but whether perfect or imperfect, what is now wanted, is not its vindication, but its explication.

What, then, is that theory?

I understand it to be this: and that the different provisions of the compact all conspire to show it to be this—namely:

That the constitution of the United States is paramount to the State constitutions:

That all laws made in pursuance of the constitution of the United States, and all treaties made by the authority of the United States, are the supreme law of the land, any State law, made or to be made, to the contrary notwithstanding:

That all State judges are bound by this supreme law, any State law or constitution to the contrary notwithstanding:

That the Executive of the United States is charged with the duty of executing that supreme law:

That all questions arising from the conflict of the constitution of the United States, and any State constitution, or arising from the conflict of the laws of the United States and the laws or constitution of any State, or from the constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States, are to be settled by the courts of the United States; and that what they settle to be the supreme law of the land, is to be considered and taken to be the supreme law of the land, and is to be executed by the Executive as the supreme law of the land.

Such I understand to be the theory of the constitution of these United States; and whether for good or for evil, that such is its true theory.

For the constitution says—Article VI, clause 2d:

“This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.”

The constitution further says—Article III, sec. 1:

[SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[MAY 20, 1830.]

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and such other courts as the United States shall from time to time ordain and establish." And, section 2—"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority."

"It further says—same article, sec. 2:

"He (the Executive) shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

Then, I ask, is not the theory which I have stated, the necessary result of the provisions which I have read? To go over the parts of that theory, one by one, and to compare each with the provisions by which it is established: Is not the constitution of the United States paramount to the State constitutions? The words are, "that the constitution of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land."

Are not the laws made in pursuance of the constitution of the United States, and the treaties made by the United States, the supreme law of the land? So the constitution says in so many words, which have just been read, and need not be repeated.

Are not the questions arising from the conflict of the constitution of the United States with the State constitutions, and arising from the conflict of the laws of the United States and the State laws and constitutions, and arising from the conflict of the constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States, to be settled by the courts of the United States? The constitution says—

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

Is not the Executive of the Union to execute the laws of the Union? The constitution says, "he [the Executive] shall take care that the laws are faithfully executed."

Are not the final judgments of the courts of the United States to be executed by the Executive of the United States?

It is his proper and peculiar duty to execute them; to execute the laws faithfully, he must execute those judgments.

Then it follows, that what these courts finally decide the constitution to be, must be taken to be the constitution. The law, which they finally decide to be a law, made in pursuance of the constitution, must be taken to be a law made in pursuance of the constitution; a treaty which they finally decide to be a treaty made under and within the authority of the United States, to be a treaty made under and within the authority of the United States: and together must be taken to be the supreme law of the land, and must be executed as the supreme law. It must be so, unless there is some other tribunal authorized to rejudge those judgments; and to decide over the head of the United States' Judiciary. Need it be remarked that the constitution neither provides nor recognises any such tribunal; but, on the contrary, that it precludes the idea of any such tribunal, and that expressly? For, it expressly provides that "the judges of every State shall be bound by the law of the United States, the State constitution and laws to the contrary notwithstanding, and bound, as is necessarily implied, by that law as expounded by the courts of the United States; for the law of every government must be taken to be, as judicially expounded by that government. How then a State can be that other, ulterior, and superior tribunal, is beyond my comprehension. The doctrine, as a constitutional doctrine, appears to me infinitely preposterous, and to be without a particle of ground for its support.

Now, if abandoning the authority of the constitution for any such doctrine, it is contended that the doctrine results from the nature of a confederate government, formed by independent sovereignties, which seems to be the idea of some gentlemen, though not very distinctly stated and avowed, except by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, by whom it was very distinctly stated and avowed, it is enough to say that the nature of a confederate government is just what the confederates chose to make it, and have made it: and their rights and duties are determined by the compact which they have made. Now, the constitution of the United States is the compact of confederacy by these States; and that must determine their rights and their obligations. So that the doctrine, if it is to be maintained at all, must be maintained as a constitutional doctrine. Besides, it may be proper here to remark, that this government, though confederate, is not a mere confederacy, it is national as well as confederate; in many important features it is purely national. In its action it is wholly so; it acts upon individuals directly, and not on them through the States. It is the first instance of a government of that compound character which has existed in the world; and it is that character which constitutes its great excellence. It is that which gives to it all the advantages of a single State, combined with all the advantages of a confederacy, exempted from its evils: it is that which adapts it so admirably to our wide-spread and almost boundless domain, and to the almost countless millions that are to spread over to occupy and to fill it: it is that which gives to it a capacity to exert our energy every where, and equally every where, sufficient to preserve peace and maintain justice; and which, at the same time, restrains it every where, and equally every where, from exerting a power incompatible with freedom. Now, if this doctrine, that a State may interfere to arrest the operations of government, would result from the nature of a pure confederacy, (which, however, it would not, unless such was its nature from the terms of the compact, or its nature must depend upon those terms,) still how could it result from the nature of a government, not a pure confederacy, but partly confederate and partly national? Surely, so far as it is national, the nation is to determine whether the government shall cease, or its operations be suspended, and not a minority of the nation, as a single State must be.

Will it be said that the theory of the constitution, as thus interpreted, is unsafe for the States and their independent rights? That the power of the General Government (by this theory) being irresistible—and power being in its nature ambitious and grasping—may and will absorb the power of the States, it has been said; for this, I suppose, is what is meant by saying that the tendency of the General Government is to consolidation. If this were so, it would prove that the structure of our government is defective, and that some corrective for this defect ought to be supplied; but surely it would not follow that each State is to determine what that corrective shall be, and when and how it shall be supplied and applied; for all defects in the constitution, the constitution itself has prescribed the course for obtaining the remedy.

But, waiving this, how is the theory of the constitution, as thus interpreted, unsafe for the States and their independent rights? It is true we may suppose such an abuse of power in the General Government, and by a conspiracy of all its branches, at the same time, and for the same purpose, as would put in peril the States and their independent rights; and so it would, and equally so, all our rights; but then you must first suppose for such a degree of corruption of human nature itself as is wholly incompatible with any government which is a trust from the people. For it supposes a corruption of the Legislature in both its branches—a corruption of the Judiciary, and a corruption of the Executive; and a conspiracy of all these to betray the delegated trust of the people. Now, this is to suppose such a degree of corruption in a State itself, as, I repeat, is wholly incompatible with a government which is a government, which is a trust, and to be managed ac-ording to the trust. When that degree of corruption which is supposed takes place in a State, from that moment that State is doomed to the misrule of anarchy for a while, to be followed, and quickly, too, by the iron rule of despotism; and nothing human, nothing human, I repeat, can stay the hand of its destiny; nothing short of Omnipotence himself, and His almighty arm, can stay it. When that day shall arrive, the day that shall witness such a degree of corruption in the whole body of our public administration, it will argue a correspondent degree of corruption in the whole body of the people; and then we shall have no reason to talk about State rights, nor any rights; all, all, every right, State and national, will be buried, or hastening to their burial in the same common grave; on that grave we shall see planted the standard of despotism, unfurling its ensigns to the breeze, and waving in triumph over the buried rights of the nation. A gigantic tyranny, with his iron sceptre, will then crush this young and rising world. The wide earth will feel the calamity, and bewail the extinction of the last best hope of human kind. Thence I hold, that State rights and national rights are inseparably bound together in one common bond of fate; together to live, or together to perish:

"That one faith, one fame, one fate shall both attend."

For, observe, the States and their independent rights can only be assailed through the legislation of Congress; there the tyranny is to begin; there the law, which is to usurp and engross the appropriate favor of the States, is to be propounded and passed; which law the Judiciary is to sustain, and the Executive to carry into effect. Now all the members of the Legislature in both branches of Congress, they who are to make this law, which is to begin this usurpation and tyranny, come from the people—shortly to return to the people, and are themselves a part of the people. Now, who is the man, where is the man so infatuated as to give his vote for such a law? It would be in him an act of political suicide—it would be an act of treason to himself as well as to his country—it would be an act of self immolation, and without motive. Unless he gave it as a conspirator against the liberties of his country.

Where then is the danger to the States and their independent rights from the power of the General Government, admitting it to be what it has been explained to be, and irresistible? It is in fact no where to be found but in our imaginations; and in the supposition and picture of incredible cases. It appears to me that our jealousies on this head arise from the indistinctness of our notions as to State rights; from confounding things different in their nature, things distinguishable and which ought to be distinguished; in a word, from mistaking the common rights of the nation for the peculiar rights of the States.

State rights, as I understand them—I mean the rights which the States retain and possess, and exercise independently of the General Government—consist in the right of legislating exclusively on certain objects within the State; and in legislating not exclusively, but concurrently with the General Government on certain other objects within the State. That these State rights are limited to these limits of legislation, to these objects of exclusive and concurrent legislation; that the right of State jurisdiction is limited by these limits of legislation; and that the power of the State Executive has the same limits. If this be a correct definition of the limits of the independent rights of the States, (and, if it be not, let any one show any other State right not included within those limits, and I will abandon the inference which I am going to deduce therefrom)—I say, if this be a correct definition of the limits of State rights, independent of the General Government, it will follow, that all this clamor against the General Government, on the subject of State rights, is entirely without foundation. For no instance can be cited in which the General Government has usurped the power belonging to the States; that is, the power of legislating on subjects exclusively within the legislation of the States; nor of legislating exclusively on objects as to which the States have a right of concurrent legislation. No; not one instance in the whole history of the Government. Admitting, then, if you please, that the States have a right of self-defence as to their independent rights, it will be time enough to determine what is to be done when the necessity of such defence shall arise; that is, when the General Government shall usurp the power of legislating upon objects exclusively within the State legislation, or the power of legislating exclusively upon objects as to which the States have a right of concurrent legislation. If that time shall ever come, when the General Government, in all its branches, shall be so corrupt and abandoned as to conspire to usurp this power, (and to usurp it they must all conspire,) and to strip the States of these rights, and shall attempt to establish the usurpation, then let the States defend themselves; let them resist the attempt, and to the death, for then the compact will indeed be dissolved; then the question will be a question of force, between the oppressor on the one side, and the oppressed on the other, and the sword must decide it.

The right of self-defence, by this appeal to force, is the right of every people, in the last resort, under every form of government, whether single or confederate. In both, there is a line where forbearance with the Government ceases to be a duty, and where the right of resistance begins—in single governments, with the people, and in confederate, with the States. In single governments, this line may not be distinctly marked, and made visible to the eye, and then is to be determined rather by feeling than the understanding; but in a confederate government it may be distinctly marked, and made palpable to the understanding. And in ours it is so; in ours it is the line which has been indicated; the line which separates the independent rights of the States from the powers of the General Government; and which independent rights are obviously those, and those only which lie within the limits which have been defined. For all other rights, and which are called State rights, are as obviously the common rights of the nation, and not the peculiar and independent rights of the State.

If an act of the General Government shall exceed its authority under the constitution, but which act does not infringe any independent State right, that is the concern of the nation, not of any State in particular, any further than as it is part of the nation; and to judge of that act is no more a State right than it is an individual right. For instance, suppose the Government exceeds, or is supposed to exceed, its authority in the exercise of the treaty-making power; and suppose the purchase of Louisiana to be that instance, (and this was the opinion of some,) surely no State independent right was infringed by this act. No State, therefore, as a State, had any more right to judge and determine upon the unconstitutionality of the act, than any individual had. It was the concern of all, and of all equally. It was the whole people's business; and it was the business of their constituted authorities to determine it. The same may be said of the admission of Louisiana, as a State, into the Union, which was also deemed by some an unconstitutional act; and so of other acts of the like kind.

Again: if an act of the General Government exceeds its authority, but does not infringe any State independent right, but does infringe the right or rights of individuals, that is an affair between the individual and the General Government. Surely it is not a State right to adjudicate that affair, and redress that individual. For, by the compact, that affair is to be adjudicated under the authority of the General Government; the redress is to come from that authority; and, by the compact, a State has nothing to do with it. And were the State to interfere, it would be a manifest usurpation of power, far from being the exercise of a State right.

So as to all acts in prosecution of, or in furtherance of any schemes of national policy which may be deemed to be unauthorized by the constitution, but which do not infringe any independent State right, these are to be judged of and determined by the nation and the national authorities. No State has any thing to do with the adjudication, any further than as it makes a part of the nation, and speaks through the constituted authorities of the nation.

In a word, I am confident that no one act of the Government, of any class which has been complained of as unconstitutional, will be found, on examination, to touch any one independent State right; and that in every instance it will be found that it is the national right only, if any, that has been affected.

But are not these national rights as important to the nation, as the State rights are to the States? I agree that they are.

Now, suppose acts of the National Government to be violations of the constitution, but not violations of the State rights, and therefore the common concern of the nation, and not the peculiar concern of any State, what is to be done, and what is the remedy? I answer, the remedy lies with the nation. The law says it is unconstitutional; let the law be repealed; the nation has the power to repeal it; their elections give them this power; or let the National Judiciary say it is unconstitutional, and then it is repealed. But, suppose the Judiciary will not say it is unconstitutional, and the nation will not have it repealed. What, then, is the remedy? I answer, there is none, and that there ought to be none; for then it is a national question, settled by the nation, by a majority against the minority; and the law is to be deemed and taken to be constitutional; it must be so, unless you deny that great principle of all society, that a majority is to govern, and maintain that disorganizing principle, that a minority is not to submit to the will of the majority. Well, if not to submit, what then? Why then to separate, for there can be no other remedy. What follows? Why, that a minority of that minority, in a similar case, and which must happen, is also to separate; and the majority of that minority is in the same situation, and must go on with the same process, both dividing and subdividing, till the society itself is destroyed, or fitted up into family clans.

If a minority is not to submit to a majority, and if separation is to be the remedy for difference of opinion, and these the consequences of separation, the remedy is infinitely worse than the evil; for it is to destroy the very being of society; to remedy an evil which is necessary to all society; namely, the evil of difference of opinion. I repeat, that the remedy for all unconstitutional acts of the General Government affecting the nation lies in the power of the nation. For it is an entire mistake to suppose, as has been supposed, that the Supreme Court is the ultimate arbiter in these cases. For though the Supreme Court may decide a law to be constitutional which is not constitutional, a thing, by the way, not very likely to happen, they cannot continue the law. It rests with the nation to determine whether it shall be continued, or shall be repealed. And if the Supreme Court misinterpret the constitution, a thing as unlikely to happen, it lies in the power of the nation to apply the remedy, and correct the error; it lies in the power of amendment. So it is the nation, and not the Supreme Court, who is the ultimate arbiter in all those cases.

If the constitutional principles which I have now attempted to develop, are true constitutional principles, and if I have been so fortunate as to make the development intelligible to the Senate, they will show them that the constitutional doctrines to which I have alluded and excepted are erroneous, and ought to be repudiated; and, if dangerous to the stability of the Union, that they ought to be reprobated. For it is not easy even to imagine the value of that stake which we all have in the integrity of this Union, the great States as well as the small. This beautiful and almost boundless country; this splendid patrimony of our fathers; this, if we are wise, still more splendid inheritance of our children, and of their children, down to the latest generations of our posterity; as to all that it now is, and as to all that we hope it may be; all, all is put to hazard by the hazard of this Union. And to talk of calculating the value of the Union! as if it could be counted in dollars and cents—a value which no power of numbers can express, no stretch of imagination can embrace, and which baffles every effort of the mind to comprehend in its magnitude!

This happy work of our Union, consummated by our happy constitution, I am wont to consider as the offspring of something more than human wisdom, great as that wisdom was in its founders and framers: for, as we are taught, “there is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth it understanding.” And I believe (I hope not superstitiously, but piously) that it was manifest in that work. I believe it a providential event, marking the divine favor on this favored land; and, of the many marks of that favor to be noted in our short but eventful history, I believe that to be the most signal.

The Union! I am wont to consider it as the guardian angel of this country, commissioned by the Almighty to preside over her high destinies, and to lead her on to their fulfilment to a glory, as I fondly believe, that eye hath not seen, of which the ear hath not heard; in whose blaze the master States of the world will be lost, as stars are lost in the blaze of the noontide sun. And to talk of calculating the value of this Union!

It may assist us to form some estimate of this value, though very inadequate, by endeavoring to form some estimate, though equally inadequate, of its loss.

What would be the new state of things if this Union should be broken up, we cannot exactly know; but what it may be, it is easy to imagine. Whether broken up into separate confederacies, or into isolated sovereignties, the evils would be equally certain and equally appalling. To state a few of the most prominent, and but to hint at these: The Union, which now is their strength, would be lost and gone; their weakness would render them defenceless against a foreign power; wars among themselves, sooner or later, would become inevitable; burthens would be fearfully increased, while the means of meeting them would be as fearfully diminished; privations of all sorts would be grievously multiplied; standing armies would be the consequence of wars and the danger of subjugation, and the loss of liberty the consequence of standing armies. This dreadful state of things would last till, to consummate the misery, some fortunate ambitious chief, in consequence of his splendid achievements, should be able to clothe himself with the imperial purple, establish a new dynasty, and support it by his victorious legions. Now, say whether the value of the Union can be calculated and told in dollars and cents, when such will be or may be consequences of its dissolution!

Mr. FOOT said that the resolution under consideration, proposing an inquiry into the condition of the public lands—a subject of very great and increasing interest, not only on account of their intrinsic value, but as connected with the settlement, the growth, and prosperity of the country—had been made the occasion for a debate, perhaps as able and interesting as any which had ever engaged the attention of the Senate. The strong interest which had been manifested, by the unusual attention of the public mind, and the avidity with which the speeches of Senators had been sought and extensively read, had evidenced the deep solicitude and intense interest which had been felt through the whole community. Nor was this matter of surprise. The various and interesting topics which had been introduced and discussed were calculated to produce that effect.

This debate [said Mr. F.] will form a compendious history of the policy of our Government, from its commencement for a half century, its progress in the arts as well as in arms, its trials and its triumphs. It has exposed the machinations and plots which have been formed against it, and their latent causes. It has shown with what perfect ease the majesty of the laws has been maintained, and the constitution preserved from every insidious as well as open attack; and has demonstrated the correctness of Mr. Jefferson's opinion, "that error may safely be tolerated while reason is left free to combat it." It has disappointed the hopes of the enemies of our republican form of Government, and furnished additional evidence that "man is capable of self-government." And, although in the ardor of debate, and in the latitude of discussion, some expressions have been used which savored too much of personal hostility and sectional jealousy, it has shown that "every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle;" and that, notwithstanding all our prejudices, and all our jealousies, there still exists, in every section of the country, an attachment to our free institutions, to the constitution, and to the union of the States, so sincere and so ardent, that we may, with pride and pleasure, proclaim to the world—"The republic is safe!"

Although this protracted debate has, in some measure, defeated the object which induced me to offer the resolution—which, in my opinion, was one of great importance—still I can say, with the utmost sincerity, it causes no regret. Much valuable information has been elicited in relation to the public lands, and a rich fund in relation to the genius, the structure, and policy of the Government, which will be invaluable to the rising generation and to posterity. It will be my main purpose, in pursuance of the original design, to defend the resolution and myself from some attacks made at the commencement of the discussion, and to urge its adoption.

The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] when the resolution first came up for consideration, declared, "It is time to make a stand, to face about, and to fight a decisive battle for the West!" And, sir, he entered the field with his bloody standard, with this motto—"War to the knife, and the knife to the hilt!" With this tremendous "yell," and such "notes" of "preparation," what were we to expect? Our only alternative was desperate resistance or indiscriminate "butchery!" I suppose we are to conclude the decisive battle has been fought. The Senator kept up a brisk fire for four days, besides some skirmishing with the "outposts" for several succeeding days. The firing has now ceased on the part of the assailant, and with it a "clamor que virum, clangor que Tubarum." What has been the result of his attack upon the resolution, or the mover of the resolution? or upon the Middle States, or the citadel of New England?

It would, perhaps, be considered rather unkind to quote upon him "Montes parturiunt," &c.; but, sir, it can give him no offence to quote an expression of his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE] "he has been driven back discomfited!" especially since he gave public thanks to the "generous South" for the tariff.

It is probable the Senator had never heard the derivation of the term Yankee, when he attacked the "Universal Yankee Nation." That he may understand better the character of those people in any future contest, I will give him its origin, so far as it has come to my knowledge. Tradition says that, during the Revolutionary war, two citizens of Connecticut were sent to New York to negotiate an exchange of prisoners. At the table of the commander of the British army, where these gentlemen were invited to dine, (not, however, for any votes they had given,) the term "Yankee" was overheard in an under tone. Lord Howe, in a pleasant manner, asked these gentlemen the meaning of the term "Yankee," which he had heard at his table, (casting a look of reproof and censure upon some young officers from whom it came.) The reply was—"It is derived from two Indian words, signifying Wasp and Hornet, and is full of meaning—the Wasp never abandons the citadel; the Hornet drives the enemy from his borders."

The resolution which the Senator compared to "Pandora's box" is not yet demolished, but waiting very patiently for the decision of the Senate. Nor is it considered by the Senators from the West generally as "full of evils;" and surely the Senator himself must acknowledge the mover has not been much moved by his attacks, and may be assured he will decline his polite invitation to Missouri for information. It is expected here; the resolution asks for information; and, after the generous offer of full information at Missouri, it is expected the Senate will not refuse the committee the opportunity to furnish it. To prove the hostility of the East, the Senator has culled the yeas and nays for forty years—and what does he find? Men voting upon principle, honestly and consistently—men who did not change with every wind: votes which ought to make none but political trimmers and demagogues blush for inconsistency! And fortunate, indeed, will it be for that Senator, if, at some future period in the annals of this country, some ruthless hand should disturb his ashes, the journals will show as much purity of intention, and patriotism, and as much consistency in his political course, as has been found by him in his fruitless search for evidence of hostility to "his West—his country—not mine." But, sir, where does he find hostility to the West? Where was "his West?" where was Missouri, when those votes were given? A Spanish Province. Where would Missouri have been, if Mr. Jefferson's advice had been followed, "to shut up the West—to prohibit any whites to settle north of Arkansas river, and to reserve it for the Indians?"

But the Hartford Convention, aye, the Hartford Convention! Here was hostility to the West! Although the Senator has excepted me from any participation in the Hartford Convention, I have only to say, the people of New England themselves have settled that business, by giving the authors and abettors leave to retire to private life, where they will remain, unless the Senator or his political friends call them from their dignified retirement.

One word to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE] who knows but little of the republicanism of New England, if he places any of the Essex Junto at its head, and who has also made a furious attack upon the federalism of New England. If the republicans of South Carolina will make the same disposition of their rash and imprudent men as the republicans of New England have done of those among them, the union of the States will be in no danger. Sir, I do not find that New England has suffered much in this contest; few laurels have ever been gained in that section by her enemies; whether savage or civilized, internal or external, she never has asked or received much assistance from her sister States. Her own resources have been abundant in every emergency. She has borne her full share of public burthens and sufferings. The blood of her sons has flowed freely in the defence of other parts of the Union, and their bones are whitening on almost every battle ground. She yields to none in liberal and generous sacrifices in her country's cause. She is attached strongly to the Union; her children are in every State; she feels no hostility or jealousy to any part of the Union; she seeks the common good; and sees, "more in sorrow than in anger," the various attempts to excite prejudice against her; but she relies with full confidence on her own consciousness of rectitude and strict justice to others, and asks nothing more than a kind return of reciprocal good feeling and confidence. But, sir, to such as are disposed to excite these sectional jealousies, I will only recommend a careful perusal of Washington's Farewell Address, and leave them to the "gnawings of their own conscience," and the execrations of all good men.

This resolution proposes an inquiry into the condition

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

of the public lands; and "we must not even inquire," says the Senator from Missouri, [MR. BENTON:] "it is against a high moral principle on which he stands," and this was echoed by the Senator from New Hampshire, [MR. WOODBURY.] And pray, sir, what is this great moral principle? "It is not right to inquire into the expediency of doing wrong." If he had said it is not right to do wrong, and would always stand on that ground, he would be entitled to much credit. Sir, the Senator has boasted much of "carrying the war into the enemy's country," and he will pardon me for retaliating in such a warfare. If any thing has effectually checked the sale of the public lands, it has been his bill "for graduating the price of the public lands, and giving them to the States in which they lie." For proof of this, I appeal to the reports of the land commissioners, and to Senators living in those States—and, under this resolution, the committee may find an effectual remedy. Reject the graduating bill, and the evil is entirely removed.

MR. FOOT said that, believing most fully in the doctrines of a former President of the United States, "that the acquisition of the public lands, made at the expense of the whole Union, not only in treasure, but also in blood, marks a right of property in them equally extensive," and that the public domain is the common property of all the States; and considering, also, the high responsibility resting on Congress, to make such a disposition of the public lands as will promote the general interests of all the States, I proposed this resolution for the consideration of the Senate.

And although the Senator from Missouri [MR. BENTON] has said "the West is his country, not mine—he knows it, I do not," he must allow me to press the inquiry, notwithstanding his great zeal on every question in relation to his favorite subject—the public lands.

The Senator from Indiana, [MR. NOBLE,] who has said, "we are in possession, and we will have the land, and distance shall be defeat," as well as the Senator from Missouri, [MR. BENTON,] seemed to insinuate that I was trespassing on forbidden ground. But, sir, they must remember, that my State, being one of the "old thirteen," has never quit-claimed her right and title to the public lands; and, like a prudent parent, has not thought it advisable to give up all the property to the children, and trust to filial affection alone for support: and whatever may be their opinions, they must allow me the privilege of judging for myself in what way the interests of my own State will best be promoted. Whatever may be their object in commencing such an attack on a harmless resolution for inquiry merely, the effect has been to increase my solicitude for a full investigation. Nothing can excite stronger doubts of the soundness of any principle, or raise more suspicion of lurking mischief, than an overweening anxiety to exclude the light, and veil the subject in mystery and darkness. And I presume every one has, by this time, become fully satisfied that this unexpected and unprecedented attack, made by them on this resolution, has produced a great portion, if not all the excitement raised upon this subject. Resolutions of this character, merely directing inquiry, are of such frequent occurrence, that even when they are published in the journals, and suffered to pass without opposition, they produce no excitement; and the people wait for the report of the committee; and why was this resolution opposed? Was any favorite "graduating bill" thought to be in danger? Sir, a full report from the committee, on the subject of the public lands, would save much useless discussion on many bills relating to the public lands, which embrace about one-half of all our legislation.

In one point we all agree, that this subject is one of great and increasing interest.

The quantity of public land has been estimated at more than one thousand millions of acres; three hundred and seventeen millions within the States and Territories, and seven hundred and fifty millions without those limits; two hundred and sixty-seven millions are free from the Indian claims, and eight hundred millions still subject to their claims, of which fifty-five millions are within the limits of the States and organized Territories; and will it be contended that this subject is not of sufficient importance to justify, and even to demand, our attention to the management of this concern?

The Senators have seen fit to charge, not only on me, but upon the section of the country in which I reside, hostility to the Western States, and various attempts to prevent emigration to the West: and the Senator from Missouri [MR. BENTON] promised to "trace the progress of these measures to check emigration for forty-four years!" How has he redeemed his pledge? He has gone back far beyond his own experience or mine; and, sir, I think he has found it a Herculean task. We have often heard such charges from his own lips; what is the proof? does he get it from Spain? The public mind will no longer be satisfied with a mere repetition of such charges, often made, but supported only by repeated declarations and averments. It is not sufficient proof of these charges, for the Senator to quote his own speech on the tariff, in which he says, he commented severely "on the report of the Secretary, and no Senator contested the propriety of the construction he put upon it." Sir, this Secretary was not from New England. The tariff policy has been charged upon New England, within these walls, and throughout the Southern States. Sir, Senators on this floor certainly must know this charge is wholly unfounded. South Carolina has supported one tariff; the Middle and Western States have had their tariff. But no tariff has been supported by a majority of New England votes! It has been forced upon her. This fact is well known—the journals prove it—and I hope it may never again be misrepresented.

If the Senator proposes to draw arguments from his own speeches, he may indeed have a wide field; but the force of his arguments may not appear as great to others as to himself; and, if no Senator replies to him, does it furnish full proof that his arguments are unanswerable? Other reasons may exist why no one should be disposed to answer him.

The people of New England are intelligent; and it has been said they look well to their own interests; but this is no proof of hostility to others. They consider the citizens of the United States as children of one great family; our fathers, our children, our brothers and sisters, have gone to every State and Territory of this Union, and their children mingle with ours in our schools and colleges. We are bound together by the strongest ties of interest, of affection, and of consanguinity. What possible ground for suspicion of hostility can exist, except in a distemperred imagination?

One word to the Senator from Indiana, [MR. NOBLE] who has said "the lands are their own, and they will have them, and distance shall be defeat!" I ask, where does he find the power, as a Senator in Congress, to vote away these lands? Has the State Legislature instructed or authorized him to vote away their lands? And as to the great excitement of which he speaks, if any such exists, it is factitious: in common language, "got up for effect." And how can the Senator from Illinois [MR. KANE] oppose this resolution, when he has attempted to prove that a radical and "thorough change in the land system is desirable, if not indispensable?" Or even the Senator from Missouri, [MR. BENTON] who has been pressing his bill "for graduating the price of public lands" for years, and has told his constituents "he had strong hopes of carrying that favorite measure during the present session, when he expected to retire from the councils of the nation;" that is, if the newspapers tell the truth? And with respect to the Senator from New Hampshire, [MR. WOON-

[SENATE.]

HURRY who said "he should vote against this resolution, because he would do in this respect as in his own case—he should be opposed to inquiry." I should probably concur in the opinion that the Senator would be an unsafe adviser; nor can I feel the force of his argument drawn from Persia. But, if the Senator claims to be the ambassador and minister plenipotentiary of all the republicans of New England, (and we have witnessed his coronation with all the forms and solemnities of Papal power, and heard him pronounced to be the "Peter and Rock on which the Republican Church shall be built," by the Senator from Missouri,) [Mr. BENTON]—we should like to see his credentials—let him produce his commission, show its date, by whom signed—we want to see his instructions—that we may know with what special mission he is charged; whether with a general superintendence of all the interests of republicans, or merely, in his own language, "to set history right"—his own (as we may suppose) or the history of his new republican party—their origin, their manners and customs, and the particular object of the party which has confided to him the conservation of all the republicanism of New England. New England is represented on this floor by as good a portion of real, genuine republicans of the old school, as any section of this Union: and he must allow me to disclaim and deny any authority vested in him to represent the republicans of Connecticut. The republicans of 1798 are not to be "stretched on the bed of any modern Procrustes, or cut to its length;" they never have, and they never will, range themselves under the flag of the Essex junta. Republicans constitute a large majority, and they will not consent that their number shall be circumscribed within the narrow limits of the supporters of this administration; nor will they hail them all as political brethren, while the Essex junta and ultra federalists form so great a portion of their forces, and receive so large a share of Executive favors. They do not consider it to be sound republican doctrine, to remove from office an old faithful democrat and soldier of the Revolution, to make a place for an ultra federalist. A certain letter to Mr. Monroe revived the hopes of the federal party. That these hopes have not been disappointed, this Chamber has furnished ample proof. I do not complain of this; but I do protest against such a prostitution of the republican name and character. Let things be called by their right names; we ask no more. The Senator's favorite doctrine of proscription, "that in every change of a President all the old officers, from a sense of decency, ought to retire, and, if they do not resign, they should be dismissed," is not the doctrine of the republicans of Connecticut, as their acts will show. Our motto is, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, "equal and exact justice to all, of whatever State or persuasion, religious or political."

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GREENBURY] has alluded to Mr. Jefferson's proceedings in relation to my native State. If the Senator will examine Mr. J.'s letter to the New Haven remonstrants, and his refusal to remove the collector at New London, he will find a standard by which the proceedings of this administration will by no means bear the test. "The right of private opinion shall suffer no invasion from me," was Mr. Jefferson's language; and the wide difference between Mr. Jefferson's and the present administration is, he found a monopoly of office in the hands of one party, and the present administration seems determined to make a similar monopoly.

But, to return to the subject of the resolution. The first provision for the sales of the public lands was established by the act of 18th May, 1796, "providing for the sale of the lands of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river." This act provides for surveying and laying off in townships of six miles square; one-half of these townships, taken, alternately, to be subdivided into sections of six hundred and forty acres; and reserves salt springs, with a township contiguous, and four sections at the centre of each township. This act directs the immediate sale of the lands thus surveyed, and also the land unsold in the seven ranges of townships surveyed under the ordinance of 20th May, 1785, and directs the mode of payment; one-twentieth at the time of sale, to be forfeited if one-half be not paid in thirty days, and one year's credit on the balance; declares all navigable rivers, public highways; and in all rivers not navigable, owned by different persons, the bed and stream shall be common to both. This principle has been established in relation to all lands sold by the United States.

By the provisions of the act of the 3d of March, 1807, the President is authorized to remove, by force, any person who shall take possession or settle upon any of the public lands; and, since this discussion has commenced, he seems determined to enforce this law.

The act of January 14th, 1812, declares that no land sold at public sale, and reverted to the United States on account of failure to complete the payment, shall be sold at private sale at a less price than that for which the same tract was sold at public sale.

The act of 25th April, 1812, "for the establishment of a General Land Office in the Department of the Treasury," forms the basis of our present land system. Some of the most material alterations effected by subsequent acts, will be noticed, for the purpose of affording an outline of the present system; and the most important is in the act of 24th April, 1820, "making further provision for the sale of the public lands," which merits particular attention, as it produced almost an entire change in the whole system, by changing the former credit system to cash sales; reducing the price of the public lands from two dollars to one dollar twenty-five cents per acre; authorizing the sale of smaller tracts; and requiring that the land shall be offered at public sale, in half-quarter sections, or eighty acres, and may be so purchased and entered at private sale. This was an important and very beneficial provision for the actual settler. And, as a further inducement to the purchaser, it is expressly enacted that "no lands shall be sold, either at public or private sale, for a less price than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre," pledging the faith of the Government absolutely to the purchaser, that the Government will not prejudice his interest, by disposing of any of their lands below the price fixed by law. By the fourth section of the same act, a further provision is made for the relief and benefit of those who had purchased on credit, and whose lands had become forfeited and had reverted to the United States for non-payment of the purchase money under the former credit system, allowing them a short time to make entry upon the lands relinquished by them, and prohibiting any person to enter such lands after the 1st of July then next, until the same had been offered at public sale. These provisions, with the pre-emption rights granted, have been always considered as affording great facilities to actual settlers. The seventh section of this act provides that "no land shall be purchased on account of the United States, except under a law authorizing such purchase." This is a very important provision, and it is to be wished that it may never be violated.

It will be recollected that, previous to the passage of the act of 1820, above recited, the purchasers of the public lands, under the credit system, had become indebted to the United States in an amount exceeding twenty millions of dollars. On the 2d March, 1821, Congress passed the "act for the relief of the purchasers of public lands, prior to the 1st day of July, 1820," allowing to those purchasers the privilege of relinquishing portions of the purchased lands, and applying the payments already made by instalments, to such portions of these lands as they chose to retain; and remitted and discharged the debtors from the payment of all the interest which had accrued, or would accrue, to the 30th of September then next; and a further provision allowed a discount or deduction of thirty-seven and a half per cent. upon all complete and full payments made before the 30th September next ensuing; and, by subsequent acts, these privileges and facilities have been extended to the 10th April, 1825, and virtually extended by an act passed this session. Several other liberal provisions are included in this act, but it is not necessary to enumerate them for my purpose, except the tenth section, which provides that "no land surrendered under this act shall be offered for sale for the term of two years after the surrender;" allowing in fact two years more for the benefit of the purchaser. Sir, this act was received with much satisfaction by the purchasers of public lands, and considered by all as an act, not only of justice merely, but of great liberality to the debtors; for the public lands, notwithstanding the ungracious charges which have been made by certain members of both Houses of Congress within a few years, and by the Senator [Mr. BEXTON] during the present session, in which he boldly declares that "nothing has been done for the West;" that, in all the appropriations for internal improvements, only about "seventy thousand dollars had been for the benefit of the West." Sir, the appropriations, in land only, for the benefit of the Western States, according to a return from the department, in answer to a resolution of mine, amounts to a sum exceeding ten millions of dollars; the land being valued at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. No complaint is made of this. My own vote will be found in favor of as many of these appropriations as in my opinion sound policy and our power under the constitution would permit. And it may be well suspected, from the course of this debate, that the very liberal provisions of our laws, for the benefit of the new States, have been made the foundation of the ungrateful insinuations and direct charges of hostility to the West. An ungrateful heart is never satisfied, or won by the increase of favors—"the more you give, the more you may," is often exemplified, and the greatest favors are too often repaid by the grossest ingratitude. This charge is by no means intended for the West generally; the West is high-minded, honorable, brave, and magnanimous; but she has some unworthy sons.

But really, if it has come to this, that we may not even inquire whether our system needs revision, without being told "it is not a proper subject of inquiry," that "it is time to make a stand, to face about, and to fight a decisive battle for the West, with 'war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt,'" for one, I was ready to meet this terrible crisis. It was best to meet it at once, and not wait for the time of which we have been forewarned, that, "as soon as they get strength, they will take the public domain, without asking the consent of Congress!" And, if it is seriously claimed that the public lands are the property of the States in which they lie, why are we called upon every year for an appropriation for the expense of surveys of the public lands? Do these States claim the lands as their own, and require us to survey them? It becomes a question of some importance, whether we shall go on surveying lands at an expense of sixty or eighty thousand dollars a year, or abolish both the surveyors' offices and the land offices. The Commissioner of the Land Office has recommended that the number be reduced.

I will now come directly to the question, and give the reasons why, in my opinion, the sales of the public lands ought to be limited, in the manner proposed in the resolution. It must be admitted, the land now in market, and subject to entry at private sale, at the minimum price, is more than sufficient for the demand for many years to come. From the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to which I referred in offering the resolution, more than seventy-two millions of acres were unsold, which were subject to entry at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. From some of the largest land districts no sales have been made, and no returns were received. These added, will probably increase the amount to more than eighty millions. The quantity of land sold is estimated at about twenty millions; appropriated for education, military bounties, improvements in roads and canals, &c. twenty millions of acres, making one hundred and twenty millions of acres, and leaving about thirty millions already surveyed, which have not yet been exposed to sale. The land surveyed previous to 1828 was one hundred and thirty-eight millions. The above estimate allows twelve millions of acres to have been surveyed within the last two years, making the whole quantity of lands surveyed one hundred and fifty millions of acres; from which, deducting the quantity sold, and that which has been appropriated by Congress for education, roads, &c. forty millions, will leave one hundred and ten millions now surveyed and undisposed of, eighty millions in market for sale, and subject to entry at the minimum price, and thirty millions ready to be brought into market at any moment to meet the demand. To this may be added a considerable portion of the lands which have been appropriated by Congress; for it is but fair to presume that no greater portion of these lands has been sold to actual settlers, than of the lands in the hands of the Government. Taking this basis of computation, it appears that thirty millions more must be added; add, also, the quantity of lands in the hands of speculators and land companies, and the original purchasers, which have never been occupied, and we may safely estimate the quantity of wild lands now in market for sale to actual settlers, at one hundred and twenty millions of acres. Indeed, the Senator seemed much alarmed because lands were offered for sale in Maine.

The Commissioner of the Land Office estimates the demand for land at one million acres annually. The annual sales for forty years, since the public lands have been offered for sale, have scarcely averaged half a million of acres per annum, notwithstanding the great rage for land speculation during some portion of that period; and it is to be presumed that more than this quantity is needed to induce emigration of actual settlers to the West. Probably not one-half of the lands already sold are in the hands of actual settlers, although some have been sold by the United States more than forty years. There is no doubt the limitation of sales of the public lands contemplated by the resolution will discourage speculators and others who look more to their own interest than the public weal, and from them opposition is to be expected. I ask the attention of the Senate particularly to this part of the discussion; and, if my positions are incorrect, the Senators from those States in which the lands lie will correct me. My opinion is, that neither the interests of the United States, nor the best interests of the new States, will be promoted by forcing such immense quantities of public lands into the market. It will not be denied that the quantity now in market is amply sufficient to meet the demand for actual settlers for half a century. But the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] has told us these one hundred and twenty millions of acres are "scraps—mere refuse—the leavings of repeated sales and pickings—the crumbs that remain after others are served." If the statement of the Senator be correct, it certainly presents a very different picture of the allurements and fascinations of the West—"the Garden of the World"—from the one which has been held up to the emigrant. Are these the "rich bottoms"—the fertile regions—the "inexhaustible depth of soil," of which we have so often heard? In one hundred and fifty millions of acres, has there been found but twenty millions fit for cultivation? and is the remainder mere refuse? In what way does the Senator expect to sustain the dense population which his imagination but a few years since discovered "reposing on the bosom of the mother Earth, in the Valley of the Mississippi and the Western States?"

But, let us strip off the drapery thrown around this subject, and examine it minutely. How have these sales been effected? A large quantity of land is surveyed, on the application of squatters and speculators—the President issues his proclamation, that on a future day this land will be exposed to public sale. Does any one believe that the actual settler attends these sales? I beg the attention of Senators, who must know the facts better than myself. Is there not a combination immediately formed among the companies of speculators? and are not the most choice lands selected by them, and purchased at the minimum price? for our sales for several years prove that the minimum price only is obtained; and if the minimum price was ten cents the acre, would not the small part, and of the choicest land, sold at public sale, be sold at ten cents? Dare the actual settlers attempt to bid upon these "purse-proud companies and land speculators?" I acknowledge my obligation to Senators living in those States, and conversant with the subject, for this idea, and expression. The Senator has told you the West is "his country, not mine; he knows it, I do not." But, I think, by this investigation, we are likely to become somewhat better acquainted with it, and with the manner of disposing of the public lands, which may be useful. The quantity disposed of at these sales is governed entirely by these companies—some small sales of first quality, and advantageous locations, are bid off, enough to subject the land to entry at the minimum price; and all that remains is set down by the Senator as "scraps, mere refuse." But let it be remembered, about thirty millions have been surveyed, and not yet exposed to sale, which will supply the demand for several years for settlement only beside "scraps" of former sales; and here the settler may have his "new land, his first choice," as the Senator expresses it. But I will pursue this subject of the management of the speculators no further; but refer the Senate to the description given by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. McKINTY] in support of his bill for the relief of the actual settlers, in which he disclosed the plans of operation of these speculators, and proved, most conclusively, from facts within his own knowledge, that these "speculators controlled the sales of the public lands, and absolutely cheated both the Government and the actual settlers;" and also a statement made by a former receiver of the land office at Huntsville, in the same State, (Alabama,) now among the files of the Senate,—“that at the sales of public lands, which commenced by proclamation of the President, on the first Monday in February, in the year 1818, at Huntsville, a formidable company appeared, which had been formed for the purpose of putting down competition amongst attending bidders, and purchasing the most valuable lands at reduced prices, intending to make re-sale, and divide the profits of the speculation, and that himself and the other officers of the Government, and the superintendents of the sale, were invited to join them, and participate in the proceeds.” Such proceedings beggar comment; I leave them for the consideration of the Senate.

Another reason why I wish the sale of public lands limited, is, to preserve the present land system. So long as you permit squatters to go on in advance of your surveys, and make selections of the choice lands, and then follow them with surveys and sales, you constantly increase the cupidity of speculators, and scatter a very sparse population over an immense tract of country, wholly destitute of the means of either literary or religious instruction, who will be incessantly calling on the Government for protection. They have been constantly intruding upon the Indian reservations, which have been guaranteed to them by the United States: the Indians, goaded to desperation, seize, perhaps, their cattle, or, in defence of their rights, raise the tomahawk, and "the welkin rings" with the cry of "horrible Indian outrages," the military force is called out, and the depredations of the whites upon this miserable remnant of a noble race is made the occasion for destroying perhaps a whole tribe, "vastly more sinned against than sinning;" or a bill is introduced into Congress, for thirty or forty thousand dollars to pay for damages done by the Indians. The history of our Indian wars will show that most of these wars have been produced by unlawful encroachments upon the Indians; and it would seem that the cupidity of our people will never be satisfied while the Indians possess an acre of land which is thought to be better than the lands in our possession, or in which valuable minerals have been discovered by squatters or trappers and hunters.

The disposal of the public lands has been, in this way, absolutely wrested from the Government, and monopolized by speculators and squatters; the land system is virtually broken down, and we are gravely told, "it is best for us it should be so," and nothing remains for us but to give the squatters pre-emption rights; and, instead of legislating for them, we are to legislate after them, in full pursuit to the Rocky Mountains, or to the Pacific Ocean. Your system of cash sales is destroyed, and a worse system than the old credit system grown up; the solemn plighted faith of the Government to the Indians, "to protect and defend them in their possessions," forms no barrier; and the solemn treaties guarantying their possessions for ever, means nothing further, and no longer, than until some good land or mineral is found in their possession, and then they must remove. But the sympathies of the good people of the United States are aroused; they begin to see and understand the course of policy which is hurrying these poor untutored sons of the forest, and once lords of the soil, to swift and inevitable destruction; and are beginning to cry out, spare these poor Indians! And their voice of mercy must and will be heard! And it becomes us to see to it, that our plighted faith does not become proverbial, as the "punica fides" of ancient times: and that the Indian may not say, Timeo Danaos dona ferentes!

By confining the sales of public lands to those already in market, we shall give the greatest possible encouragement to actual settlers; the hopes and the plans of the speculators will be entirely frustrated, a steady and industrious population will rapidly increase, and the other new States will present the same animating scene which the rapid settlement of Ohio has presented. The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office furnishes proof in this respect, more valuable and interesting than volumes of theory and idle speculation. It shows us the sale of twenty-five thousand acres of land in one year, in a district in which there is but a small portion of public land; and probably the whole amount to actual settlers. Three hundred thousand dollars were received from Ohio during the last year. The interest of the United States is perfectly identified with the interests of the new States; both are interested in the settlement of those States by an industrious and honest population. The best interests of both will be promoted by putting down that system of speculation, which, as the Senator from Alabama very justly expressed it, "cheats both the Government and the actual settler." For a short period, perhaps, the receipts from the sale of public lands might not equal the present amount. But it cannot be the policy of the Government to follow the example of the improvident spendthrift, who cuts down all his valuable timber in a few years, and leaves his plantation stripped of its most valuable productions. The moneys received from the sales of public lands form but a small part of its real value to the country; the proper facilities for encouragement of actual settlements, and the security which the Government is bound to afford to its citizens within its limits—not only against violence, but also against imposition, frauds, and oppression, imperiously demand the inquiry, whether the land system cannot be saved from total destruction. Whether some plan cannot be devised, which shall promote the interest of the United States; the States in which the public lands lie—and the actual settler, the emigrant from the old States—and this is the object of the resolution. If the inquiry proposed is too limited, let it be extended to embrace the whole subject; it will have my full acquiescence: and I assure the Senators who so suddenly took the alarm, when the resolution was offered, that they much mistake my views and feelings, if they believe me unfriendly to their interests; but they must not claim the lands as their own. They shall have my hearty co-operation in any plan for encouraging emigration to their States, which shall secure the emigrant a solid good, and not hold out delusive prospects which can never be realized—a plan which shall promote the best interests of the United States, and, at the same time, the best interests of the new States—by securing to them a sound and healthful population, which shall make the “wilderness to bud and blossom as the rose, and the solitary places become vocal with the high praises of our God.”

Here I leave the subject involved in the resolution; but some other subjects which have been introduced on this occasion demand at least an expression of opinion on my part, since they have (in sailor language) been “spliced” upon this resolution; and the first is the power of the Federal Judiciary. Although, I have uniformly been the advocate of State rights, I never have, and never shall, claim for them those rights which have been vested by the constitution in the courts of the United States; and, in my opinion, no danger is to be apprehended, as long as we give to the constitution a fair construction. The judicial power is clearly defined in the second section of the third article, and extends to all cases arising under the constitution and the laws of the United States, &c.—to controversies in which the United States is a party, to controversies between States, between a State and citizens of another State, &c. It would seem as if no question could arise in relation to a power so clearly defined. I find no power given or reserved to a State to put its veto upon any decision of this court; and I am for strict construction; but, as this subject was introduced by the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and the members of that committee and others are more competent to discuss and decide that question than those who are not professional men, I leave this branch of the subject in the proper hands.

Another, and highly important question, and one in which the purity if not the very foundation of our Government rests, has been introduced by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GAUNDY] viz. the power of the President on the subject of appointments to office. I use this language in preference to the language of the mover, “the power of removal,” because it embraces (in my view) the whole case, and does not restrict me to a proposition which, in my judgment, begs at least half the question. The constitution declares, the President shall nominate, and, “by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, &c. But Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of certain officers in the President alone, &c. He shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of the next session; officers may be removed by impeachment.” This quotation embraces every provision of the constitution on the subject of appointments and removals. It never has been contended that the President has the sole power of appointment, unless authorized by special law. Congress has authorized the President in certain cases of temporary inability, by vacancies in certain offices in the departments, to assign some person to discharge the duties for six months. It is admitted that the constitution does not authorize the President to remove from any civil office. But, it is contended that, by virtue of his executive powers, and to enable him to comply with his oath, “to see that the laws are faithfully executed,” he must of necessity possess the power of making removals, and that this power has been exercised by every President. In my opinion, the necessity does not exist; for certainly the exercise of a greater power cannot be necessary, when a less power is sufficient to meet the exigency of the case. Nor do I admit that, in making removals by former Presidents, any such power has been claimed, as has been advocated on this floor—the power of making removals “at his pleasure.” Certainly no necessity exists for removing a faithful officer; his oath, to see that the laws are faithfully executed, cannot require it. In addition to this, if it becomes necessary to suspend the functions of an officer, for malfeasance, as the laws have made provision for assigning another to perform temporarily the duties of an incompetent officer, it would seem that suspension would be sufficient, and was contemplated by the act of Congress making such provision.

The act of July 27th, 1789, has been relied on as giving the power of removal to the President in all cases: my inference from this act is entirely different. If the President possessed the power by virtue of his office, surely it was not necessary to insert this provision in the act; and, as it is not provided for in any other act of Congress, the fair inference is, that the intention of Congress was to vest in the President the power of removing this officer for special reasons, which do not apply to any other case. This officer, the Secretary of State, was, in fact, the Private Secretary of the President. The law specified his duties, and to be performed in such manner as the President should direct; and it was considered reasonable to give the President the power of removing him; but no such reasons exist in other cases. This case, unsupported by any other, is therefore to be considered as a special exception to a general rule, and more fully establishes the general principles; for, surely, no exception could be necessary, if there was no established rule; and when an express exception is made, so far from impairing the general principle, it greatly strengthens it. It is to be construed literally, and the language is clearly this; this shall be the only exception.

In my opinion the President has not the power of removal from office, because he has not the power to appoint, and a lesser power cannot remove an officer appointed by a greater power, without that power is specially granted by a power equal to the appointing power. I admit that the President, during the recess of the Senate, by virtue of his general executive power, and his obligation to see the laws faithfully executed, may suspend an officer in cases of extreme necessity, until the Senate are convened; but this is a mere suspension—no vacancy “happens,” within the meaning of the constitution, by such suspension, and it is not in the power of the President to fill such vacancy under the constitution; it becomes his duty to inform the Senate of the misconduct of such officer, and, “by and with their advice and consent,” to make the removal and fill the vacancy; and no officer is removed from office, and no vacancy exists, until the Senate, by their vote, “advise and consent to the appointment of a successor, agreeably to the nomination,” by which act, they approve of, and make the removal and create the vacancy, by the joint act of the President and Senate, which is made the appointing power by the constitution. Will it be claimed that the Senate alone can remove from office, except by impeachment? And if one branch of the power cannot do it, is it in the power of the other branch to do it, except by a special grant of that power by Congress?

With respect to vacancies in the recess of the Senate, the sole power of the President “to fill such vacancies, to the end of the next session," depends upon the construction of the word "happen." What is its meaning? "To come by chance or accident." Does a forcible removal by the President come within this definition? It will not, and cannot be claimed. It is not a vacancy which "happens" within the meaning or the letter of the constitution. This point has been settled by the Senate in the case of Mr. Lanman, a Senator from Connecticut, whose term expired on the 3d March, 1825. The Senate was convened, by special call of the President, on the 4th March. The Legislature of Connecticut, not being in session, the Governor of Connecticut made a temporary appointment, and forwarded a commission, under this provision of the constitution—"If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments, until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." After full debate, the Senate decided, by a large vote, that Mr. Lanman was not entitled to a seat, upon the ground that, although there was a vacancy, the vacancy had not "happened" within the meaning of the constitution. This appears to me to be a much stronger case than the one under consideration. In the case of Mr. Lanman, the vacancy occurred by the expiration of the term of his office. A vacancy actually existed, and the only question was, how this vacancy had occurred; and, although there was a vacancy, the Senate would not permit the vacancy to be filled by the Executive, on the ground that the vacancy did not "happen." What is the present case? Had these vacancies "happened" by casualty or accident? No. There was no vacancy; but the President endeavors—yes, he attempts to make a "vacancy happen," by a forcible removal of the officer!!! Comment cannot be necessary; the bare statement is sufficient to satisfy every unprejudiced mind that such vacancy does not "happen;" and, of course, by the decision of the Senate in the other case, it is not in the power of the President to fill such vacancy, under the provision of the constitution, viz. "The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, &c.," being precisely the same language as in the case of Mr. Lanman; and, sir, among those who voted in the negative, on the resolution to permit Mr. Lanman to take his seat, there appears the name of General Jackson, the present President of the United States!! The doctrine contended for by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has, I believe, met with few supporters. There are but few even of his own political friends, I trust, who are willing, by such concessions to the Executive as he has made, to surrender at once all the rights of the Senate. He contended that the President has the "perpetual power of appointment"—that when the Senate has rejected his nominations, he can fill the vacancies existing after the expiration of the session of the Senate. Such a doctrine leads at once to absolute and despotic power in the President, and can never be tolerated by a republican people. With my impressions, it certainly cannot be expected that I should vote for the confirmation of any nomination, made in place of any one who is declared by the President to have been removed, unless information is given of the causes for which, in the opinion of the President, a removal has become necessary; as I hold it to be the duty of the Senate to inquire into those causes, to enable it to decide correctly whether the public interest requires a removal. And, further, that the President cannot create, or cause a vacancy to "happen," by removing an officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and, more especially, immediately after the adjournment of the Senate; or, under any circumstances, without the advice and consent of the Senate for the removal; since the same power is necessary to remove as to appoint.

The Executive Journal, which has been published, shows the mode of nomination, as well as the manner in which the Senate advise and consent to nominations. To illustrate my position, the President sends a nomination to the Senate in these words: "I nominate A to be Collector of the Port of —, in place of B, removed." The question is, will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of A, "agreeably to the nomination?" If the Senate advise and consent to the nomination, in these terms, do they not advise and consent to the removal of B, as well as confirm the nomination of A? And can we do this with any propriety, or consistently with a due regard to the rights of B, without knowing the reasons why B ought to be removed? For one, I answer in the negative. I cannot (with some Senators) "presume that the President had good reasons," and vote in the dark. It is wholly inconsistent with my sense of duty. I am not willing to assume the responsibility of removing an officer, upon the presumption that the President has good reasons for the removal. If the reasons are good, what objection can he have to communicate them to the Senate? If no reasons are assigned for the removal, my inference would be entirely different from that of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GUNN.] I shall presume there is no good reason for the removal; and shall vote against the removal and the nomination, until information is obtained on which reliance can justly be placed; and, in my opinion, self-respect and the rights as well as the duty of the Senate demand it. The constitution has not made the Senate the mere recorder of the Executive will, but a part of the appointing power, and responsible for the faithful discharge of this high trust.

I am aware of the decision, in 1789, in relation to the power of the President to make a removal; but, under the peculiar circumstances of that case, it certainly ought not to have any force as a precedent. The utmost confidence was reposed in General Washington. No suspicion or jealousy existed, that he could abuse the power thus granted. The question was decided by the casting vote of Mr. Adams, the Senate being equally divided; and most of the framers of the constitution voted against it. And were they not qualified to expound the constitution which themselves had made? And Mr. Madison, in debate, declares, if any President shall presume to remove, without cause, or to reward his favorites, he would be liable to impeachment; but "he cannot conceive how any President could be guilty of such a gross violation of duty." But has he not lived to see it?

But, suppose it be decided that the President has this power, no doubt exists but that he is responsible for the abuse of it. It is certainly a most responsible and delicate trust, and never to be exercised except in extreme cases, where the public interests imperiously demand it. And is it not the duty of the Senate, if possible, to check every abuse of this power?

There is not a Senator on this floor, nor an individual in this nation of any respectability of character, and a friend to the country, who will say that the President has the right to use this power to gratify his malice or caprice, or to purchase "golden opinions." But there are some, and I regret to see it, who have advanced sentiments on this subject which are well calculated to encourage the most monstrous abuse of this power. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY] was understood to say "that every officer who differed in political sentiment, or opposed the election of a Chief Magistrate, from a sense of decency, ought to retire; and if he did not, he had no reason to complain if he was turned out of office." This, I believe, was at one period the New York doctrine, but certainly a doctrine inconsistent with the rights of private opinion, hostile to the best interests of the country, and dangerous, if not wholly destructive of civil liberty. I pronounce, without hesitation, that any citizen who dares not exercise his elective franchise, independently, is a slave! and any one who would punish a man for the free exercise of this right, is a tyrant! It matters not by what name he is called. If this is republican doctrine, I have not yet learned it in more than thirty years' experience. Let us examine this doctrine fairly and candidly, and see its results. The picture is before us. Look at the hordes of hungry office-hunters, surrounding the quarters of General Jackson on his arrival in this city, previous to his entering on the duties of his office. In the front rank, marshalled, the hireling editors of newspapers! retailers of slander! pressing on with their bills, and demanding payment; and threatening to turn their tremendous engines against the successful candidate, if their bills are protested, or are not promptly paid! 'About fifty of this class have received their reward!! In the dark ages, the purse and the sword were considered amply sufficient to secure the "sceptre." In modern times, the press must be subsidized! Why this tremendous rush of hungry leeches, and desperate fortune-hunters, to the city of Washington, during the last winter? Nothing of this kind was ever witnessed on any former occasion! Could these creatures produce the bond? Did they labor for hire? Were they promised their reward? The laborers on a canal were never more punctual in their attendance on Saturday evening, to receive their wages for their week's labor.

Such a system of rewards and punishments is calculated to debase the moral sense of the community! It is a regular system of bribery and corruption! If proscription for the free exercise of the elective franchise, and the distribution of the offices as rewards, is to be the order of the day—farewell Liberty—she soon takes her flight from the abodes of men.

Some removals made by Mr. Jefferson have been quoted, to justify the system of proscription for difference of opinion. Mr. J. disclaimed the principle: he expressly declared, "the right of private opinion shall never be invaded by me"—and when several attempts were made, in Connecticut and in Delaware, to procure the removal of his political opponents, he declined: the reasons for removal were expressly assigned by him. Let the parallel be drawn between the administration of Mr. Jefferson and the present administration—between the present and all preceding administrations—and view the contrast! In one year, more removals have been made than within the fifty preceding! And the worst and most dangerous feature in this case is, that they have been without any cause assigned; and when the causes have been sought, none have been found—they have been refused, except in one or two cases. Where a cause has been assigned, (in one instance,) it has been of a character, which, in my judgment, might have been refused with much more credit to the person making the removal, viz. "that the head of a department, and one in which large sums of money are disbursed, should have those about him in whom he could place perfect confidence," that they would not keep a vigilant watch over his official conduct—and is it come to this? Where are your guards about the public treasury? Must every clerk in the offices be your political and personal friend—your menial servant, who breathes by your permission? Sir, this is a very dangerous doctrine! It is the doctrine of the midnight assassin—the highway robber! He selects his friends in whom he can place confidence, that he shall not be betrayed! And must the same selection be made in your departments? Under such a system, how long can public confidence be retained? If the sword is suspended by a thread over the subaltern officer, who dares expose malfeasance in the head? Where is the difference between such a system, and the Lettres de Cachet, or the Inquisition? Your liberties are gone for ever!

But removals of clerks in the departments are without precedent in this or any other country. In the highest party times, no such removals have heretofore been made!

And, although much individual distress has been produced by other removals—widows and orphans left destitute and without bread, yet such cases of distress are light compared with some of these—but an appeal to sympathy is useless.

Although great confusion has been produced by the removal of postmasters, and the public interest may be not a little jeopardized by the changes in the collectors and other receivers of public moneys, the most palpable loss to the public has accrued from the removals in the public offices. The Retrenchment Committee verily believed some of these departments might be reduced! What answer do you receive from the Reformers? Oh, no! We want more clerks! We cannot keep our accounts without "the aid of Congress." No talents or skill can adjust them "without the interposition of Congress," says your Fourth Auditor. And, further, this same auditor, lately editor or printer of a newspaper, in speaking of one of his brother editors, says, "it is just to the present Comptroller to state, that he is devising means to change the mode of keeping his books, to make them present the truth." Here we have, in a document accompanying the President's message, the important and interesting fact, that a new officer, late editor, is very gravely and seriously puzzling his wits to make his books "present the truth." "No talents or skill (of editors probably, as he speaks of his own knowledge) can adjust their accounts without the aid of Congress." Do they calculate that Congress has the power to make an editor a good accountant?

But the evil resulting from the removal of experienced accountants in their offices, to give place to favorites, is manifesting itself in the loud and incessant complaints of those who come to settle their accounts at these departments. Confusion and loss of papers and vouchers, long and tedious detentions, have disappointed many, who have settled their accounts before without embarrassment or delay. And there is good ground to fear that this prophecy of the Fourth Auditor will soon become matter of history, and such confusion ensue in these offices, as to require the aid of Congress, if not the "sponge," to restore order.

One word, on the right of removing faithful officers. Has not the officer in your department a right to presume, when he receives an appointment to an office, not limited by any law, that he shall be continued during good behavior, when no removals have ever been made except for cause? And is it not a violation of good faith to remove a faithful and competent officer without cause?

By the act limiting the term of office to four years, a provision is indeed made, "removable at pleasure;" but can it be claimed that this power is vested in the President alone? Why was not the power given in express terms? It can only be construed, at the pleasure of the appointing power. The principal object of that law was to secure a faithful accountability in the officers, as is evident from its embracing those officers only to whom the public moneys were entrusted. The effect, however, is to limit the term of office—to leave a vacancy in every office during each Presidential term, and certainly supercedes any necessity of removals, for the purpose of filling such vacancies with the political friends of the President, if such be his object. And, under this act, the term of the office being fixed, the incumbent can have no claim to re-appointment, over any of his fellow-citizens, except from his faithful discharge of duty. But, sir, a removal (except for misconduct) cannot but be viewed as a breach of good faith on the part of the Government; it is in the nature of a contract for four years' service; and, on the faithful performance by the officer, the Government is bound in good faith to fulfil on its part.

But there is one view of this case which is of serious import, as involving the power, the right, and duty of the Senate. Take, for example, the cases of the Treasurer

MAY 21, 1830.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

of the United States, the District Attorney in Connecticut, and the Collector of the port of New Orleans. These officers were nominated to the Senate, and confirmed during the last session of Congress. Two of these officers were appointed for four years. An attempt was made to postpone the nominations until the fourth of March, which failed; and the nominations were confirmed by a full, if not unanimous vote. The Senate continued in session until informed by the President he had no further communication to make; and, almost immediately after the adjournment, these officers are removed. I leave this subject, by proposing the following questions, which I shall leave for the Senate and for the public to decide. Was it competent for the President to make these removals without cause? Was it respectful to the Senate? What check has the Senate over appointments, if the President can remove all the officers appointed under the constitution immediately after adjournment? Let these questions be duly considered by the Senate. Has the honest and faithful discharge of duty no claim on public confidence? Are twelve thousand officers, in the gift of the President, to be used as bribes, or rewards for political panders? Are the little knots of self-created committees to single out the objects of Executive proscription and vengeance, and divide the spoils among themselves and their associates? Is it matter of surprise that so many appointments should be made of those who are bankrupt in fortune and in character? How long can you expect men of integrity and moral worth to fill responsible stations? Have such been selected for office? Has the question been, "Is he honest? Is he capable? Is he faithful to the constitution?" Or is the question, what service has he rendered, or can he render, to the dominant party? And, what compensation does he deserve in payment for the past, or to ensure his aid in future?

Are these the principles upon which the American Government is to be administered? Are the rights and liberties of twelve millions of people in no danger? Is there not a redeeming spirit in the people? Must the tree of liberty, planted by our fathers, and watered and nourished with their tears and their blood, which has so long flourished, and overshadowed this happy country, wither and die in our hands, without one effort for its protection?

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

FRIDAY, MAY 21, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore submitted by Mr. FOOT, as modified by him on the 20th January, in relation to future sales of public lands, with the motion to postpone it indefinitely.

Mr. BENTON threw himself upon the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes, [he said] while he endeavored, with proof in hand, to vindicate the truth of history, and to check the progress of a great and mischievous error, which had engrafted itself on the preceding part of the debate, and obtained a wide circulation through multiplied editions of a printed speech. This error, or rather this set of errors, for there was a system of them, related to the question of relative merit between the two great sections of the Union, the North and the South, in reference to the passing of the famous ordinance of 1787, for the exclusion of slavery, and general good government of the Northwestern Territory. He [Mr. B.] had flattered himself, at the time of the spoken debate, that the problem of this disputed merit had been solved by the reading of some passages from the Journals of the old Congress; and that the claims of the South to the merit of passing, as well as conceiving it, having been established, no further use would be made of that ordinance for the purpose of poisoning the West against the South. In this hope and belief he had found himself mistaken; and the publication of the printed debate had shown him that the original error, after full detection and clear exposure, was still adhered to; and its dissemination zealously promoted by new and profuse editions of the speech which contained it. Seeing all this, and knowing it to be the obvious effect of this error to create unfounded prejudices in the West, and thereby to aid in bringing about a state of things, to enable one-half of the Union to govern and oppress the other, he felt it to be his duty to come forward again in defence of the South, and to do his work, on this occasion, in a way to save future trouble to himself, and to prevent a great mischief to the Union. For this purpose, he would have recourse to plain language and strong facts; to proofs which could not be denied, and authorities which could not be questioned; and would begin by reading the erroneous passage, and end by proving it to be erroneous.

THE PASSAGE.

Extract from Mr. Webster's Speech in reply to Mr. Hayne.

"An attempt has been made to transfer from the North to the South the honor of this exclusion of slavery from the Northwestern Territory. The Journal, without argument or comment, refutes such attempt. The cession by Virginia was made, March, 1784. On the 19th April following, a committee, consisting of Messrs. Jefferson, Chase, and Howell, reported a plan for a temporary government of the Territory, in which was this article: 'That, after the year 1800, there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the said States, otherwise than in punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been convicted.' Mr. SENATOR, of North Carolina, moved to strike out this paragraph. The question was put, according to the form then practised: 'Shall these words stand as part of the plan, &c.' New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, seven States, voted in the affirmative. Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, in the negative. North Carolina was divided. As the consent of nine States was necessary, the words could not stand, and were struck out accordingly. Mr. Jefferson voted for the clause, but was overruled by his colleagues.

"In March of the next year, [1785] Mr. King, of Massachusetts, seconded by Mr. Ellery, of Rhode Island, proposed the formerly rejected article, with this addition: 'And that this regulation shall be an article of compact, and remain a fundamental principle of the constitutions between the thirteen original States and each of the States described in the resolve,' &c. On this clause, which provided the adequate and thorough security, the eight Northern States at that time voted affirmatively, and the four Southern States negatively. The votes of nine States were not yet obtained; and thus the provision was again rejected by the Southern States. The perseverance of the North held out, and two years afterwards the object was attained."

Mr. B. said, this passage contained a set of small errors, which appeared to be subordinate and subsidiary to the main one. These he would specify, without taking the trouble to disprove, knowing that they would fail of themselves when the superior planet, of which they were satellites, was expunged from the system. The first of these subaltern mistakes was the statement that New Jersey voted for retaining the non-slavery clause, reported by Mr. Jefferson, in April, 1784. It was not so. New Jersey did not vote upon that occasion. She was not present as a State, having but one member in the hall, [Mr. Dick] and although he was indulged in putting his individual vote upon the Journal, to show his sentiments, according to the courtesy of the old Congress, yet that vote was the act of an individual, not of a State, the vote of which could not be counted without the presence and concurrence of two members, and the vote of Mr. Dick was not counted. The second of these errors is, in saying that seven States voted in the affirmative on that occasion. There were but six so voting. The third, in saying that the consent of nine States was necessary to retain this clause—a mistake which grows out of a confused understanding of the powers of the Congress of the Confederation, which required different numbers to transact different degrees of business. Business of the highest order, as the declaration of war, the conclusion of peace, the negotiation of treaties, levying taxes, borrowing money, &c. required the consent of nine States; but the act of seven was sufficient for ordinary legislation, and of this character was the ordinance in question. The fourth mistake, and the most material of the smaller ones, was, in saying that Mr. King's proposition was rejected by the vote of the Southern States. The fact is, it was not rejected at all. It was adopted, and so stated in the Journal, (vol. 4, p. 482.) The fifth error is, in ascribing to Mr. King the merit of providing the adequate and thorough security for the exclusion of slavery by compact, and making it a fundamental principle in the constitutions of the new States, unalterable but by the consent of the old ones; that identical provision being a part of the ordinance reported by Mr. Jefferson, in the preceding year, not as an adjunct to the non-slavery clause alone, but as a security for all the articles in the ordinance, placed at the end of the ordinance when first drawn up, and now standing at the head of the six articles of compact, in the ordinance, as passed in 1787, (vol. 4, p. 380, 753.) A sixth error of this brief paragraph is, in supposing that the ordinance reported by Mr. Jefferson did not pass into a law, when the fact is that it did pass, and that, in five days after, the non-slavery clause was rejected, and without any motion to reinstate that clause, although eleven States were then present, (Mr. Beatty, of New Jersey, having joined his colleague,) and, of these eleven States, eight were from the north of the Potomac, and three from the south; seven were non-slaveholding, and four otherwise. The competent number of non-slaveholding States were present, to do what they pleased with the ordinance; and they pleased to let it pass without an effort or a motion to reinstate the non-slavery clause. The votes were—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina, in the affirmative; South Carolina in the negative; Georgia and Delaware absent.—(Same page.)

Having passed rapidly over the enumeration and detection of these subaltern mistakes, Mr. B. proceeded to the great and cardinal error—the supreme mischief-maker of the whole set—which had put him upon his feet, viz. the reiterated assertion that the ordinance of '87 was the work of the North, and not of the South, and was passed into a law by the perseverance of the former. This was the great mistake which it was his business to overthrow, and overthrow it he would; for the naked, undeniable, and unimpeachable truth was, that the merit of passing, as well as of conceiving, this ordinance, belonged to the South, and so the journals would prove to the conviction of every mind that was capable of receiving the impressions of truth. The parts of the journal already quoted show that the non-slavery clause, and the original idea of laying the security, for all the stipulations in the ordinance, in the deep and immovable foundation of compact, originated with Mr. Jefferson. The parts which remain to be quoted, will show, that, in July, 1787, when only seven States were present, and five of these slaveholding, and four of them from the south of the Potomac, the ordinance, as it now stands, was reported by a committee of five members, of whom three were from slaveholding States, and two from Virginia alone, and one of them the chairman; that it received its first reading the day it was reported; its second the next day, when one other State had joined; its third on the day ensuing; having gone through all the forms of legislation, and become a law in three days; receiving the vote of the eight States present, and the vote of every individual member from each State, except one, and that one from a free State north of the Potomac. Mr. B. then read the Journal of the Congress of the Confederation, to prove the truth of this decisive and overwhelming statement.

THE JOURNAL.

“Wednesday, July 11th, 1787.

“Congress assembled: Present, the seven States above-mentioned.” (Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia—7.)

“The Committee, consisting of Mr. Carrington, (of Virginia,) Mr. Dane, (of Massachusetts,) Mr. R. H. Lee, (of Virginia,) Mr. Kean, (of South Carolina,) and Mr. Smith, (of New York,) to whom was referred the report of a committee touching the temporary government of the Western Territory, reported an ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio; which was read a first time.

“Ordered, That to-morrow be assigned for the second reading.”

“Thursday, July 12th, 1787.

“Congress assembled: Present, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. (8.)

“According to order, the ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, was read a second time.

“Ordered, That to-morrow be assigned for the third reading of said ordinance.”

“Friday, July 13th, 1787.

“Congress assembled: Present, as yesterday.

“According to order, the ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, was read a third time, and passed as follows:”

[Here follows the whole ordinance, in the very words in which it now appears among the laws of the United States, with the non-slavery clause, the provisions in favor of schools and education, against impairing the obligation of contracts, laying the foundation and security of all these stipulations in compact, and repealing the ordinance of 23d of April, 1784—the one reported by Mr. Jefferson.]

“On passing the above ordinance, the yeas and nays being required by Mr. Yates—

Massachusetts—Mr. Holten, aye; Mr. Dane, aye.

New York—Mr. Smith, aye; Mr. Yates, no; Mr. Carrington, aye.

New Jersey—Mr. Clarke, aye; Mr. Schureman, aye.

Delaware—Mr. Kearney, aye; Mr. Mitchell, aye.

Virginia—Mr. Grayson, aye; Mr. R. H. Lee, aye; Mr. Carrington, aye.

North Carolina—Mr. Blount, aye; Mr. Hawkins, aye.

South Carolina—Mr. Kean, aye; Mr. Huger, aye.

Georgia—Mr. Few, aye; Mr. Pierce, aye.

So it was resolved in the affirmative.” (Page 754, volume 4.)

Mr. B. resumed, saying, look into this vote, and analyze it. How many slave States were present? Five. How many free ones? Three. How many slave States absent? None. How many free ones? Five. How many States present from the south of the Potomac? Four. How many from New England? One. How many absent from each? None from the South; all but one from New England. Which gave the greatest number of individual votes? Virginia—that same Virginia which furnished the first and the last chairman which reported the ordinance, and was always foremost in justice and generosity to the West. She gave three individual votes for the passage of this ordinance, no other State giving but two.

Such is the history of the conception, the progress, and final passage of this ordinance; such the evidence of the Journal, which for ever establishes it as a Southern measure. The South conceived it, matured it, and passed it. She gave it to the West for the government of the territory which she had given to the confederacy; and she gave it as it now stands, filled with all the meritorious provisions which have been so highly extolled upon the assumption that the honors of the act belonged to the North. And now, what is the reward which the South is receiving? Unqualified reproach and reprobation, as the opposer of that measure! Unqualified and persevering assertion that she was the enemy, the North the friend of that measure! When this vast mistake, big with so many evil consequences, was first committed, it was heard with surprise and amazement, but with the charity and indulgence which is due to unintentional error. As such, it was treated; as such, rectified, or attempted to be rectified. The journals were produced and read; and an acknowledgment of the mistake, with a restitution of its usurped honors to the South, were looked for as a natural and regular consequence. Instead of this, so just and so reasonable reparation, so indispensable, indeed, to the honor of all concerned, we see the detected error still persisted in—the usurped honors still retained and worn. We see the reading of the journal, which establishes the rights of the South, contemptuously referred to, as an “attempt to transfer” these honors from their true owner to a false pretender; and we are told, in the most compendious style of contradiction, that this same journal, “without argument or comment, refutes such attempt.” Instead of retraction and amends, we see repetition and insult. We see all the arrangements for overpowering the truth, and expelling it from the land. We see the speech which contains the planetary error, and all its inferior satellites, reprinted over and over again, multiplied into a myriad of copies, poured into the country under the franking privilege, placed as a manual in every hand, to inculcate a cruel misrepresentation upon every mind, to give a false direction to the gratitude and resentment of the West; and, under the influence of passions thus excited, to bring that great section of the Union into the political field under the guidance of a Massachusetts lead, for the restoration of a defeated and repudiated party. This is too much. It is carrying the privileges of error far beyond their lawful bounds. It is a flight into that region in which the assertions are to be limited, not by the boundaries of truth and honor, but by the capacities of invention and the limits of credulity.

Having disposed of this great error, and all its auxiliaries, Mr. B. took up another part of the same printed speech, which he would not have risen to notice, but, being on his feet, and having the speech in his hand, he would read the part referred to, and extend a remark upon it.

THE PASSAGE.

“In the course of my observations the other day, I paid a passing tribute of respect to a very worthy man, Mr. Dane, of Massachusetts. It so happened, that he drew the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwestern Territory. A man of so much ability, and so little pretence; of so great a capacity to do good, and so unmixed a disposition to do it for its own sake; a gentleman who acted an important part forty years ago, in a measure, the influence of which is still deeply felt in the very matter which was the subject of debate, might, I thought, receive from me a commendatory recognition.

“But the honorable member was inclined to be facetious on the subject. He was rather disposed to make it matter of ridicule, that I had introduced into the debate the name of one Nathan Dane, of whom he assures us he had never before heard. Sir, if the honorable member had never before heard of Mr. Dane, I am sorry for it. It shows him less acquainted with the public men of the country, than I had supposed. Let me tell him, however, that a sneer from him, at the mention of the name of Mr. Dane, is in bad taste. It may well be a high mark of ambition, sir, either with the honorable gentleman or myself, to accomplish as much to make our names known to advantage, and remembered with gratitude, as Mr. Dane has accomplished. But the truth is, sir, I suspect, that Mr. Dane lives a little too far north. He is of Massachusetts, and too near the north star to be reached by the honorable gentleman's telescope. If his sphere had happened to range south of Mason and Dixon's line, he might, probably, have come within the scope of his vision!”

“Sir, I thank God that, if I am gifted with little of the spirit which is able to raise mortals to the skies, I have yet none, as I trust, of that other spirit, which would drag angels down. When I shall be found, sir, in my place here, in the Senate, or elsewhere, to sneer at public merit, because it happened to spring up beyond the little limits of my own State, or neighborhood; when I refuse, for any such cause, or for any cause, the homage due to American talent, to elevated patriotism, to sincere devotion to liberty and the country; or, if I see an uncommon endowment of Heaven—if I see extraordinary capacity and virtue in any son of the South—and if, moved by local prejudice, or gangrened by State jealousy, I get up here to abate the tithe of a hair from his just character and just fame, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth!”

Mr. B. proceeded to remark upon this passage. He said, the meaning and import of it was perfectly apparent, and reduced its object to two points; the commendation of one person, and the condemnation of another. The favored object of applause was the orator's self, the subject of condemnation was the Senator from South Carolina, who had been his adversary in the debate, [General HAYNE.] The Senator from Massachusetts made a prayer of thanksgiving to his God, because he was not like the Senator from South Carolina, in this, that, instead of sneering at merit which displayed itself beyond the limits of his own State, he honored it wherever discoverable, in every part and section of the Union. This is the substance of the first prayer, for there are two of them; and its allusion and reference is to Mr. Dane. He is the mortal lifted into the skies, and made into an angel by one gentleman, and drawn down again and placed upon the earth by the other. The Senator from Massachusetts had exalted this gentleman [Mr. Dane] to the sphere of the demi-gods, deified by the ancients for the divine wisdom of their legislation; the Senator from South Carolina, by the simple process of reading a paragraph, restored him to the earth, and exhibited his person in the den of the Hartford Convention. This is called dragging the angel down, and is supposed to bespeak that “other spirit,” not named, but understood, which the Senator from Massachusetts is so thankful he does not possess; with how much reason, will presently appear.

The second prayer was the reverse of the first one—a prayer of imprecation—and invoked the Divine vengeance upon the offending organ, if, moved by a base passion, it should ever abate the tenth part of a hair from the just fame of any Southern man. Mr. B. admitted that the form of this prayer was fine; its words fine; its sentiments fine; but he presumed to say that something else besides finery was necessary to give value to words and sentiments, in prayers as well as speeches, and that this essential ingredient appeared to be lacking in the prayer referred to.

The Senator from Massachusetts invoked a judgment upon his tongue if it should detract the smallest portion of merit from Southern men; the aforesaid tongue being so employed in the work of detraction, in the very time of making the invocation. For it was in the same point of time, and in the delivery of the same speech, that enough was abated from a Virginian's merit, and transferred to a New Englander, to rank the latter above all the legislators of antiquity; above Solon, Lycurgus, and Numa Pompilius. It was in this same speech that the merit of passing the whole applauded ordinance of '87 was taken from all the men of the South, and transferred to the men of the North. It was in this same speech that Mr. Dane, of Massachusetts, is reiterated as the author of the ordinance which was reported by Mr. Carrington, of Virginia, in '87, and chiefly copied from the one reported by Mr. Jefferson, three years before. It was in this same speech that the merit of securing the stipulations with the new States in the Northwest, by compact, was taken from Mr. Jefferson, and bestowed upon Mr. King, of New York. In fine, it was in this same speech (another part of it) that the merit of drawing the Declaration of Independence was disparaged, and abated, by repeating what another federalist had said before, (Mr. Timothy Pickering,) and what Mr. Jefferson had complained of in one of his last letters to Mr. Madison, that there was nothing new in that paper; that its sentiments had been resolved over and over again, in public assemblies, before they were embodied in the Declaration. Here is abatement, not of a hair, but of mountains of merit; not an abatement only, but a transfer of the abated merits to the North; not a transfer only, but a casting back of reproach and insult upon the South, and all this persisted in, after the error of it had been fully detected and clearly exposed. In the midst of these things—flagrante delicto—the judgment upon the tongue is invoked! Certainly it is a long time, something like six thousand years, since any miraculous affection of the tongue, either of man or beast, of fastening or loosening, has been exhibited to the world. Certainly there was no need for any new or modern instance to illustrate the great impunity with which these sudden and miraculous chastisements may be invoked by offending mortals; and, therefore, it was, that no one felt any surprise at seeing the gentleman's tongue still unfastened to the roof of his mouth, and going on just as loosely after as before his prayer.

Mr. B. then turned to one of the Senators from Maine, [Mr. SPRAGUE] and said there was something in his speech, in the same debate, which he wished to set right; it related to the navigation of the Mississippi, and the imputed willingness of the Southern States to abandon it for ever to the Spaniards, and pay them an export duty for the privilege of sending western produce from New Orleans to foreign countries, and the prevention of all this by the resistance of the Northern States. [Here Mr. S. made some disclaimer, and stated something else as being what he actually said.] Mr. B. rejoined, saying that he recollected what he now alleged, but it was not the point of his reference; that he was attending to a different part of the gentleman's speech, and would adopt it as printed. The following is the part:

MR. SPRAGUE'S SPEECH—Extract.

"But the delegation from that State, (Virginia,) in the same year, 1786, themselves, proposed to enter into permanent stipulations with Spain, by which we should relinquish, for ever, all right of transporting any articles up the Mississippi from its mouth; and New Orleans should be made an entrepot, at which our produce carried down the river should be landed, and pay duties to the Spanish crown; and a consul of the United States there should be responsible for every violation of these engagements. Now, sir, compare these renunciations and sacrifices, to endure through all time, with the mere temporary relinquishment, for twenty-five or thirty years, and let the candid and intelligent declare which would have been most wise, and have best secured the true and permanent interest and safety of the Western country."

Mr. B. resuming, said the fact was the reverse of what the Senator from Maine had supposed; that the Northern States had done what he had imputed to the South, and this the journals would show.

Mr. B. then read, from the secret journals of the Confederation, the history of the transaction in question.

THE JOURNALS, vol. 4, p. 120-123.

"That the Secretary of the United States for the department of Foreign Affairs [Mr. Jay] be, and hereby is, instructed to propose, and, if possible, obtain, the following stipulations: That the citizens of the United States shall not be interrupted in transporting the bona fide productions of the United States upon the Mississippi river, from thirty-one degrees north latitude to the city of New Orleans, where they shall be allowed to land the same, and permission shall be granted them to occupy store-houses and other necessary buildings for the reception thereof. That the boats or other vessels, on board of which the said productions shall have been transported, shall have free leave to return up the Mississippi, provided that so far as they navigate below thirty-one degrees north latitude, they shall not load any species of goods, wares, or merchandise whatsoever, but by permission of the Spanish Government of Florida. That the American merchants or factors shall have free leave to reside at New Orleans, for the purpose of receiving such American productions as may be brought down the Mississippi; and for exporting the same from thence in American or Spanish bottoms, under the regulations of the respective countries. That a duty not exceeding two and a half per cent. ad valorem, shall be paid to the crown of Spain, upon all American produce shipped from the same city of New Orleans, in American bottoms, within six months after such exportation, for which good and sufficient bonds shall be given, previous to the departure of any vessel on board of which such produce shall be laden. That American vessels may freely navigate up the said river Mississippi, from the mouth to the said city of New Orleans, but shall not carry any species of goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, contrary to the regulations of the crown of Spain, under the pain of seizure and confiscation. That, if, in the course of this negotiation with the Encargado de negocios of his Catholic Majesty, it shall be found indispensable for the conclusion of the same, that the United States and their citizens, for a limited time, should forbear to use so much of the river Mississippi as is south of the Southern boundary of the United States, the said Secretary be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, on behalf of the United States, to consent to an article or articles, stipulating, on their part, and that of their citizens, a forbearance of the use of the said river Mississippi, for a period not exceeding twenty years, from the Southern boundary of the United States, to its mouth in the ocean." &c. &c.

On the question to agree to this resolution, the vote was, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, in the affirmative; Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, in the negative.

Upon this reading of the Journal, Mr. B. went on to remark, that the facts turned out to be precisely the contrary of what the gentleman had supposed, that the Northern States had done the identical thing which he had charged upon the South; but he did not impute to him any intentional error; on the contrary, he saw the source of his mistake in a counter proposition, submitted by the Southern delegation, differing from the one adopted, in the important particular of making it a sine qua non, and thereby defeating the whole; on which the vote was as supposed by the Senator from Maine. In saying this much, and in absolving the Senator from Maine from intentional mistake in this particular, Mr. B. added that he was acting upon a sense of what was due to himself—he was acting as became him—with reference to what might be merited from him.

Mr. B. said, he was now done with rectifying mistakes in the speeches of others, but he had the same office to perform upon his own speech. He had, in the speech which he delivered upon this resolution, in the early part of the debate, paid the homage of his poor respect to the good intentions of the mover, [Mr. FOOT.] He believed at that time that the intentions of the gentleman were innocent and benevolent, but mistaken and injurious. Since that time, the gentleman had submitted a motion to prevent settlers from going on the public lands; and another to refer the graduation bill to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, when at its third reading, and on the point of passing. He had also voted against letting settlers having the refuse lands at seventy-five cents per acre, after moving to amend his own resolutions, by granting them donations of land; and he had seen him submit to the virtual rejection of his resolution in the shape of indefinite postponement, when moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] without any expression of opposition, while he had betrayed successive sensibility at his [Mr. B.'s] attempts to reject it in plain terms. These things, and some others, convinced him that he was mistaken as to the gentleman's good intentions; and he now acknowledged his error in the face of the Senate, and revoked it.

Before he resumed his seat, [Mr. B. proceeded to say] there was one point in the debate on which he would say something; it was the point which related to the Supreme Court, and which asserted its authority to bind the States by its decisions. He had observed some signs in the political zodiac before that debate came on, and he had, in consequence, kept a sharp look out for the corresponding events. He had read something in certain newspapers, the editors of which, the real editors, were au fait in the business to which it related. He spoke of the Lexington (Kentucky) Reporter, and the Massachusetts (Boston) Journal, and would read the article which had arrested his attention, and prepared him to witness some extraordinary movement.

From the Kentucky Reporter.

"GEORGIA INDIANS.—An intimation has been given, that they (the Georgia Cherokees) ought to take the best legal advice, and carry their cause before the Supreme Court of the United States, where they would have justice done them. A writer on this subject says, if they once obtain a decree in their favor, hands enough will be found to carry it into execution. At least, says the editor of the Massachusetts Journal, we know of one pair which is ready."

This [said Mr. B.] looked like a preparatory note for a civil war with Georgia, and as such he endorsed it, and put the paper into his portfolio, and waited the fulfilment of the signs. The first thing that struck him, was the argument in this chamber, on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] on a motion made by himself to postpone a land debate, to establish, in the Supreme Court, an authority to bind the States of this Union by their decisions, and to subject them to the penalties of high treason if they refused to obey them. This corresponded precisely with the scheme disclosed in the newspaper, of getting a question between the Georgians and the Indians into the Supreme Court, and did what was necessary to sustain the validity of the decision, which the two newspapers anticipated with so much certainty. The court was then in session at this place, and had the immediate benefit of the argument.

The next thing that struck him was the regular party opposition to the voluntary removal of the Indians from Georgia. This removal had been going on for many years, and it was clear that, if they continued going, they would soon all be gone, and there would soon be no chance for the "best legal advice," to get a question between them and the Georgians into the Supreme Court. If, on the contrary, the Indians could be detained, there would be no difficulty for "legal advice" to take up a case, either under the laws and treaties existing, or under laws to be made for the purpose. This opposition, then, to the removal of the Indians, which has developed itself as a party measure, refers its origin to Lexington and Boston, and connects itself with a great catastrophe, to be produced through the instrumentality of the Supreme Court. Mr. B. said, this was the exact process which had been followed in breaking up the Grecian confederacy. A quarrel was sought with a member of the confederacy, the Locrians of Amphissa, and a trespass upon grounds dedicated to the heathen god Apollo was the pretext seized upon. The Council of Amphycions was made the instrument; the "legal advice" of Eschines having carried the case before that tribunal, and obtained a decree against the Locrians. The decree was resisted—that resistance was treason: and an army was raised to enforce the decree, and chastise the rebels. The battle of Cheronea grew out of all these measures, that battle of which the Oracle had foretold: "The Vanquished weeps; the Victor dies." And so was the issue. The Thebans and Athenians, joining the people of Amphissa, were vanquished with them, and wept the downfall of liberty in Greece; the other cities, with Philip of Macedon, executed the decree of the Amphycions, and died in the conquest. The Grecian confederacy expired; and so will it be with the American confederacy, if the plan signified from Lexington and Boston can be carried out; if the Indians can be prevented from leaving Georgia, a case got into the Supreme Court, the decision pronounced which is anticipated, and an armed force sent to execute it.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, that, after this subject had slumbered for two months upon the table, under a mass of other matter, nothing could have been more unexpected than this, its sudden revival. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] at this late hour, in almost the expiring moments of the session, has undertaken to point out certain supposed mistakes of mine, in relation to the navigation of the Mississippi. I shall not, sir, protract this untimely discussion further than to re-affirm my former statements. The errors upon this subject are on the side of the gentleman, not mine. I said nothing that is not fully sustained by the highest authority, by the speeches of Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, Mr. Lee, and Mr. Grayson, in the Virginia Convention, and the journals of the Continental Congress. I then had the books in my hand, and read from them to the Senate.

I stated, sir, that the delegation from Virginia, (not the South generally, but the delegates from that State,) in the year 1786, proposed to enter into permanent stipulations with Spain, by which we should relinquish, for ever, all right of transporting any articles up the Mississippi from its mouth; and New Orleans should be made an entrepot, at which our produce, carried down the river, should be landed, and pay duties to the Spanish crown; and a consul of the United States there should be responsible for every violation of these engagements! Now, sir, compare these renunciations and sacrifices, to endure through all time, with the mere temporary relinquishment for twenty-five or thirty years, and let the candid and intelligent declare which would have been most wise, and have best secured the true and permanent interests and safety of the Western country.

Notwithstanding the gentleman's assertion, that the reverse of this was the fact, I maintain that such a proposition was made by the delegates from Virginia, in 1786, and it will be found in the fourth volume of the secret journals of Congress, published in 1821, p. 105 and 106.*

Let it be remembered that my statement was, that such a proposition proceeded from the Virginia delegation; not, as the gentleman's remarks indicate, from the South generally.

But I proceed, in addition, to say: There was a time when the Southern States, and Virginia with the rest, were disposed to make an absolute and perfect surrender of all right to the waters of the Mississippi, but the Northern and Eastern States opposed it. It was at the period of their greatest distress, and for the purpose of obtaining succor from Spain. For this I produced the speeches of Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe, and might have referred to other distinguished names; but their authority is too strong to be shaken, and too elevated to be reached by that gentleman. Indeed, he has not even adverted to their unequivocal and decisive testimony.†

* The Virginia proposition was made August 29th, 1786, and is to be found extending from page 87 to page 108 of the 4th volume of the secret journals. In pages 105 and 106, in the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Chargé des Affaires of the United States at the court of Spain be instructed to assure his Catholic Majesty of the high regard the United States entertain for his friendship, and of their earnest desire to cultivate and preserve always the best understanding between his Majesty and the said States; that, as an evidence of this disposition, they are willing to settle their interfering claims respecting the Mississippi, and the boundaries, upon the following principles: 1st. That New Orleans be made an entrepot, for the reception of the bona fide produce of the United States brought down the river Mississippi by the citizens of the said States; such produce to be landed at said port for exportation. That the said citizens be at liberty to return with their boats empty, or with passengers only, up the Mississippi, to the places from whence they came. 2d. That such produce aforesaid shall pay there, or the merchants exporting it give bond for the payment, within six months from the date, of a duty not exceeding per cent. ad valorem, at the time of exportation, to the crown of Spain. That such produce aforesaid shall be exported thence, in Spanish, American, or French vessels: those in the bottoms of Spain, under the regulations of Spain; and those in the bottoms of America and France, under the regulations of the two countries, by treaty or otherwise. That imports of every kind and country to the said port, and up the said river, in American and French bottoms, be prohibited; and that all vessels engaged in transportation of said exports shall come to such ports in ballast only. That the United States shall be authorized to appoint a consul, to reside at New Orleans, who shall be responsible for any violation of these stipulations by the citizens of the United States."

† Extract from Mr. Madison's speech in the Virginia Convention:

"It was soon perceived, after the commencement of the war with Britain, that, among the various objects that would affect the happiness of the people of America, the navigation of the Mississippi was one. Throughout the whole history of foreign negotiation, great stress was laid on its preservation. In the time of our greatest distresses, and particularly when the Southern States were the scene of war, the Southern States cast their eyes around to be relieved from their misfortune. It was supposed that assistance might be obtained for the relinquishment of that navigation. It was thought that, for so substantial a consideration, Spain might be induced to afford decisive succor. It was opposed by the Northern and Eastern States. They

The gentleman has chosen this moment to introduce, for the first time, into this debate, the subject of the removal of the Indians, upon which he has dilated in most extraordinary terms. Having presented my views in relation to it, at the proper time, I have no inclination now to obtrude upon the Senate any further remarks; nor is there any necessity for doing so. The whole cause of the alarm we have just heard, is the statement, by one newspaper editor, of what another newspaper editor has said; from which the gentleman's prolific imagination has conjured up

"Gorgons, Hydras, and Chimeras dire."

[Here the debate on Mr. FOOT'S resolution was finally brought to a close.]

SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1830.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate took up for consideration the following bill: "Be it enacted, &c. That, in all cases where any merchant of the United States shall have given an order on a foreign manufacturer or merchant, or his agent or supercargo, for foreign merchandise, previous to the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, and shall make it appear, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the said order was given in the regular course of his business, and that it was not in the power of such merchant to countermand the said order subsequent to the passage of the act of the nineteenth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, entitled 'An act in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports,' and where it shall be further made to appear, in like manner, that the said merchandise was imported previous to the first day of September, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, the merchandise so imported shall be exempted from the operation of the act aforesaid, and be subject only to the duties to which it was liable previous to the passage of that act.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to carry this act into effect, by refunding, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the duties imposed by the act aforesaid; provided the said duties have not been returned by drawback on exportation."

Mr. DICKERSON opposed the passage of the bill. He was disposed to afford relief to merchants who actually suffered from unforeseen legislation, but he was opposed to the passage of a bill, general in its nature, and embracing in its provisions a number and variety of cases which might affect the finances of the country to a very great amount.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, advocated the passage of the bill, and represented the distress and ruin which the tariff law of 1828 had brought on the importers of dry goods, in consequence of the period at which it passed. Orders had been issued for the fall goods, and arrangements made for their disposal, without anticipating the operation of the law of 1828. The consequence was immense loss, and overwhelming ruin to the importers.

Mr. DICKERSON replied. He said that it was well known to importers, previous to sending out their orders, that such a bill was before Congress, and that its passage was expected. Speculation followed; and orders, to an immense amount, were sent forth, and the country inunwere sensible that it might be dangerous to surrender this important right, particularly to the inhabitants of the Western country. But so it was, that the Southern States were for it, and the Eastern States opposed it."

And Mr. Monroe, after speaking of the constant efforts of Virginia to preserve this navigation, says:

"There was a time, it is true, when even this State, in some measure, abandoned the object, by authorizing this cession to the court of Spain."

dated with foreign goods, to the ruin of the importers, and injury of domestic industry.

Mr. SPRAGUE moved an amendment to the bill, which will extend its provisions to those merchants who gave their orders to the captain or supercargo of a vessel, and not immediately directed to a foreign merchant or manufacturer; which was agreed to.

Mr. WOODBURY had no objection either to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SPRAGUE] or to the passage of the bill. He thought it was only an act of sheer justice to the mercantile community. In reply to the observation of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON] he said that it was impossible for the importer to have known that the bill of 1828 would pass, previous to issuing their orders, because it ought to be recollected that the passage of the tariff law of 1828 was not anticipated until a few days before it actually took place, on the 19th of May; and orders for merchandise were usually issued in the months of February and March.

Mr. HAYNE was opposed to the doctrine advanced by Mr. DICKERSON, that we ought, on this subject, to legislate for isolated cases, and not for a whole class of cases. He thought it always the most judicious mode of legislation to be governed by general principles as long as they would enable us to provide for general evils; and when general rules could not embrace isolated and meritorious cases, it was then time enough to resort to individual legislation.

Mr. DICKERSON differed with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE] that this bill provided for a general class of cases. He believed that it embraced a variety of cases, widely different in their character; and he was unwilling to open a door that would enable gambling speculators to avail themselves of a law which ought to extend its provisions only to those whose cases were carefully examined, and found to be worthy of the consideration and relief of the Government.

Mr. MCKINLEY opposed the passage of the bill, because it was impossible to anticipate the extent to which it would expose the treasury of the United States. He said it might turn out to be the largest appropriation bill which has been passed during the present session; and he was unwilling to open a door that would dispose of revenue which had been fairly and legally collected, until it was ascertained to what extent it would involve the finances of the country. He moved that it be laid on the table; which motion was negative, as follows: yeas 16, nays 26.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in reply to the remarks of Mr. DICKERSON, said, that, instead of the anticipation of the tariff of 1828 operating on the merchants, and producing a species of "gambling speculation," which inundated the country with goods, as had just been represented, a reference to the importations of that year would show that the arguments and assertions of the gentleman from New Jersey were totally unfounded in fact. The imports of that year sank several millions under what they were in previous years, and this bill would only extend justice to the honest merchant engaged in lawful commerce.

Mr. DICKERSON thanked the Senator from Maryland for putting him right; but he was not so far wrong as he imagined. In the article of iron, the importation of 1828 was ten thousand tons greater than it ever had been in any previous year; and the reduction in the importation on woollen goods was to be attributed to the great woollens bill that was agitated in 1827, and which urged the importers to issue larger orders than usual. This was the reason why the imports of 1828 fell below those of 1827.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, argued in favor of the bill.

Mr. HAYNE said he agreed with the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. JOHNSTON] that it is better to legislate on general principles; and whether the bill would involve a great or a small amount of the public treasure, he thought it preferable to pass it, than to take up the several cases embraced in its provisions, and legislate upon them in an isolated form.

On motion by Mr. SANFORD, the word "supplies" was stricken out of the fifth line.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved to amend the bill by adding a proviso excluding those who had been refunded the duties by drawback on exportation; which was agreed to.

The question was then put on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time; and it was rejected—ayes 20, noes 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Brown, Burnet, Chambers, Dudley, Ellis, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Iredell, Johnston, Holmes, Livingston, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Sprague, Webster, Woodbury—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Benton, Bibb, Chase, Dickerson, Forsyth, Hayne, Grundy, Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of South Carolina, Troup, Tyler, White—22.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

The bill authorizing a subscription to the stock of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, was taken up as unfinished business.

Mr. GRUNDY said he would like to know the price which the stock of that company would command in market; and, previous to his voting on the subject, he would make an inquiry to that effect of the Senators from Maryland.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he did not know that he could give the gentleman from Tennessee a satisfactory answer to his query. The stock was now at par, but if forced into the market, he did not, and could not, with any degree of certainty, say what it would sell for. The company was certain of success. It was calculated that the annual proceeds would amount to eighty thousand dollars; but, from the most moderate and reasonable calculation, it would produce an annual income of forty thousand dollars, which must be divided among the stockholders.

An amendment having been proposed by Mr. LIVINGSTON, which required that the funds to meet the subscription on the part of the United States should be drawn from the sales of other stocks invested in works of similar character, Mr. L. urged the propriety and necessity of such a course, in a speech of great force and eloquence. He said that the numerous and heavy calls on the Government for aid in works of internal improvement, in different sections of the country, admonished him that nothing could save the system of internal improvement from destruction, but the adoption of some such measure as that which he had proposed. When the applications, now before Congress, for aid in the execution of works of internal improvement, were contemplated, and the amount of money which they would require enumerated, and viewed in connexion with the numerous claimants who are now calling upon the country for debts which were justly due them, he saw no alternative left but the adoption of this measure. The treasury of the Union would otherwise prove utterly inadequate to meet the calls of the different companies engaged in works of internal improvement, most of which had equal claims on the aid of the Government to carry their design into effect. Unless this system was adopted, and the funds of the General Government transferred from the one to the other, as soon as the works in which they were invested shall have been completed and in full operation, the best friends of internal improvements would be forced to abandon them, and the whole system would fall into disrepute. He was one of the most devoted friends of the system, and it was therefore that he took this means of endeavoring to preserve it.

Mr. WEBSTER said he agreed with the Senator from Louisiana, in the principles laid down in his amendment heretofore offered to this bill. He thought that the funds of the General Government in works of internal improvement ought to be a circulating fund, to be applied as circumstances might demand, for the purpose of encouraging and promoting those works in different sections of the country; and when the works have been effected, the stock should be sold out, and again applied to the encouragement of similar works. But he thought that the disposal of these stocks required the exercise of great prudence and discretion; because, if the market was glutted with funds of this character, it would produce depreciation in the price of these stocks, at once injurious to the Government and the other stockholders.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he had already expressed to the Senate his views of the merits of the bill, as also the reasons why its passage should not be delayed; and he rose at this time to make a few remarks exclusively on the amendment now proposed. He did not mean to oppose the principle which the amendment assumed, of returning to the Government the sums which might be advanced to promote various schemes of internal improvement. He did not suppose the idea had any where been entertained, that the Government was to remain permanently a stockholder in the numerous corporations to which, from time to time, it had contributed, or should hereafter contribute aid. At a proper period, and under a judicious system, he thought it was fit that the capital, so often necessary to bring into existence an improvement highly useful in itself, and which, in its incipient stage, might fail without our patronage, should be re-occupied, after its purpose was accomplished, and re-invested in some other improvement, equally useful, and equally requiring aid. In these general views, he concurred with the Senator from Louisiana; and if he would lay a foundation for this system, by procuring such information of the value and peculiar character of the various items of our property thus engaged, he would unite in adopting and protecting it. But was it wise to begin at the point whence the Senator proposed to start his project? Could we be asked first to offer our property in the market, and afterwards inform ourselves of its value? The question asked by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY] and the answer of his colleague, [Gen. SMITH] fully illustrated this matter. Neither of these Senators knew any thing of the value of the stock of the Ohio canal; and probably every other Senator on this floor was as uninformed on the subject. The same remark would, no doubt, apply to nearly all stocks of the kind owned by the Government. The time had not yet arrived when these various works of internal improvement had been prosecuted to an extent to give them the value they must ultimately command, as articles of sale; nor could it be otherwise. It was only at a comparatively late period that the finances and engagements of the Government had placed in its control the pecuniary means of aiding in the accomplishment of great national improvements, involving more expenditure than individual wealth could furnish. The character and nature of these operations necessarily made the day of return too distant from the day of expenditure, to justify the expectation of their being now in a state of maturity, either to prove the actual value of the investment, or to command that value if offered for sale. The most striking evidence of this truth is to be found in the history of one of these improvements, which had been alluded to in debate a few days ago. It was then said, the stock in the Chesapeake and Delaware canal was worth, in the market, one hundred and eighty-seven dollars per share, on which two hundred dollars had been paid. Now [said Mr. C.] it is a matter within my personal knowledge, that, five or six years ago, shares in this Canal Company, on which one hundred dollars had been paid, were sold for twenty dollars; and at a period very shortly prior to the commencement of its operations, the price was merely nominal, and it could not, probably, have been sold at a discount of twenty-five per cent., or perhaps fifty. It had scarcely commenced its operations, impeded as it is with difficulties, for the removal of some of which you have, within a few days, provided, and it already yields, we are told, a fair interest on the capital, and a price less only by five or six per cent. than par. To construct an immense canal or railroad is a work of much time, and while in progress it is necessarily unproductive. Few individuals have the ability to invest their funds in an enterprise which places them for so long a period out of active circulation, let the ultimate prospect of profit be what it may. But, whenever the enterprise is so far completed as to return a prompt and punctual interest or dividend, it becomes at once a salable property. The various improvements to which the Government has contributed its aid, are not advanced to this state of maturity, and, least of all, the Ohio and Chesapeake canal, the one indicated by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON.]

These considerations had convinced him that this was not the period at which our stocks could be sold to advantage. He believed no prudent individual, owning such property, would, under such circumstances, think of selling it; being himself uninformed of its amount, its probable future value, its present current price, and the contingencies on which depended the period and the degree of its increase in value.

But [said Mr. C.] the amendment is still more objectionable on other grounds. This system of internal improvement can only be sustained by a fair and equal distribution of the favor and assistance of the Government, in the proportion which the several objects may bear to the great interests of the country. The friends of this bill present to your notice an object of vast importance in its relations to the Government, as well as to an immense mass of individuals, and to many of the States. No scheme so grand, none of so great practical benefits, in a season of war or in years of peace, has ever suggested itself as practicable since the days of the "Father of his country," who first suggested this mode of connecting the Western waters with the Atlantic by an interior communication; and yet to the bill granting to this object the comparatively small contribution of two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, in the way of subscription to its stock, it is proposed to annex a limitation, a condition, a restraint, which has never before been annexed to any, the least of all your improvements. The Senator who offers this provision, says he is a friend to this bill. He is, certainly, a firm and well known friend to fair and equal justice. Now I put to him [said Mr. C.] and to the Senate, the question, whether it be fair and equal justice to impose on this grant a condition or restraint which has never been imposed on any similar grant to others, either at a former session of Congress or during the present. We have for years past bestowed our patronage on works of internal improvement; the beneficent arm of the Government has been extended to sustain and cherish these objects in various sections of the Union, and often when no other power could have preserved them from destruction; but to all we have given our aid without this condition or restraint. During the six months to which the present session has extended, we have again exerted this beneficent power of the Government; and in one case—the Maysville and Lexington road—of a character so doubtful in the view of some gentlemen, that the President of the United States is said to hesitate whether he will approve the act of the two Houses of Congress; yet we have seen no condition or restraint imposed or attempted. Then, why, he again asked, why select this bill, and make it the victim of this new conception, never before suggested or even thought of as a rider to such a bill. The grant asked for is moderate in amount; estimating it by the object to be effected, the bill asks that it may be made on the terms on which all others, without exception, have obtained it. The demand then is for equal and exact justice. If the object is not meritorious, give nothing. But if the object be such as deserves your countenance and assistance, (and the amendment assumes this to be the case,) surely you cannot gratify this reasonable demand for equal and exact justice, by qualifying this grant with conditions and restraints never before imposed. In all other cases a free and full authority has been given to your disbursing officer to pay from the treasury the amount subscribed; and it is not fair, it is not equal, it is not just, to restrain him, in respect to this particular case, to the proceeds of stock to be sold. What particular stock, we know not; where to be sold, we know not; and at what sacrifice it will be sold, we know not.

Sir, [said Mr. C.] the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] has suggested the propriety of preparing for the introduction of a system of selling our stocks, by asking information to be furnished at the next session. The only possible exception to it which could be urged by gentlemen who advocated this amendment, was the delay in bringing the system into actual execution. To remedy this objection, and to gratify the wishes of those who were anxious for its immediate commencement, he would suggest a perfectly practicable mode of effecting their object. Let a resolution be now submitted, directing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall sell our stocks at such periods, in such parcels, and on such terms, as in his judgment, or in the judgment of the Executive officer of the nation, will best promote the interests of the country. This will at once, instantly, create the system, and the sales will be made as soon as a due regard to the public interest shall furnish, which he supposed was as soon as any one desired. But this, he contended, should be a substantive and separate legislative act. There is no more propriety in its being connected with this railroad bill, than the Maysville bill, the Louisville and Portland canal bill, the Chesapeake and Delaware canal bill, or even the light-house bill, or, in truth, any other bill. Those had been discussed, and decided on the abstract merits of their respective claims, on considerations arising out of their connexion with the great interests of the nation, their practicability, their general utility, their cost, and the amount asked for. The friends of this bill are content to place their claim to your notice upon these considerations, and will fearlessly and confidently abide the result of such an issue. But in their name, in the name of fair and equal justice, he protested against uniting with these considerations, others growing out of a new and undigested system, touching a general policy of the Government, and in relation to a large amount of its funds having no affinity to this subject, a policy now started, for the first time, when less than ten days remain of a session of six months.

Mr. GRUNDY said, the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana had produced some difficulty. He could not agree with the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. CHAMBERS] nor concur in the force of his reasoning against the propriety of attaching the amendment to the bill at present under consideration. If the principle be a correct one, that the fund applied to the encouragement of internal improvement ought to be transferable or circulating, he saw no good reason why this bill should not be selected as the foundation on which this system shall be commenced. He went into an examination of the different stocks which the Government had invested in works of this character, the price of the stock of the great canal in the State of New York, and the depreciation it had undergone in value since that work went into operation, the demands that were now pressing upon our treasury, from the extensive appropriation bills that had passed already, besides the numerous applicants that were calling upon the country for their just claims. He thought the nation ought to pay its just debts before it enters into further speculations and appropriations of money, that it was not known what would remain in the treasury. If a transfer of the stock from the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company would answer the purpose, he would make no objection; but if the money for this project was to be drawn from the treasury, he would vote against it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that he rose to exonerate himself from the charge of hostility to the bill, made by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. CHAMBERS.] He seemed to think it a great hardship that this bill should be selected as the base on which this system is to be founded. Now he could not see what difference it would make to that company, whether the General Government paid for the stock out of the Treasury of the Union, or by a transfer of the sales of other stocks, invested in similar projects. The gentleman from Maryland must have been led into this error, from supposing that the Secretary of the Treasury was only authorized to make the subscription, in the event of his being able to dispose of other stocks at par: but this is not the fact. The Secretary of the Treasury is required to sell that stock which would command the highest price in market, and prove most conducive to the public good. He would tell the gentleman from Maryland why he was led to the introduction of the amendment to this bill. It was from a careful examination and enumeration of the different applications that are now before Congress for similar investments of stocks: they extended to a most alarming amount; and if the Government were to go on subscribing to these stocks, all recommended and supported by the same principles, the treasury would be utterly unable to meet the demands that should thus be created. The whole system would be rendered unpopular, and its warmest friends would be reluctantly compelled to abandon it. He, for one, would be forced to abandon it, if this plan of appropriating the public money to every work of internal improvement that may be presented to Congress, were persevered in. It was, therefore, because he was anxious that the system of internal improvement should prosper, that he introduced the amendment, believing that it was the only mode left to save it from ruin.

Mr. McKINLEY moved that the bill be laid on the table, which was agreed to, yeas 21, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Kane, King, McKinley, Ellis, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Webster—19.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE PECK.

Seats having been arranged on the right and left of the Chair, for the accommodation of the Senators, and their seats assigned to the managers and members of the House of Representatives, and the accused and his counsel,

At the hour of 12 o'clock, the Court was opened by proclamation in the usual form.

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, it was Ordered, That the Secretary give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate are now in their chamber, and are ready to proceed on the trial of the impeachment of JAMES H. PECK, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri; and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the members of the House of Representatives.

Judge PECK then appeared, accompanied by Mr. WIRT and Mr. MEREDITH as his counsel, and occupied seats assigned them to the right of the Chair; a short time after,

The managers and members of the House of Representatives appeared, and took the seats usually occupied by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT then asked Judge PECK whether he was prepared to answer the article of impeachment exhibited against him.

Judge PECK replied, that his answer and plea were prepared, and desired that they might be read by his counsel.

The VICE PRESIDENT asked Judge PECK whether the answer now to be made was to be considered as his final answer; and the Judge having answered in the affirmative, the counsel was directed to proceed to read it.

Mr. MEREDITH read the answer, (which occupied upwards of two hours,) concluding with the general plea of "not guilty."

Mr. STORRS, in behalf of the managers, moved

That they have time to consult the House of Representatives on a replication, and that they be furnished with a copy of the answer of the respondent; which was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, it was Ordered, That when this Court adjourn, it adjourn to meet again on the second Monday of the next session of Congress, at 12 o'clock, then to proceed with the said impeachment.

Mr. WIRT desired to know whether blank summons as for the attendance of witnesses would be allowed to the respondent.

The VICE PRESIDENT replied that they would.

The Court then adjourned to the second Monday of the next session of Congress.

On motion by Mr. KING, it was Ordered, That the articles of impeachment against Judge PECK, with his answer and exhibits, be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 1830,

REMOVAL OF THE INDIANS.

The amendments from the House of Representatives to the bill "to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi," was received, and, being read—

Mr. CLAYTON moved that they be postponed until tomorrow; which motion was rejected—yeas 19, nays 24.

The first amendment being concurred in,

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN moved to amend the second amendment, by inserting at the end thereof, "and that, until they shall choose to remove, the said tribes be protected from all State encroachments, according to the provisions of such treaties."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN moved to amend his motion by striking out the word "State," which was disagreed to by yeas 18, nays 25.

The question recurring on agreeing to the amendment as originally proposed by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was rejected—yeas 17, nays 26.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN moved to insert at the end of the second amendment of the House of Representatives, "and that all such tribes be protected, according to the provisions of said treaties, until they shall choose to remove;" which was rejected—yeas 18, nays 24.

On motion by Mr. SPRAGUE, to insert at the end of the said second amendment, "but such treaties shall be executed and fulfilled according to the true intent and meaning thereof"—it was rejected—yeas 18, nays 24.

On motion by Mr. CLAYTON, to insert at the end of the said second amendment, "Provided also, that the provisions of this act shall extend only to the Indians residing within the State of Georgia"—it was rejected by the same vote.

The said second amendment was then agreed to. So it was Resolved, That the Senate concur in the said amendments of the House of Representatives.

[Thursday and Friday were almost wholly spent in the consideration of private bills and executive business.]

SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1830.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded, by ballot, to the election of a President pro tempore; and when the ballots were collected, it appeared that twenty-six members had voted.

Of these votes, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, having received fifteen, was declared to be duly elected.

The Senate having disposed of every bill before it from the House of Representatives, proceeded to consider executive business before ten o'clock P. M. and remained so engaged until the adjournment, interrupted only by messages from the other House, and from the President of the United States.

About four o'clock A. M. the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 31, 1830.

A message was received from the President of the United States, and read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, 31st May, 1830.

To the Senate of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: I have considered the bill proposing "to authorize a subscription of stock in the Washington Turnpike Road Company," and now return the same to the Senate, in which it originated.

I am unable to approve this bill; and would respectfully refer the Senate to my message to the House of Representatives, on returning to that House the bill to authorize "a subscription of stock in the Maysville, Washington, Paris, and Lexington Turnpike Road Company," for a statement of my objections to the bill herewith returned. The message referred to bears date on the 27th instant, and a printed copy of the same is herewith transmitted.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The bill referred to in the foregoing message having originated in the Senate, that body proceeded to reconsider said bill, in the manner prescribed in the seventh section of the first article of the constitution; and two-thirds of the Senators present not having voted for its passage, it was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Hendricks, Johnston, King, Livingston, McKinley, Naudain, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Webster, Willey—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Foot, Grundy, Iredell, Kane, Rowan, Sanford, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Tyler, White, Woodbury—17.

Thirty-eight members present; necessary to pass the bill, twenty-six.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that they had appointed a committee, to join such committee as might be appointed by the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses, having finished the business before them, were prepared to adjourn, unless he have further communications to make; in which the Senate concurred, and Mr. WOODBURY and Mr. BURNET were appointed on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WOODBURY reported that they had discharged the duty assigned them, and had been informed by the President that he had no further communication to make, except that he has detained the act in relation to the subscription for the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and an act in relation to certain light-houses and harbors, for further consideration.

The usual messages were interchanged between the two Houses of their intention to adjourn.

The President then adjourned the Senate, sine die.

DEBATE IN SECRET SESSION.

[The publishers have been furnished with the two following speeches, delivered in Secret Session.]

MARCH 17, 1830.

EXECUTIVE POWERS OF REMOVAL.

The question being upon a resolution calling on the President for the cause of removal of certain officers,

Mr. BARTON said, that, upon the important questions of the power of the President of the United States to remove from office, and of the Senate to restrain him in an abusive exercise of that power, depended the question whether we are to have, in each succeeding Presidency, a four years' despotism with an irresponsible tyrant, if he be so disposed; or a Republican Government of laws, with a checked and restrained Executive.

To the discussion of these questions, [said Mr. B.] involved in the calls for information of the causes of removals now pending before the Senate, I come avowedly as a gleaner after the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON] and if I can find any heads of wheat, worth notice, in this clean shorn field over which he has passed, I will endeavor to gather and preserve them; but if I find none, it will be no dishonor to rake and bind after such a cradler, in such a field.

It is no longer a dispute about names, such as Federalist or Republican; Ultra Federalist or Democrat; National Republican or State-veto Republican; or any other cant words or phrases, with which to deceive the public, and rally partisans around our respective standards. It is a dispute in which is involved the preservation of our republican institutions and our constitutional liberties. The issues are now fairly joined upon the great fundamental principles of the Government, without regard to party names.

The majority contend that the President has the power to remove federal officers of the class now before us, and that the Senate has no right to inquire into the cause of removal; but must presume the cause to have been lawful! and cannot restrain the President in an abusive exercise of that power, but must rely on impeaching him by the House of Representatives!

The minority deny all these positions except the removing power for cause; and claim that the settled practice of the Senate shall be adhered to. That the provisional power of removal from office by a President, when it exists at all, is a high legal trust, to be exercised only for the public benefit, in sound discretion, for cause relating to the official conduct or fitness of the incumbent; and should not be perverted from its high purposes to those of partisan warfare, or personal vengeance, for opinion's sake, or the exercise of the elective franchise, or to make room for rewards for votes, or influence in our Presidential elections—or, in a word, to purposes of tyranny and bribery combined.

We contend for the restraining powers of the Senate of the United States, as understood by the contemporary expounders of the federal constitution, in matters of displacing as well as of appointing federal officers, in opposition to arbitrary Executive discretion, and servility to Executive will; and of rendering the Senate the vernal register of Executive edicts! For the freedom of inquiry into the exercise of Executive discretion and official trusts, in opposition to Executive irresponsibility, and screening the Executive from the light of truth by a suppression of free inquiry into our public affairs, as in the identical cases of removal now before the Senate. We contend for the freedom and purity of elections, unawed by official punishments, and uncorrupted by official rewards, in opposition to removals from office for such causes as those above stated.

Here are the issues joined between us: and from your decision, should it be against us, and against all your own former decisions of the same questions when other men were in power, we will appeal to the people of the United States, on whose behalf we contend, and who are always honest when rightly informed of the merits of a cause.

These questions are of vastly more importance to the permanency and purity of our liberties, and to the great cause of free governments of laws, as contradistinguished from arbitrary governments of Executive will, than either of the Presidential questions of themselves, that have agitated this republic since its foundation; and of more importance than any question of public policy, political economy, or expediency, that has divided the counsels of the nation during the lapse of half a century. These are the only questions on which I felt any desire to address the Senate. My former remarks sprang out of the occasions that produced them; but on these I feel compelled, by the verbal and written injunction of some of the great minority in Mississippi, to present their views and my own.

With that minority I have had the honor to act for many years, through good and through evil report, in all the attacks made upon the constitution of the Union in that State, in the shape of relief laws; judge-breaking; stop-laws; and the loan office act—that bold attempt to issue bills of credit by the authority of a State, to retrieve the fallen fortunes of adventurers and speculators, in violation of the letter and spirit of that instrument!

In all attacks upon that best legacy of our ancestors, the act of Union, we have stood together, sometimes in majorities, and sometimes in minorities, against the powers of interest and ignorance; knowing that the preservation of its principles, checks, and restraints, chiefly distinguishes our government of law and liberty from those despotic governments of arbitrary Executive discretion that have so long despoiled the best rights of man over the greater portion of the earth. And in this most fearful of all attacks ever made upon the constitution—introducing a four years' despotism, if the President be so disposed, and striking at our elective franchise, the root of all our constitutional liberties, we will stand together again, whether in a majority or minority, and invite all who love the President much, but love their country more, to join with us, and rally around the standard of the constitution.

It is no question whether a President may remove, at his own will and pleasure, his Secretary of State. That was the very question before Congress in the great debate of 1789. Such an officer is the mere pen, in the hand of the President, to write with—bound to do just such things as are prescribed by the personal orders of the President, in matters for which the President himself is responsible as the head of the Executive Department; and consequently he must exercise his freedom of selections, or how could he be responsible? In such case, the act of July, 1789, settles the question, by acknowledging the lawful right in the President to dismiss this instrument when he pleases.

Nobody would wish to force a disagreeable member of the cabinet on the President. The public interest requires harmony between them. And the Senator from Tennessee [MR. GRUNDY] might have spared himself all his argument to prove this; for no one had denied or disputed it. Still Mr. Madison, in the debate of 1789, expressed the opinion, that a wanton removal of this officer of the President, and not of the public, might subject a President to impeachment—although the law had given him the absolute power to make the removal—if the motive could be ascertained before human tribunals: as a mother would chastise her boy for breaking his rattle from a peevish or wicked motive, or for a bad purpose. And what does this opinion assert more than the great principle of our rights, that all powers conferred upon the Executive are but trusts for the public benefit, and cannot be perverted to other ends? There might be difficulty in ascertaining the motive or end of the act before human tribunals; but I see none in the abstract principle advanced by Mr. Madison. It is purely republican.

I do not admit, for one, that the Senate can, by law, or otherwise, renounce the restraining power which belongs to their organization; but I admit that, in practice, the President should have great freedom in choosing and rejecting his cabinet; and the act of 1789 cannot be considered as going beyond that line. But the class of officers now before the Senate, and their predecessors, attempted to be removed by the President, were not under consideration in the debate of 1789. This is a class of public officers—of officers of the law—whose term, tenure, and duties of office are fixed and prescribed by the laws of the land, and not by the Executive will, as in the other class. The first class are assistants to the President, and made removable at his pleasure by law. But this class of federal officers are public property, and not removable at the arbitrary will of a President. If good and faithful, the public is interested in their services; if bad and unfaithful, the public good requires their removal in the mode of proceeding required by the respective tenures of their offices, as prescribed by the known law. A dark and secret inquisition was never intended to be admitted into our institutions; nor was a refusal to tell the cause of objection and condemnation heretofore known to the genius of our republic; not even to the military, subject to orders; nor to the culprit, arraigned at the bar.

We admit the legal right and duty of the President to supersede, suspend the functions, or, if you prefer the term, remove District Attorneys, Marshals, Registers and Receivers of Public Monies, and Custom House Officers, and more especially the whole class of our money gathering agents, and such others as are made removable by him for cause relating to their official conduct, or fitness for their stations; but such removal or suspension is subject to the restraining powers of the Senate, on cause shown. The public interest and safety require that it should be so; and our institutions are conformed to the exigency. This, like other powers, is a public trust; and to pervert it from its original purpose is an abuse, and not a lawful use of the power. The cause of removal generates and gives life to the power of removal, as the overt act of treason gives application and life to the power to hang for treason.

Will any Senator here avow the opinion that these officers and their emoluments, or the provisional removing power of the President, were designed as either the means of bribery, or instruments of punishment, in the hands of a candidate for the Presidency, or of a President in office, to buy votes, or punish the opposing votes in our Presidential contests? Not one man will avow this. That would be grossly abusing a power conferred for the public good, and corrupting the very sources of republican, elective, and representative government—the great elective franchise itself. A removal of this class of public officers is like a nomination for office, only provisional and inchoate, until it becomes absolute and definitive by the subsequent sanction of the Senate, to be given in our established and long practised manner of proceeding upon Executive business.

As in nominating to office, so also in removing or displacing from office, in this class of the public officers, the originating act is, and for the public convenience ought to be, with the President; and in ordinary cases and times the act of the President receives the undisputed sanction of the Senate. All past experience shows this to be the fact, either because the representatives or Senators of the person nominated or removed know his suitability or qualification for office, or the cause of his removal, or because Presidents are not ordinarily disposed to abuse their powers; but for the security of the public, if there be an allegation or suggestion of the unfitness of the nominee, or of the illegality of the removal, it becomes the duty of the Senate to inquire into the matter; and act accordingly, by an active exertion of their restraining power. One design of representation is to avail the public of the better lights from the scene of appointment or removal, than a President, pent up in the Metropolis, can have.

But let me examine the true nature and extent of the despotism now proclaimed by the majority; the arguments by which they attempt to sustain themselves in their new autocracy—contrary to all their arguments, reports, and votes heretofore; and, if possible, the causes and practical consequences of this astounding proclamation.

The founders of the republic, and the people of the United States, when they adopted the federal constitution, were especially jealous of the powers of the President, and the encroaching spirit of Executive will. To that point all their principal fears were concentrated; and the history of that day shows that it was with some difficulty the people of the United States could be induced to adopt the Union, lest the President, with the powers then accorded to him, should become the destroyer of their liberties. Their fears of Executive encroachment were not idle chimeras of the fancy; nor were they affected from mere impatience of regulated liberty and a government of laws. To them they were devoted. The histories of all nations which had lost their liberties lay open before them; and they saw on their pages that arbitrary Executive discretion and will, availing themselves of the spirit of discord among the people, and the want of firmness among their representatives, in governments where the representative principle was adopted, had been the destroyers of national liberty throughout the greater part of the world where wild anarchy had not supplanted them, and that they had effected their conquests by gradual approaches, and by corrupting the sentinels of liberty; and the fathers did intend, and the most of them have left this world in the paternal confidence that they had effected the object, to establish a government of law, and of checks and restraints upon Executive will, in which no case should exist in which the fate of the humblest citizen, whether in private or public life, could depend upon the arbitrary will of a single man. No, their fears were not idle; and with such lights before them, and the then recent claim to arbitrary power urged by the British crown thrilling in their bosoms, they never would have adopted the federal constitution without the restrain-ing power and duty of the Senate during the Presidential term, when, if ever, he would be disposed to violate the rights of the citizen.

Executive Powers of Removal.

The power is now boldly asserted on this floor by the majority, for the first time since the foundation of the republic, of removing this class of federal officers by the President at discretion, without the slightest restraint by the Senate, and without even the right of a culprit to ask the cause of condemnation, upon a blind and servile presumption, on the part of the Senate, that the cause was lawful and good! And traversing the line of their whole lives, and their recent course under the late administration, the majority have proclaimed over this subject an absolute despotism and right of dark and ex parte inquisition! It fell upon my ear like the anathema of the minority pronounced from the modern Vatican! It sounded like the knell of our constitutional liberties! And let not the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNN] "lay the flattering unction to his soul," nor deceive himself, in the moments of the intoxicating victory of the combination, by supposing the public mind can be diverted from the great and vital principles at issue between us, by telling them the dispute is about the miserable offices of the country, or comparing the struggle for these great republican principles to an attempt to agitate the ocean by throwing pebbles into it, as he has done. We admit the people of the United States cannot be agitated—they ought not to be agitated—on account of the offices or the emoluments.

Was it the value of the tea tax, let me ask him, that induced some of the fathers of the revolution to throw the tea chests into the harbor of Boston, and commence the American revolution! Or was it the principle assumed by the British crown and Parliament, to bind the colonies, in all cases whatsoever, by an ex parte, arbitrary will, in which the colonies had no voice—for the British crown never advanced the claim to do so by a dark and secret inquisition. The victims might be present in the capital of England, and even in the House of Parliament, and know all the causes of their condemnation. Britons would not bear the tyrannical principle now advanced. The colonies would not bear one of a milder form. And if their posterity be not woefully degenerated from the spirit of their ancestors, since they drew the broad distinction between the value of the trifling tea tax and the great principle involved in it, they will exclaim with us, "take all the offices in the country during the term of your President, but restore to us our constitutional liberties, sacrificed to screen a rash President and cabinet from the light of inquiry, by this portentous declaration of Executive irresponsibility, and dark inquisition!"

Let me now examine the substance of the arguments by which this despotic principle is supported. And first in order is the President himself. In his first message, he labors to propagate the idea that offices, in this country, are not private property, but public trusts. We admit it. The President is right. Will he admit, in turn, our propositions, above laid down, and more especially that offices are not the private property of a President or cabinet, with which to buy popularity and votes, or to reward men for votes or influence, or as instruments with which to punish opponents for their votes and opinions? His argument is a two-edged sword, and cuts both ways with equal keenness and force; unless, indeed, it be sinful in the cardinal and bishop to eat pig and lamb, in order that his holiness the Pope may monopolize the market of Rome, and eat them all himself! The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNN] has disappointed all my hopes in him upon those momentous questions. I had been taught—and I now discover greatly mistaken—to look to him as a star of constitutional liberty in the West. In our need I cast my eyes and hopes upon him; but he vanished like a meteor from my view, and left me standing disappointed and in the dark.

In the discussion of "Foot's resolution" he introduced the argument upon this topic of the removing power of the President, and restraining power of the Senate, and told us he was not, as a citizen, in favor of removals for opinion's sake, or for votes given, or to make room to reward followers, by the public offices of the country; and then my hopes were bright, and I drew the most favorable inferences; but—yes, then came the hope-destroying "but," that in the latter branch of a sentence has spoiled so many glorious promises, in this world, held out in the first member of it—"but you shall not inquire whether the removals were for such causes or not!" and then my hopes in him died within me. We asked bread, and he gave us a stone. We desired a fish, and he gave us a scorpion. We cannot eat either of them. Let this administration digest both, if it can.

Constitutional liberty, expelled from most governments upon earth, faint with wandering the desert, and scorched by the vertical rays of domestic tyranny, beheld the Senator afar off, like the broad top of an umbrageous tree, promising her shade and protection; she hastened, heated and fatigued herself the more, to approach him, and repose under his shadow; but she found his roots surrounded by many rods of impassable, pestilential morass of Executive will, so that she could not enter the circumference of his shade, and she looked in another direction.

In approaching the argument of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL] I will not permit myself to suppose that the late consul to Algiers, (Mr. LEE,) against whom I voted with reluctance, arising from an acquaintance in 1824, that gave me an exalted opinion of the splendor of his mind; and from the double expense of outfit, and customary present to the Dey of Algiers, represented to us by the Senator from Virginia, as if he would persuade us to vote for him; as well as from the arguments urged by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE]—I will not suppose this consul is to be made the scape-goat to bear away the sins of this administration; and that the majority, having established their reputation with the public by his rejection, are now about to turn round and swallow all that huge batch of nominations lying on your table—even all the hireling printers and editors of party papers, whose nominations were cautiously held back for the arrival of the Virginia Senators from the late convention—as if it were taken for granted that modern Virginia produces a race of men, good and true, with such elastic and distensible Senatorial guzzles, as to swallow down Camel's rump of the green mountains—pinus nondum seclata suis montibus—with all its pines, oaks, and hemlocks unfelled upon its sides! Old Virginia did once produce a race of men capable of distinguishing between the value of a tea tax and the great principle of regulated liberty involved in the demand—a race apt to revolt at any arbitrary or improper use of Executive power, and jealous of the encroachments of Executive will.

The Senators from Virginia and Louisiana [Messrs. TAZEWELL and LIVINGSTON] have pointed out the power of impeaching the President as our only remedy for an abusive exercise of the power of removal—and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] concurs with the former in placing these matters upon "the high responsibility of the President!"—meaning impeachment as a remedy, or that "the King can do no wrong!" and the two former also urge auxiliary arguments, which I shall notice separately. Upon this common doctrine of the majority, that impeachment is our only remedy, we contend they are wrong upon the reason and utility of the thing, as well as upon the authority of the case.

Mark the gradual approaches of despotism. Under the last administration, all the majority, who were then in the Senate, held to a diametrically opposite creed; and now, within a few days past, there has been a great consolidation of phalanx among the faltering and oscillating ranks of the majority. Men who through their lives have taught and practised the reverse—men who have been doubting during the session, seem suddenly to have been converted, and confirmed in this new and monstrous faith of Executive irresponsibility, dark inquisition, and four years' despotism! Not hereditary as yet—the people are not ready for that. Not even for life as yet—the people are not prepared for that either. But a despotism for years, with no other restraint but to impeach the dominant party, in the person of their leader, whose popularity they abuse! Consul for years, with a servile Senate! Then Consul for life, with a more servile Senate! Then Emperor of France, with absolute power!

All history warns us that such are the regular gradations by which the liberties of mankind have been successfully assailed and overcome. They seldom fall by one grand coup de main on the first assault. The rampart of written constitutions is seldom overleaped at the first effort, as Remus overleaped the mimic walls of his brother Romulus at the rude foundation of Rome.

It is more usual and practicable to approach it by gradual undermining, or by taking sufficient distance, and planting a style of precedent two feet high, then four, six, eight, ten, until the assailants reach and surmount the wall, enter the fortress, and carry even the citadel itself. The usual process is for a combination, under some name or other, to rally around some popular leader, usually one dazzling the multitude with military fame; set him up for their head, to answer their own purposes; seize the Government, and gradually demolish, one after another, the last landmarks of constitutional liberty; and then taunt the slaves by telling them to go exercise the right of rebellion, and rescue themselves by victory if they can. If you succeed, it will be glorious revolution—if not, your chains can be riveted no closer!

The only redeeming feature in this four years' despotism of the majority, is the right of impeaching the President, to which we are pointed as a relief from our chains. That is to say, go put the majority down if you can; for never until then could you impeach their President, if there were cause. Was ever the miracle achieved of inducing a majority, in the spring tide of success, to impeach themselves, in the person of their leader, for deeds of despotism done to accommodate themselves and their friends? Impeachment indeed! As well might some philanthropist travel in the South, and there proclaim, trumpet-tongued, to the slaves of America, "Rise! impeach your masters before themselves, for holding your race in slavery for two hundred years!" And if the children of Africa should doubt the practicability of inducing the masters to impeach and condemn themselves, when made judges in their own cause, let him explain himself intelligibly—"Rise, turn the tables on your masters; enslave them for two hundred years in your turn, and make them raise corn, cotton, and rice, indigo, tobacco, and sugar cane, for you."

But suppose the miracle performed, of a majority, in the zenith of power, impeaching themselves in the House of Representatives, for the uses they have made of the President's popularity and military eclat. Is it quite sure we could persuade two-thirds in the Senate to condemn and punish him for cause, even if that were the preventive remedy against arbitrary will?

Mr. Hamilton, in writing his seventy-seventh number of the Federalist, was a prophet. In treating of the supposed danger of the Senate overruling the President, and assuming the Government, he said, "besides this, it is evident that the power that can originate the disposition of honors and emoluments, is more likely to attract than to be attracted by the power which can merely obstruct their course." And Mr. Hamilton, like another Elijah, seems to have shed his mantle upon his Elisha. A foreigner, supposed to be Mr. Poletica, the late Minister from Russia to this Government, in writing of the United States, says, the first term of an American President is always spent in securing his re-election to a second; and as to the restraining powers of the Senate, a little management in the disposition of offices can always secure a majority of that body. There was too much truth in that book, whether it be palatable or not.

No, sir, instead of a dominant party, such as the present triumphant combination, impeaching their President, the astonishing scene at this moment exhibited in this body shows the impossibility of that being the appropriate preventive against the abuse of power by the Executive. In the recess, a rash administration, surrounded and pressed by a mercenary host of office hunters, claiming the reward of their prostituted influence and votes, contrary to the known original design of the President, rushed into a course of proscription and rewards, that led them into an inextricable dilemma. The friends of law and the outraged elective rights of the citizen demanded the cause of the removals. If the administration should come out with the true causes, like conscious innocence unveiling herself, and acknowledge they had used the offices of the country as their own private property, as means of rewards and punishments, for the exercise of the right of election, the honest yeomanry of the United States, who had no sinister views in the late election, would condemn them. If the administration should shrink from the truth, fear to tell the people that their public offices had been used as bribes to buy popularity, or weapons of war upon opponents, and make a false return to our call, we could and would expose the falsehood of the return, and the cajoled public would give a verdict against them, and damn them for the double crime. Let the administration choose either horn of the dilemma, and public condemnation will be inevitable. There is no alternative but for the majority to refuse to allow the inquiry—the high and hitherto unalienable right of inquiry into the exercise of Executive discretion and official trust, which stands in republics in opposition to the maxim that "the King can do no wrong" in monarchies. And, with all the precept and practice of their lives staring them in the face, the majority has now resolved to exclude every ray of light from the causes of removal. This administration cannot bear the responsibility; but, if it be distributed among some twenty-five or six Senators, it may be less felt; and we need not be surprised if the most lucrative offices and splendid appointments should be thrown at their feet by the grateful administration; as the King would reward his parasite for saving the royal reputation at the hazard of his own; or, as Alexander, whose madness had rushed him into some inextricable ambuscade or dilemma, would reward old Parmenio, Philip's general, for covering him from the assailants, by risking his own life, and sacrificing the veteran phalanx! I appeal from the interested arguments of the dominant party, who are accused by the minority of this violation of our constitutional rights, to the venerable and disinterested authority of the illustrious dead, who founded the Government, and set it in motion; and in due time I will appeal to the past acts of the majority as good authority against themselves, and no more.

In the concluding paragraph of the same number seventy-seven of the Federalist, upon this very subject of appointment and removal, after showing the constant restraining power of the Senate to be the preventive remedy to save the republic from harm, by the encroachment of Executive will, Mr. Hamilton points out "his liability at all times to impeachment; trial, dismission from office, incapacity to serve in any other, and to the forfeiture of life and estate, by subsequent prosecution in the common course of law. But these precautions, great as they are, are not the only ones which the plan of the convention has provided in favor of the public security. In the only instances in which the abuse of the Executive authority was materially to be feared, the Chief Magistrate of the United States would, by that plan, be subjected to the control of a branch of the legislative body. What more can an enlightened and reasonable people desire? Such was the exposition upon which the people adopted the constitution of government presented by its framers.

Thus we see that the high power of impeachment was intended only for punishment and disqualification, in extraordinary cases of corruption and crime; and, in party times, can never be used until after the dominant party is down, if at all. It was never intended as the common preventive remedy of restraint upon the encroachment of Executive will, pending the Presidential term, when, if ever, the mischief will be done. So in an attorney, receiver, collector, marshal, and the like, the mischief they do is not in the moment of transit from the end of one term to the beginning of another. Pending the term, as well with the President as with the inferior officers of the Government, is the mischief-doing season; and hence the restraint of the Senate on the President, and of the appointing power on the officers of the class before the Senate, during their terms. The highest and lowest may be subjected to impeachment, which was intended to be the arsenic of the State, to be administered only in extreme cases, and then with a careful and skilful hand, and not as the food of the body politic, and the milk and hasty pudding of the republic, to be taken as daily aliment. In other countries the impeaching and the attaining power have been employed upon minorities. Man is the same in America.

The Senator from Virginia taught us directly the reverse of this in the Panama report under Mr. Adams; he now tells us, that to inquire into, and determine the cause of removal, would be prejudging the cause of impeachment that may come before us! It is an unsafe and unsound notion to consider the withholding of the advice and consent to a nomination as a reflection even upon the nominee; much less could such withholding be prejudging the President guilty of corruption and impeachable offence. But pray, would it be prejudging the innocence of the President, when he informs us, as he is bound to do, how the vacancy happened, whether by removal, resignation, or death, to sanction all, and thus commit ourselves? Did the Senate prejudice Mr. Monroe and his cabinet guilty of impeachable corruption, in rejecting the military nominations in 1822, on the ground that others were lawfully in, or entitled to those offices? It is a new idea of the Senator, and has no soundness in it. The whole effect of our proceeding is to exercise our wholesome restraining power, and determine whether there be a lawful vacancy to be filled, without touching, either by consent or refusal, the higher and distinct question, whether there be corrupt and impeachable motives. Is every court that errs in judgment of law, guilty of impeachable motives, and prejudged by the reversal of the judgment? Or, does the Senator intend to assume that there was impeachable motive in the fell swoop of this administration? I shall not dispute with him upon that point at present. No, the President, pent up in this city, cannot possibly know the fitness of applicants, or the causes of removal, so well as the Senators from the State; and hence the wisdom of this representative plan, and the restraining power of the Senate in form of advice, and not of condemnation. It should be exercised in candor and charity towards the President, as the gentle and ordinary medicine of the State, even by those called the opposition, and not to harass and embarrass the Chief Magistrate, or as arsenic to destroy him. If there be cause of impeachment, it must arise, usually, in the obstinate perseverance in arbitrary Executive will, after the Senate has approved or rejected.

Another novel doctrine of the Senator from Virginia is, that if we should determine the removal to be unconstitutional in the case of a marshal, for example, all the estates held under the sales of the successor would be void, and the proceedings in such cases, from the beginning, might be opened, and the property of the country unsettled! Suppose it be so, is not that a question for the Judiciary Department? Can any decision of the Senate, either way, on these calls for information on these nominations, change the legality of such titles? That matter is already fixed one way or the other for the past. Let us do our duty for the future. Would even the violation of our oaths, and of the constitution, secure such titles, if they be void?

The Senator from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON) as a reason for excluding the light of inquiry from the deeds of the administration, points us, in addition to the power of impeachment, to the responsibility of the President to the people at the end of his term! and even says, that is better and more direct than the greatly divided responsibility of this more numerous body! So seem to think the powers that be; and hence the cabinet and President, being but a small body, shrink so modestly from this inquiry, and expect the majority to assume the responsibility of screening them at their own hazard, by excluding the light.

But let us examine this new security for the public, which looks very much like a new edition of the homely proverbs, of shutting the door after the horse is stolen, or administering medicine after the patient is dead. The President is responsible, to the extent of his re-election, at the end of his term; but does that either prevent or cure the harm done the republic during the term? So is the whole class of officers now before the Senate responsible, to the extent of a re-appointment, to the appointing power, at the end of the term: but has that been found efficient to prevent them from embezzling our funds and ruining our affairs, so far as they lie within their circle of action, during the term; and then escaping from the continent, through the mouths of our great rivers and estuaries, or going to Texas or Mexico, before that responsibility attaches?

So the President, if disposed himself, or if pressed, as I believe he has been, and still is, by a mercenary party, into a course of illegal and tyrannical proscription, must be restrained during the term when the mischief is about to happen: for no man can pretend that our ancestors, watchful of the rights of their posterity, were less jealous of the chief Executive, than they were of the little subordinate agents of the public, or less jealous of the constitutional liberties of the country, than of the paltry trash called money. Besides, the very point of our objection is, that if the offices of the country may be thus used as property—as means of purchasing support, or instruments of repressing opponents, a combination of ambitious men, using the martial fame of a President—the bauble that has always cajoled nations out of their liberty, or had much to do in it, will in time buy their way into a permanent possession of the Government; and, with the purse and the sword, compel the people to submit to the great change in the principles of the Government now proclaimed on this floor; and then run through the rapid gradations to absolute despotism, as so many republics have done before us.

We see that combination gradually raising their mounds towards the top of our ramparts. We object to their quietly approaching, and overtopping our walls. They lull us by their speeches, as Titus might have told the Jews at the siege of Jerusalem. "Behold! this is your Sabbath day! It is not lawful to make resistance to our works on this day." The Jews kept their Sabbath, and prosecuted their internal feuds; and Titus raised his mounds, and planted his battering rams and catapults. So the Senator tells us—behold, these four years are a Sabbath; use no preventive or restraining measures; let us raise, and approach with our mounds, until the end of the term; and then you may make a sally, and throw them all down if you can. History informs us that Titus took Jerusalem. And if this dark inquisition, unexamined prescription, and abuse of the offices and honors of the country, by using them as funds to purchase popularity, be tolerated by the public, (for this minority is powerless, save only to sound the alarm,) history will tell posterity that a combination of aspirants, of all political denominations, destroyed the constitutional liberties of the United States by the usual gradations of tyranny and bribery combined, as was feared and deprecated by the father of his country! Let him who doubts this final result of the principles now advocated here, reflect a moment upon only a few of the immediate practical consequences of those principles.

And, first, the present doctrine of the majority completely annihilates the appointing power of the Senate, as well as its salutary restraining power; and confers despotic discretion upon the President. It is true, this majority could turn around again to their old opinions and practice; but, in the mean time, the liberties of the country are in danger, when the sentinel has deserted his post upon the wall; and the four years' despotism may be, as with so many other republicans, but the prelude to one of a more permanent and dreadful character.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] admits that his doctrine enables the President to keep a favorite in office, or turn the best man out, in spite of the Senate! And what is that but despotism? The admission is perfectly correct; and we thank him for so much development of the principles of this Mosaic, tasselled administration. Look at the case of William Clark, Treasurer of the United States. I take it for its strength; for his high qualifications for the office; for his mild and spotless character, and because he has rendered more conspicuous services to his country in the late war, in his humbler sphere, than General Jackson did, in proportion to his more elevated and expanded theatre of action. The Senate, friends of Jackson and all, confirmed his nomination at the last session. No sooner were our backs turned, than he was struck from the roll of office, to make room to reward a favorite eulogist of the President. And, according to the doctrines now taught, the Senate cannot even ask for the cause; but a servile Senate must register the rescript in submissive humility! There is no other way of saving your administration from public reprehension, than by screening them from the light of truth; for we defy them to show any cause for this unlawful act but the opinion of General Clark, and to reward a partisan by rendering the offices the private property of the administration, to reward their friends and punish their opponents. Their corrupt and subsidized press has been employed all summer in assigning false causes for such removals; but when the Senate meets, and the minority demands the true causes, they shrink from the inquiry in conscious guilt. And no wonder. It is safer to stand mute, than to add a false return of the conversion of the offices of the country into the means of tyranny and bribery combined, as such a use of them would be. The causes of removal cannot bear the light. The ears of the American people must not hear them! their eyes must never behold them on paper! The prime minister of the Ottoman Empire dare not dismiss a Turk from office, for the mere exercise of some privilege secured to him by the capricious edict of the Sultan, his master. Still less dare the head of an American department avow having struck an American citizen from the roll of official existence for his opinion of the fitness of candidates for public trusts, or the exercise of his sacred elective franchise, secured to him by the more permanent and august guaranty of the constitution.

What strange absurdity would it have been for ancestors to have reared this fair fabric of constitutional liberty—appointed a President and cabinet to guard it—and then to have empowered them, like another Sampson, to pull down the very pillars on which it rests, and prostrate all in the dust. What strange madness in the father of a young family to hire a guard, at twenty-five thousand dollars per annum for the captain, and six thousand dollars each for the subordinates, to watch over his household; and then authorize them to strangle the mother or nurse, upon whose preservation depends the existence of his helpless offspring! The freedom and purity of elections are as essential to our liberties as the pillars to the dome they support, or the mother or nurse to the suckling infant.

But let us return, and see how completely the doctrine of this session annihilates the very appointing power of the Senate, renders them the mere servile registers of Executive rescripts, and breaks down the dykes that keep out the ocean of despotism and corruption! Suppose Clark appointed Treasurer to-day by an almost unanimous vote of the Senate, as the fact was. To-morrow A comes, and convinces this administration that he commanded at the last election, or can command at the next, a thousand more votes than the incumbent. A is made Treasurer, and a servile Senate advises and consents to their own degradation. Next day B shows the candidate for the next Presidency that he can command double the number, and B is appointed Treasurer in place of A, removed. A servile Senate advises and consents; and so on throughout the alphabet, from A to Z. Does not every one see that the appointing power of the Senate is surrendered and gone? The restraining power of the Senate, the high trust given us for public security, and not as a feather to decorate our individual caps, is surrendered and gone. Are we asked what is the remedy? It is plain. Ask the cause of the removal; and if the administration dare tell the truth, it will be, that it was for opinion's sake, or the exercise of the elective right, or to pay a bribe previously stipulated by contract, express or implied, for votes or influence. Tell the President, as the British barons told their King, "we are not willing to have the laws of" appointment and removal changed. Tell him the cause of the removal is itself unlawful, and the removal void—not only unlawful, but against the constitutional rights of the citizen and the Senate, and doubly void; and, consequently, there being no other objection, William Clark is still Treasurer of the United States of right, though ousted by superior force. But if a false return be made, let the people and their representatives determine which master they will serve, the President or the constitution; and if the latter, impeach him for violating the constitutional rights of the citizen, and making the false return; if the former, let them wear their chains, as unworthy of liberty regulated by law, and go worship their idol, and tremble at his frowns.

Let me read you another practical consequence from your own book, the long neglected report of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BREXON] made 4th May, 1826, (when Mr. Adams was President,) upon the propriety of curtailing Executive patronage. Listen, and admire the fulfilment of the prophecy.

In page 3, * * *. "And in this aspect of the reality we behold the working of patronage, and discover the reason why so many stand ready, in any country, and in all ages, to flock to the standard of power, wheresoever, and by whomsoever, it may be raised."

In pages 10 and 11. "We must then look forward to the time * * * when the nomination by the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principles of public action will be open and avowed, the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage; I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the government of one man? And what is the government of one man but a monarchy? Names are nothing. The nature of a thing is in its substance, and the name soon accommodates itself to the substance."

"Those who make the President must support him. Their political fate becomes identified, and they must stand or fall together. Right or wrong, they must support him."

"* * * A precious confession! So thought Washington when warning us of the danger of combinations, for Washington called things by their right names. With him, in that instance, the name was quite significant of the thing so much to be dreaded by posterity. Behold in this administration, and in this majority of the Senate, the realization of the fears of Washington, and the fulfilment of the predictions of the prophet of evil!

You have only to add, as your speeches indicate that you will, your sanction to the practice of removing men without a shadow of lawful cause, or any other that you dare avow, to make room for corrupting the very sources of mental light, by rewarding the corps of mercenary editors; or to reward even the very electors of President and Vice President—who, above all others, should stand aloof in the high and honorary duty they perform, like Cæsar's wife, not only free from reproach, but above suspicion; and then add a dark, ex parte, worse than Spanish inquisition of condemnation and removal, and refuse all inquiry and public knowledge of the causes—and your four years' despotism will be complete! "The President must be supported, right or wrong. He wants my vote, and I want his patronage!" Hang over the palace door, as you please, the label of "law and liberty," inside stalk the demons of dark, inquisitorial, proscriptive despotism, amidst the clanking apparatus for forging chains and manacles for slaves!

But there is a redeeming spirit in the American character. The sons of Revolutionary sires will never submit to this. I do not speak of commotion and revolt, the last resort of wretched slaves, but of the calm majesty of freemen, (cajoled, deceived, and infatuated by an interested office hunting combination, using the common artifice, the martial fame of their leader, and the cry of coalition and reform,) rising, and, in the forms of their violated elective franchise, redressing their wrongs, and reclaiming their rights and liberties, as inherited from their fathers. For, in leaving the graves of their forefathers, and migrating beyond the grand range of the Alleghanies, to find free space and easy sustenance for themselves and their families, they carried with them, even to the remote wilds of the Osage and Desmoines, the St. Francois, and the Merri-mack, those principles of union and civil liberty which they inherited from their fathers, and there cherish them in their hearts, and impress them upon the minds of their children.

Turning with disgust and abhorrence from this picture of despotism and midnight inquisition, with the determination of freemen not to submit to it, let us look upon that fair portrait of law and liberty with which the gentleman from Delaware cheered us, and fix our hopes upon its future restoration.

Beverly Allen, District Attorney of Missouri, to whose case I will advert, for the sake of illustration, as to holy ground, where the flag of opposition to this despotic inquisitorial abuse of power was first unfurled, in his memorial, concluded in common charity, when his removal, pending his term, was announced to him, that some causes had been represented to the administration for such a summary condemnation without notice, and he asked for the cause. He asked the Secretary of State, and he declined to answer him! He inquired then of the President, and he stood mute! He besought the Senate of the United States to tell him, and the majority refused to print his respectful and laconic memorial, and now declare that they will not even inquire into the cause of his condemnation!

The culprit, arraigned at the bar, and the military, subject to the personal orders of the President, and liable to be stricken from the roll by his fiat, are entitled to more courtesy and fairness than this.

And, on behalf of the outraged rights of the country, I now appeal to Mr. Madison, who is still living, and to the just spirits of the illustrious dead, whose voice is to be heard in the constitution of the United States, in the contemporaneous expositions of that instrument, and in the early legislation of the country, and to the laws of the land, to learn the true extent of this power of removal from office, the causes for which it may be exerted, and the concurrent and restraining powers of the Senate of the United States, in such cases, to secure the citizen from the arbitrary will of a single man. The opinion of Mr. Madison we have in the case where, by law, the President has the absolute power of removing his creature at will, that no wanton use can be made even of that absolute power—an opinion in consonance with the genius of our republic, which views all powers as public trusts, and none as mere prerogatives. The constitution, article 2, section 2, gives the appointment of the whole class of officers of the public now before you, with terms, tenures, and duties prescribed by law, and not by Executive will, to the President and Senate of the United States. Congress has not thought it proper, if they possess the power, to bestow the appointment elsewhere; but has left this whole class upon the provisions of the constitution.

I have attempted to demonstrate, and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. L.] admits, that the doctrine now contended for by the majority annihilates the appointing power of the Senate, and renders the President absolute, and at liberty to keep in or turn out men in defiance of the Senate. The restraining power belongs to the organization of the Senate, for the public security; is a high constitutional trust, without which the appointing power of the Senate is annihilated; and we cannot renounce it, nor desert our constitutional post, as guardians of the public liberty. To abandon it changes the nature of our Government, and, as you yourselves declared in Mr. Adams's time, makes the President a monarch! Under this dereliction of duty, the United States are no longer a republic! Tell us no more of the tyranny of kings, and of the servility of parasites and courtiers, bowing and acknowledging "the King can do no wrong." It is a striking circumstance that they who have pretended most regard for popular rights and democracy, are the advocates of the alarming power now conceded to the President.

Let us now hear the contemporaneous expositors of the constitution, to learn if such arbitrary and unexamined discretion was contemplated. Mr. Hamilton, one of the framers of the constitution, in the seventy-seventh number of the Federalist, says, when he, and Madison, and Jay, were expounding the nature of our Government to induce the people to adopt it:

"It has been mentioned as one of the advantages to be expected from the co-operation of the Senate in the business of appointments, that it would contribute to the stability of the administration. The consent of that body would be necessary to displace as well as appoint. A change of the Chief Magistrate, therefore, would not occasion so violent or so general a revolution in the offices of the Government, as might be expected if he were the sole disposer of offices. Where a man, in any station, had given satisfactory evidence of his fitness for it, a new President would be restrained from attempting a change in favor of a person more agreeable to him, by the apprehension that the discountenance of the Senate might frustrate the attempt, and bring some degree of discredit upon himself. Those who can best estimate the value of a steady administration, will be most disposed to prize a provision which connects the official existence of public men with the approbation or disapprobation of that body, which, from the greater permanency of its own composition, will, in all probability, be less subject to incompetency than any other member of the Government."

After refuting some objections of that day, that the Senate would influence the President, and assume the control of the Government, Mr. H. says, "if, by influencing the President, be meant restraining him, this is precisely what must have been intended. And it has been shown that the restraint would be salutary, at the same time that it would not be such as to destroy a single advantage to be looked for from the uncontrolled agency of that magistrate. The right of nomination would produce all the good without the ill."

Some annotator to this number of the Federalist has appended a note, saying, "this construction has since been rejected by the Legislature; and it is now settled in practice that the power of displacing belongs exclusively to the President."

This note ought to be expunged, as calculated to mislead students and weak cabinets. It is not true, in point of fact, that the Legislature has rejected this construction; nor true, in point of law, that the Senate can renounce an iota of their restraining power that belongs to their organization, and chiefly distinguishes our checked and restrained Executive from one of arbitrary will. The whole idea of the annotator was taken from the laws respecting the assistants of the President, to perform duties prescribed by him as under the act of 1789, and not applicable to the officers of the public, or of the law, to perform duties prescribed by the laws of the land. The correctness of Hamilton, and the error of the annotator and his disciples, of the majority, can be demonstrated if there be truth in logic and common sense. The argument stands thus: without the concurrent power of the Senate in matters of appointing, (as you admit in your report of 1826, before quoted,) the President becomes a monarch. The appointing power of the Senate is annihilated by taking away their restraining power, as the column or edifice is prostrated by removing the pedestal or foundation that sustains it. Therefore, you have proclaimed your President a monarch, according to your own premises and arguments, by refusing the light necessary to the use of the restraining power. Hamilton has been accused of too strong a bias towards arbitrary power. But Hamilton was a tame republican, in favor of a checked and restrained Executive; and if a bias to arbitrary power be a proof of true greatness, much greater, if not more disinterested, statesmen than Hamilton are here.

The Senator from Virginia [MR. TAZEWELL] has read us the form of a commission, stating that the office, in such cases as we have before us, is held at the pleasure of the President! A full proof of the constant encroachment of Executive will, and of the necessity for an equally constant restraining power of the Senate, as taught by the fathers! but no proof whatever that the clerk or attorney who made the form of the commission did thereby repeal the constitution and laws, and the checked and restrained organization of our federal Executive, which distinguishes it from a despotism for a term of years.

I will now approach the stronghold of modern democracy, claiming unrestrainable Executive power in removals from office, supposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [MR. WOODBURY] to confer the power now claimed upon the President: the act of 15th May, 1820, "to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named, and for other purposes." The act, then, names the very class of money-gathering public officers now before us, and leaves the appointment to the President and Senate. There is nothing in the title of the act that warns us of change in the relative powers of the President and Senate, or premonishes us of the approach of dark inquisition, despotic power, or the downfall of constitutional liberty. The political aspect of the act forebodes no revolution of power. All seems to be a mere affair of money, to secure our revenues from the infidelity of defaulting officers of the Treasury Department! It establishes the tenure of office in these words: "shall be appointed for the term of four years, but shall be removable at pleasure." At whose pleasure, pray? At the pleasure of the prime minister, or the premier's sweetheart? or is it at the pleasure of the President's arbitrary will? I answer, no; for that would annihilate the appointing power of the Senate, and make the act unconstitutional, as the Senate cannot renounce, even by law, the restraining power that belongs to its constitutional organization; not for its own honor, but for the safety of the public; but at the pleasure of the appointing power, in the ordinary and hitherto harmonious mode of originating by the President, and sanctioning or restraining by the Senate. The construction must be in favor of the liberty of the citizen, and not in favor of arbitrary power, if the law were doubtful. Even in the monarchy of England, that is the rule. Let us take the good old common law and common sense rule of construction laid down by Justice Blackstone, and consider the old law, the mischief of the old law, and the remedy proposed by the new law; and so construe it as to suppress the mischief, and promote the remedy.

By the old law there was no summary power, except the disputed one of taking care that the laws be faithfully executed, to arrest the career of official delinquency; and the process was doubtful and dilatory, by which the cause of removal was to be established, whether by impeachment, indictment, information, or civil suit. The evil of the old law was, that, while the Government was plodding through some tedious process of law, amidst its delays and proverbial uncertainties, the defaulter could embezzle our funds, and ruin our affairs, so far as they lay within his control, and escape to Texas, the West Indies, Mexico, South America, or Europe, before the process had ascertained whether there were lawful causes for removal or not. And the remedy here proposed is the summary suspension of the functions of the officer, for cause, subject to the constitutional restraining powers of the Senate, as in all other like originating acts.

Thus, we see, it was far indeed from the design of that law, even were it practicable, to change the relative powers of the Government, or to make the offices of the country the private property of the President, to buy votes, or punish opponents, or to render the cause of removal less, the very gist of the whole proceeding, than it was before that law. If the proceeding were by impeachment, indictment, or information, or civil action, the cause would be the gist of the whole. On that the issue would be joined. That would be tried; and, on that, judgment of condemnation would be rendered before the removing power could be exerted. And when, with the sole view of saving the public moneys, a summary proceeding is given, does the cause of removal become the less essential? Does the necessity of assigning it, or the right of the Senate and public to know it, become less absolute? The necessity and propriety of knowing the cause become more imperious as the proceeding is rendered more summary; because there is more danger of the arbitrary will of a single man in the latter than in the former mode of proceeding. The cause gives life and action to the power of removal. Until the cause be given, the power remains a dead letter, a mere power in abeyance. The law of treason confers a salutary power on the Judiciary Department of the Government, to condemn the traitor; but, until the overt act, or the cause of applying the law, exists, the judiciary has no right to issue a mandate to hang a man. The Executive Department has no more right to exert the provisional right of removal, until the cause occurs, than the judiciary has in the other case. The power, in both cases, is a public trust; and we protest, with the constitution of our country in our hands, against keeping the cause a State secret, and thus establishing a secret, dark, and unrestrainable inquisition.

The legislator, in 1820, naturally asked himself what term and tenure of office would attain the desired public security? To hold for life would be too irresponsible. To fix his tenure during good behavior would not remedy the evils of the old law; then there must be a process at law to convict him of the cause, before the removing power could be exerted. To make him removable at the will of the President alone, as in the case of 1789, would make the President too absolute. And hence the provision for a term of years, provided he so long behaved faithfully, removable at the pleasure of the appointing power, during his term, if he gave cause; and the cause is just as material and examinable here, as under the old law. Under both, it is the very essence of the matter. The summary proceeding was to stop the career of delinquency, and not to confer arbitrary power.

And where is the provision in the law of 1820, presuming to confer upon a President the anti-republican power of holding a dark inquisition, striking officers from the roll, and then refusing to tell the cause? Or making the cause a secret of State, or the removing power an Executive prerogative, absolute as that of an Autocrat of Russia over his serf, or a King of Prussia over his slave? No, sir, this class of the officers of the public do not hold their stations at the capricious will of any man; but by a legal tenure for four years, provided they so long perform their duties, and retain their fitness for the station.

Mr. Monroe removed a surveyor general of Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas, under a similar law, for causes sustained by judicial proof, taken in a suit to which the officer was a party. The accused was notified and present, and gave all exculpations and explanations in his power. Mr. Monroe referred the matter to his attorney general, Mr. Wirt. He reported the causes, sustained by proof. That report was then submitted by Mr. Monroe to his cabinet, for their advice. They did more than they were bound to have done; but they erred, if at all, on the side of constitutional light and liberty. There was no suppression of the causes of removal, or dark inquisition there. There was no skulking from the light of day, like guilty Adam, among the thick shrubbery of Eden, in that, as there is in the present administration!

Let us now assume a new point of view, and look at this matter in another aspect; for its acknowledged importance demands all our attention.

To create a lawful vacancy, by removal or resignation, there must be a lawful removal or resignation. Every ouster by physical force is not a lawful removal; nor is every forged paper a valid resignation; nor every feigned death a vacation of office. Nominations to fill vacancies must and do state how the vacancy occurred; and to what end, if the Senate had nothing to do, as now pretended, with the question whether there was a lawful vacancy or not. A is nominated in place of B, resigned. B comes and shows the paper to be a forgery, and no resignation. Or, C, in place of D, deceased, exhibits himself in full life. Or, E, to be Chief Justice of the United States, in place of John Marshall, removed. Every body knows the Senate could and would inquire into the legality of the pretended vacancies, and correct the procedure in the two first cases as errors in fact; and, in the last case, as error in law. They would look behind the nomination, and take notice that the President has no power, by law, to remove the Chief Justice; but we would reject E, and leave the Chief Justice to the hand of time, and his legal tenure.

So, in these cases, the President has no more power to remove the officers of the public for their opinion or vote in an election, nor to make room for favorites, in the absence of any lawful objection, than he has to remove the Chief Justice, or to deprive citizens of their constitutional rights, or to change our institutions into the monarchical form: and, there being no other objection to them, they are in office during their term, unless they give lawful cause, thereby giving lawful power of removing them. At the end of his lawful term, he may be delivered over to the corrupting party discipline of the times, to be buffeted; but even there it is the duty of the Senate to restrain the perversion of the public offices into means of rewards and punishments, or of bribery and tyranny combined, on discovering such a disposition in an Executive, upon the high and patriotic ground that such an abuse of power strikes at no less vital object than the root of our liberties—the elective franchise itself. Yes, in all such cases as are now before the Senate, the cause of removal generates the power of removal; and such has been the uniform and harmonious practice of this Government in all the halcyon days of the republic, (and lawyers themselves do not look for good precedents to troubled and revolutionary times,) as the commission of any other offence gives application and life to the appropriate power of prevention for the future, by punishing for the past; which, but for the commission of the offence, would have lain dormant for ever.

I now appeal to the settled practice of the Senate for half a century, and will quote the majority against themselves, in support of the republican character of our Government, in opposition to the new despotism now declared on this floor. The gentleman from Delaware has taken so ample a range over this branch of the subject, that I shall content myself with a few prominent instances.

1. In the celebrated contest between Mr. Monroe and the Senate, upon the military nominations in the year 1822, the Senate looked behind the nominations of Colonels Towson and Gadsden, without any objection to them, and there found General Bissell and Colonel Jones in a situation that, in the opinion of the Senate, gave them a right to the offices of Colonel second artillery, and Adjutant General, and practically asserted their restraining power by rejecting the nominations of the two former officers to fill those places. Mr. Monroe acquiesced in the decision of the advisory power of the Senate, and nominated Colonel Jones, who now holds the office of Adjutant General; and Mr. Adams, when President, acquiesced in the case of Bissell, and nominated him for the other office. General Bissell's friends contended he was in the army, liable to be arranged to that service by order, and needed no nomination; and rejected it on that ground, as it would cut off some years' pay to appoint him anew. On the committee that recommended this course, was the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON.)

There was a contest in the Senate concerning the true construction of the law of 1821 to reduce the army; but none upon the great duty of the restraining power of the Senate, although the President had the right by law to strike officers from the roll, as he had not proceeded under that power.

2. In the Panama discussion and report in 1826, when Mr. Adams was President, there was a dispute upon the expediency of our attending or participating in the proposed American Congress at Panama and Tacubayo; but none as to the restraining powers of the Senate. The present majority, or so many as had seats here at that time, acted upon the comprehensive principle, that it was the right and duty of the Senate to look behind the nominations, and re-explore all the ground over which the mind of the President might be supposed to have passed in arriving at his conclusion to send in the nominations.

On February 20, 1826, Mr. ROWAN submitted, among others, the following resolutions, which, on the 22d, were modified by Mr. WOODBURN, except the following, which they both voted for as it is:

Resolved, That it is the unquestionable right of the Senate to call, in respectful terms, upon the President of the Executive Powers of Removal.

United States for such information as may be in his possession, and which the Senate deem necessary to the faithful discharge of the duties imposed upon it by the constitution; and more especially the duties resulting from matters which the constitution makes it the duty of the President to submit to the Senate for their advice and consent.

I deemed it unnecessary to make a question about a thing "unquestionable," and have a vote upon it; and moved its indefinite postponement, which was carried; but we called for all such information without hesitation, as an unquestionable right. The following members of the present majority voted even against postponing the resolution, affirming a power given by the constitution, and not dependent on our resolution, viz. Benton, Dickerson, Ellis, Hayne, Kane, King, Rowan, White, Woodbury, (Mr. Tazewell being absent,) and all the Senators appointed to the heads of departments, and now shrinking from a similar call!

3. The only remaining conspicuous instance which I shall deem it necessary to quote, is the report to curtail Executive patronage, already quoted, showing that the powers you now concede to the President make him a monarch!

Thus we see that portion of the present majority veering and vibrating, under different administrations, like a surveyor's needle among the mineral banks of Missouri, according to the power of the attraction; first pointing to the new diggings, then to Mine au Briton, then to Valle's mines on the Platin, and then to the great iron mountain between the waters of the St. Francois and Merrimack. They are never fixed to the pole of the constitution; but seem to govern by the law of majority—the law of force! An administration that did not wish concealment for cause, would thank the Senate for its aid, counsel, and advice upon the causes of the removals, and avow them like open men of conscious rectitude. The people are not dissatisfied with the administration for removing upon cause, as they have done in several instances in and out of this city; but this attack upon the freedom and purity of elections is striking at the root of the tree of liberty, and, if not arrested, will leave it in this republic, as in so many others, stripped of its bloom and foliage, the scathed victim of withering despotism.

There are two remaining objections of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr L.] to be answered. He transfers himself back to the birth of the republic, and imagines all to be untried theory before him, when in fact we have been practising harmoniously upon this restraining power of the Senate for half a century, with salutary effect. He imagines the first step in removing an officer, under the system advocated by the minority, would be to convene the Senate; and submit the cause of complaint to them; and deprecates the expense and trouble, and, above all, the ease with which a delinquent, while the Senate were convening and debating, could transfer himself and his ill-gotten wealth beyond the reach of investigation, as this administration are modestly retiring from that light to hide their blushes. His premises are wholly imaginary, and his conclusions are, of course, equally visionary. The originating act of suspending the functions, and arresting the career of delinquent officers, is, and ought to be, with the President, either during the recess or the session of the Senate; and the matter is then submitted to them when they are in regular session, in the established manner we have described. The delinquency of a revenue officer is not the emergency for convening an extra session of the Senate. That power was given for great emergencies of State.

He supposes great difficulty from vexatious complaints. Safe experience answers all this against him. It is found, in practice, as easy to distinguish between querulous and vexatious allegations of removed delinquents, and the manly, indignant sense of high-handed Presidential, or low party cabinet tyrannies, as the gentleman himself supposed it to be, some years ago, to draw the broad distinction between the summary process of Mr. Jefferson, in seizing the batture at New Orleans, and the due proceeding at law, for which the gentleman so ably contended, and ultimately obtained, in that celebrated case. No, sir, a delinquent or unfit person, removed from office for cause, will usually be the last man to court investigation, but will hide his blushes, and enjoy, if he can, his peculations, in the deep forests of the West, or in the "solitudes of great cities" in the East, or abandon the country; and in nine out of every ten thousand cases of removal for cause, the Senate will know, or easily learn, the cause, and, acting for the interests of the country, pass all, sub silentio, as past experience proves.

If our ancestors had left it in doubt—if the question had never been discussed or submitted to the American people—whether we should have the despotism of four years now proclaimed by the majority, or the checked and restrained Executive claimed by the minority, the construction should be in favor of popular rights and the representative principle. It would be so in England, which we are in the habit of considering a tyranny, although the rights, characters, and feelings of the subject there, in public and in private life, are better secured than they are here, at the present epoch in our history. But that question was not omitted by the wise forecast of the framers of our Government. It was directly before the people; ably discussed, and solemnly determined in favor of constitutional liberty, as claimed by the present minority. The fair mode of proceeding would be for the majority to propose an amendment to the constitution, and submit the question to the people, which of the two will you choose? And not thus, by an unexpected desertion of their post, let in the enemy of despotism, which the nation thought for ever excluded. I must leave your own minds to imagine the redeeming results that would be produced by a firm, practical re-assertion of the restraining power and duty of the Senate, and of the principles for which the minority contends.

It would arrest the downward tendency of the country to universal office-hunting, and consequent corruption and servility, and reclaim them to the high and honorable patriotism of their fathers of the Revolution. By connecting the official existence of our public officers with the approbation or disapprobation of the Senate, you will create a race of elevated and independent public officers, looking, like freemen, to the performance of their duties, and to the protection of the laws for their places; and free the country, in time, from that brood of servile sycophants, lounging around the Capitol, or caves-dropping at the houses of their fellow-citizens, or carrying on a system of low espionage in tavern halls, or at street corners, to catch the unguarded expressions of men, to be retailed at the palace, or heads of departments, to produce vacancies for themselves to fill—a brood of beings, which, in all countries, have been the ready instruments with which unbalanced ambition has destroyed law and liberty. And you will restore the Government to what it was represented to be, when, with jealous forebodings of the encroachments of Executive will, it was adopted by the fathers of the republic and their compatriots, at the purest period of our national existence. If the Senate be faithful, all can be retrieved! And we call upon all those with whom we have acted under other administrations, upon the military nominations, and so many other occasions, not to abandon the republic; but to aid us in rending the thick veil of dark and silent mystery that hangs over these removals.

"Give me but light; I ask no more."

If your administration have not violated the essential principles of the republic, let that be made manifest by the light. We are not contending for the offices—take them all. But, if the administration have stricken at the root of our tree of liberty, let them bear the consequences in open day, before the American people. You tell us, the President is responsible to the people. How can the people judge without light? You are about to desert the post assigned you as the restraining power upon the President during his term, when the mischief will be done, on the ground that he is responsible to the people at the end of his term; and still you refuse to give them the means of judging whether he has used this power of removal for purposes of tyranny and corruption, or for good causes, rendering the removals proper for the public good! Look at the frequent demands of Beverly Allen for the causes of his removal, and the refusal to answer him, first of the Secretary of State, then of the President, and then of the majority here! How can the people of Missouri tell but Allen is a defaulter? How can the people of the West tell but their land officers, stricken from the roll, have failed to make their lawful returns to the Treasury Department, or embezzled their funds?—or the people of the Atlantic, but the records of the treasury show official misdeeds in the former incumbents of their custom-house officers, when you thus hide your President in inscrutable darkness and despotic silence. But, if the Senate be faithless to their high trust, there is no hope but in the redeeming virtue of the public.

All history warns us that the grand object of conquest, in the invasion of republican liberty, has been this citadel—the Senate, or restraining power upon the Executive, by whatever name it may be called. You yourselves solemnly warned us, in your report, to cut tail Executive patronage, when Mr. Adams was at the head of our affairs—to beware of the spirit of servility to Executive will, and the corrupting influence of Executive patronage! That spirit, availing itself of the discords of mankind, has prowled the world, like a wolf in sheep's clothing, seeking to surprise, and destroy law and liberty; and has deprived more than half the world of them, by fraud and force combined. And we need not be surprised to see this insinuating and enterprising enemy assail this last citadel. Should it come, it will not be with sound of clarion and herald of war, openly proclaiming a permanent despotism of Executive irresponsibility. No, it is too cunning thus to give the alarm to the public, and defeat the object. It will more probably come sauntering along, like Satan going up to worship among the sons of God; and begin by scattering doubtful speeches among the Senators: as thus the emissary of Satan—

“Come, let us reason together—no premature commitments, my noble friends! It will not do to alarm the public by proclaiming Executive irresponsibility and unrestrainable will in form, although we must have it in effect; for the rash administration has, without waiting to consult us, rushed into a dilemma, from which we cannot extricate them.

“There is no alternative but to enshroud them in darkness, as Jupiter did the enemies of Ajax, so that the public cannot see to strike them, until the thing be forgotten, and the storm blown over.

“It will not do openly to deny the restraining power of the Senate—that is the very republican feature in the Executive Department. That power and duty are as clear as the sun in a cloudless atmosphere. Besides, my noble friends, you are all committed upon that subject already! yes, even recorded upon that!

“Hear my advice, then: acknowledge the restraining power, seemingly, to the public—say, in your speeches, that removals from office ought not to be made for opinion's sake, for exercising the freedom of election, to reward partisans, or punish opponents—hang this sign over your door for the public to read; but adopt this grand stratagem—vote down all inquiry into the cause of removals—cover the administration with impenetrable darkness—and laugh in your noble sleeves at the minority when they, with the ancient Greek, demand but light.”

And thus, if you will listen, will this wily emissary harangue you for hours, insinuate himself into your favor, and ultimately achieve the conquest of the world.

From all the indications of the last two days, I now anticipate such a death-blow to the republican feature of our Executive Department—the restraining power and duty of the Senate! This majority will pass the Rubicon!

Time was, when the patriotic sires of degenerate sons would have moved heaven and earth at such an outrage upon their constitutional rights! But let us not despair of the Republic. There is a redeeming spirit in the American character; and to that we will appeal.

SPEECH OF MR. MARKS,

ON THE FOLLOWING RESOLUTION.

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate the cause or causes that led to the removal of William Clark from the office of Treasurer of the United States.”

Mr. MARKS said, that, in offering this resolution, he intended no disrespect to the President. He had often said, in the presence of this body, that he would not oppose the present Executive of the United States, when he believed his measures to be conducive to the interest and prosperity of the Union. Were he to act on any other principle, he would not consider himself a faithful representative of the State he had the honor in part to represent; but, knowing as he did, that the Senate possessed concurrent power with the President in making appointments to office, and when a faithful officer was dismissed, under circumstances of a nature both aggravating and cruel, he conceived it to be not only their right but their duty to inquire into the causes that led to his removal.

I am unwilling to believe [said Mr. M.] that such a high-handed measure would have been exercised during the recess of the Senate, unless representations touching the character and qualifications of Mr. Clark had been made to the President, which were both unfounded and unwarrantable. It is difficult to believe that the President, for mere party purposes, would remove from office one who so short a time had discharged the duties of the station he filled, and in opposition, too, to the unanimous opinion of the Senate, so shortly before expressed. The removal of Mr. Clark presents a case of a peculiar nature. I believe nothing like it has been before the Senate during this, or any previous session; and, to say the least of it, it shows an evident disrespect to the opinion of this body. Let us revert to the history of the case.

During the summer of 1828, Mr. Clark was appointed Treasurer by the late President, to supply a vacancy that had occurred during the recess of the Senate. He continued to fulfil the duties of his office, to the entire satisfaction of all who transacted business with him; no complaint was known to exist. At the next meeting of Congress, and after the result of the Presidential election was known throughout the United States, a majority of the Senate was favorable to, and supported, the President elect. Mr. Adams, still being in the exercise of the duties of his office, on the 11th December submitted the nomination of Mr. Clark to the consideration of the Senate. It passed through all the ordinary forms of examination; was referred to the Committee on Finance, a majority of whom were opposed to the then President. The committee, however, took a different view of the subject from that since acted on by the present Executive; they believed that an honest expression of opinion, which is guaranteed to us all by the constitution of our happy country, ought not to be a disqualification for office; and I am warranted in saying this, because it was as well known then as it is now, that Mr. Clark had expressed opinions favorable to the re-election of Mr. Adams. Yet, with these facts before the committee, they reported the nomination for confirmation; and, with the knowledge that the Senate had of the political sentiments of the nominee, the nomination was confirmed without a dissenting voice. Then, if at all, would have been the time to have raised objections to the appointment of Mr. Clark, and to decide whether a free expression of opinion was to be considered as a disqualification for office: but not being so considered by the Senate, the President has shown a mark of disrespect to its well-known sentiment, by not allowing two months to elapse after the adjournment of the Senate, before he drove Mr. Clark from the office to which he had been appointed, without cause, and, as I contend, contrary to the principles of the constitution.

When the political standing of persons appointed to office is so frequently brought in review before this body, it may not be amiss for me to state that the person who was so unceremoniously removed from the situation of Treasurer by the President, commenced his political career in Pennsylvania, as a republican of the Jefferson school, and for a period of more than twenty years, which he spent in the service of his native State, has not been known to deviate from these principles, always giving a free, full, and honorable support to every republican administration we have had in the country. If it be necessary to show the estimation in which he was held by his fellow-citizens, a brief sketch of his official life will best illustrate that fact. When I first knew Mr. Clark, he held the office of Associate Judge, in one of the western counties of Pennsylvania. How long he performed the duties of that station, I am not informed; but I can assert, without fear of contradiction, that he filled that office with the approbation of all who knew him, or had occasion to transact business with him.

At the same time Mr. Clark held the office of Brigade Inspector; a situation which made it his duty, on any sudden emergency, to organize and march the militia to any point where danger threatened, or their services might be required; and, in this latter situation, he particularly distinguished himself in 1812, shortly after the surrender of our army on the Northwestern frontier.

We are, emphatically, a military nation. When I say this, I mean to be understood in a relative sense; and, in justification of this position, let me only recur to what so often takes place in this body. Whenever a nomination is taken up for consideration, should it so happen that the nominee has served in any military capacity in the last war, it is only necessary to hear the statement made that he was a gallant officer, and you know how swimmingly it goes through the Senate. It is in vain to disguise it; we are all more or less influenced by these considerations: and while I will not yield to any other person my respect for those who have fought and suffered in their country's cause, I mean to show that this principle has not been carried out by the appointing power, but that other considerations are necessary to ensure success—a devotion to the dominant party.

If it can be shown that no man lives at the present day, nor did any one live at that time, to whom this nation is more indebted for the preservation of that very fleet, which, under the command of the gallant and lamented Perry, first broke the power of Great Britain on the Northwestern frontiers, than to the late treasurer Clark, it will not surely be considered strange that I should offer a resolution calling on the President, in respectful terms, to submit to the Senate the reasons that induced him to make the removal. And, to show that I have not been making incorrect or unwarranted statements, I beg leave to read a few paragraphs from the Pennsylvania Reporter, a paper edited by Samuel C. Stambaugh, and published at the seat of government of Pennsylvania. I offer this article as part of my argument—first, because it enters more minutely than I can do from recollection, into all the particulars of the service performed by Mr. Clark; and, secondly, because I believe a majority of the Senate will consider it as coming from an orthodox source. The statement which I propose to read is dated the 4th January, 1828, at the very heat of the last Presidential election. The paper in which the article is published did as much, and perhaps more, than any other in the State, to support the election of General Jackson—the editor of the paper being as warmly attached to General Jackson and his cause as man could be; yet, justice to Mr. Clark induced him to make the following statement of facts:

“During the late war, William Clark held the office of Brigade Inspector of the first brigade, sixteenth division, Pennsylvania militia, composed of the five Northwestern counties of Pennsylvania; and the following duties were performed by him: He received general orders, dated 12th May, 1812, to draft, and organize forthwith, four hundred and twenty-eight men, which was done without delay, and muster rolls were transmitted to the Adjutant General. On the 15th July, 1812, Governor Snyder ordered Major Clark to draft and march forthwith two classes of his brigade, not detached under orders of the 12th May aforesaid, to guard and protect the frontier settlements bordering on lake Erie; also, to purchase powder, and lead for balls, together with all other necessary equipments and subsistence consequent to the service. This order was promptly executed. No money, however, having been furnished by Government to carry the order into effect, Major Clark applied his own money, borrowed large sums, and, in addition, gave his individual obligations, to the amount of many thousand dollars—thus organizing, equipping, and subsisting the troops, for several months before he received remuneration from Government.

“On the 10th of August, 1812, Major Clark received an order from General Kelso, who held authority from Governor Snyder, to call on him, Major Clark, from time to time, for such numbers of militia as circumstances might require, for the defence of the frontier; to furnish two hundred additional troops for the defence of the town of Erie. Having arrived at Erie with the detachment required, and whilst engaged in providing subsistence for it, an express arrived from the West with news of the surrender of the Northwestern army, by General Hull, to the British forces under General Brock, and that the British and Indians were pressing down upon the American settlements bordering upon lake Erie, both by land and water. Immediately on the receipt of this disastrous intelligence, General Kelso ordered Major Clark to call out, as soon as practicable, all the military forces he could possibly raise. Speedily to execute this order, he left Erie on the morning of the alarm, and arrived at Meadville at about 11 o'clock A. M., a distance of forty miles, despatched expresses in every direction through his brigade, put Captain Witheram's light infantry company under march by 3 o'clock P. M., which arrived at Erie the following day by 10 o'clock, A. M., made arrangements for subsistence of such troops as might pass through Meadville for Erie. Left Meadville for Erie at 6 P. M. with a number of mounted men, and arrived at Erie before sunrise next morning. Thus having rode eighty miles within twenty-four hours, besides having performed the enumerated duties; the consequence of which was, that upwards of two thousand troops arrived at Erie thirty-six hours after issuing the order. These troops were also partially subsisted by Major Clark, he having received no money from Government. After the fears of the frontier inhabitants had somewhat abated, these patriotic men returned home, leaving but a small force for the defence of the frontier.

“But a few days more had only elapsed, when the British brig Hunter came to anchor close to the bar of Erie harbor, and within cannon shot distance. Her decks appeared crowded with men, her boats were lowered, and every appearance of a determination to land troops was exhibited. On this occasion, Major Clark, after supplying the troops with ammunition, &c., shouldered a musket, and volunteered as a private in Captain Morris's company, to oppose the landing of the British troops. The brig, however, hauled off. In obedience to an order of the Governor, dated 25th of August, 1812, Major Clark furnished a detachment from his brigade to join the army ordered to Black Rock, under General Taneyhill. In pursuance of an order from the Governor, dated September 5th, 1812, a battalion of militia was organized under general orders of the 12th May, 1812, to form part of the army assembling under General Harrison, in the State of Ohio, for the defence of the Western frontier. Early in 1813, Government commenced building vessels of war at the Erie harbor, to contend with the British for mastery on lake Erie, which work progressed with unexampled rapidity. About the middle of July the vessels were nearly completed, and Commodore Perry considered the station in imminent danger of an attack from the British with the view of destroying our vessels in their unfinished state, from the fact that the British fleet daily made its appearance off the harbor. Under this perilous circumstance, Commodore Perry made a pressing appeal to Major General Mead to furnish militia immediately for the protection of the vessels and other public property then at Erie, to a vast amount. General Mead was so well aware of the importance to the nation of having so important a station guarded against danger from the enemy, that he ordered Major Clark to march his whole brigade forthwith to the town of Erie. With such promptness was this order executed by Major Clark, that, in forty-eight hours after receiving it, one thousand militia had arrived at Erie, and, on the fifth day, twenty-eight hundred organized militia were tendered by Major Clark to the commanding General, the greater portion of them having marched from forty to ninety miles. These troops were furnished with subsistence by him on their march; and while they remained at Erie, large detachments of them were incessantly engaged in assisting to get the fleet over the bar, procuring ballast, &c. And when the fleet was ready for service, as many of these troops as could be taken on board volunteered with Commodore Perry on his first excursion on the lake in search of the enemy. Late in December, 1813, the British crossed over to the American side, and burnt the town of Buffalo. Captain Elliott, who then commanded the Erie station, where all our vessels and naval stores lay, considering the station to be altogether unprotected by land forces, and nothing to impede the march of the British from Buffalo to Erie, deemed it necessary, for the safety of the station, to call on General Mead for a military force for its defence. To constitute such defence, General Mead issued his orders to Major Clark, on the 1st of January, 1814, commanding him to march his whole brigade immediately to the Erie station, which orders, considering the inclemency of the season, were executed with extraordinary promptitude and despatch. The time spent by Major Clark in executing these numerous orders, holding courts martial for the trial of delinquents, and settling with Government, necessarily occupied nearly three years, to the total neglect of all private concerns. And while engaged in performing those services, numerous and arduous as they were, Major Clark received the pay of a major, which compensation, to say nothing of his personal services and those of a horse, was not equal to his actual expenditures.

"In Governor Snyder's order of the 5th September, 1812, to Major Clark, he expresses his high sense of the valor of these patriotic citizens, who voluntarily flocked to the standard of their country, on the Northwestern frontiers of the State, to arrest the progress of an invading foe. In a letter from the Secretary of the Commonwealth, of the 7th September, 1812, to Major Clark, on the subject of military affairs, he concludes as follows: 'I have only to add, that the Government highly applauds your patriotic exertions.'"

I ask, if examples of such sacrifices were numerous during the late war? Do they constitute no claim to public gratitude with those who rule this nation? And the only way left for the Senate to show their disapprobation of the removal, is to do what has been often done heretofore—to call on the President for his reasons of action. He may have been deceived. If so, it will be satisfactory to the Senate to know it, and but justice to himself to make it known. He will not withhold the information.

It may, however, be said, that the President was not informed of the extent of Mr. Clark's services to the country, or of his character as a citizen in his native State. I am instructed to say that he did know it; and with the information before him, it would have been creditable to the President to have suffered him to remain where he found him, at least until he could have had an opportunity of consulting his constitutional advisers.

I have now shown the way the late Treasurer served his country during the last war. I have shown you the estimation in which he was held by his fellow-citizens; the various offices he has held to their entire satisfaction. I have shown how and when he was transferred to this place, and appointed Treasurer; the unanimity in the Senate in confirming the appointment. I now inquire, was there ever a President in the United States, previous to the present, with the knowledge of all these facts before him, who would have exercised such high-handed measures? I think I am warranted in saying there was not, and I hope such examples hereafter may be rare.

The whole appointing power is conferred upon the President and Senate jointly. Whenever the Executive shows a disposition to abuse the power vested in him by the constitution, by an unlimited exercise of those constructive powers, never intended to be conferred by the instrument, the Senate of the United States, who possess co-equal and co-ordinate power, ought immediately to check such disposition, and restore the instrument to its original intention. If the President is permitted, during the recess of the Senate, to go on, and remodel the Government, by turning out and substituting whomsoever he pleases, it at once reduces the Senate of the United States into a mere registering body, divested of all Executive influence or Executive control; and this, too, not only without positive grant, but in plain contradiction to the positive expressions of the constitution.

Again, I am borne out in my opinion, when I say that the power exercised by the President to remove from office, during the recess of the Senate, without cause, is arbitrary and unjust; I am borne out in that opinion by a sentiment that dropped from one of the gentlemen from Tennessee, in the debate on another subject. The gentleman said, (I took down his words,) "that all men who exercise office for party purposes, ought to be dismissed from office; but, for the exercise of the rights of suffrage, they ought not to be dismissed." I will now appeal to my colleague; he has had the best opportunity of knowing, and I am sure he will state nothing but facts. Did Mr. Clark, previous to the last Presidential election, exercise the influence which the office he held, that of Treasurer of the State of Pennsylvania, gave him, to party or political purposes? I feel confident my colleague will say he did not. That he expressed his opinion freely in favor of Mr. Adams, I have no doubt; but at the time of the election he did not vote on either side of the question. It is well known he then resided in this District, and was not entitled to a vote.

I have been somewhat surprised at what we have witnessed in this body, when the nominations made by the President have been brought up for confirmation, (I allude particularly to those of district attorneys.) A member has not risen upon this floor, however pleased they may have been with the nominee in other respects, but what has admitted them to be inferior in point of capacity to those they have succeeded. And is this no abuse of power in the Executive, to remove good officers, and supply their places with others less qualified? Instead of improving the system of your Government, and the moral and intellectual condition of your citizens, as the President ought to endeavor to do, we find a letting down in every department. Is there no way to put an end to these abuses? There is. Let the Senate pass the resolution now before you, and, my word for it, the President will be more careful in making his selections for the future. There is one other subject I would notice. I would not recur to it, had not so much been said, at different times, by gentlemen in the opposition, about the peace societies that existed throughout the Union during the last war. We, at that period, had a peace society in Pennsylvania; which society did as much, wrote as much, and arrayed themselves as much in opposition to the war and the measures pursued by the then administration as any other similar society. And what do we now find to be the fact? Scarcely had half a year rolled round from the time of Clark's removal, until the President bestowed an office on the very President of that peace society, the confirmation of which took place not more than ten days since, in this body. It may be asked, why was not this information disclosed at the time? To this I answer, that neither my colleague nor myself knew it to be the same man when the nomination was before us, although I had heard of his removal to the West. Yet it never occurred to me as being the same person, nor would I yet have known it, had I not received the information, a few days since, from a member of the other House. It is, however, but candor to state, that had I known the nominee to be the same person, I should have disclosed the peace society business with reluctance. His connexions in Pennsylvania, so far as I am acquainted with them, are highly respectable, and he himself possesses many estimable and good qualities. I have mentioned this circumstance as a set off to the attempts that have been made to make the world believe that the members of these peace societies are now arrayed in opposition to the administration, when the contrary is the case. I fear men are now more regarded for their devotion to those in power, than devotion to their country. I have nothing further to say, but to express a hope that the Senate will pass the resolution now under consideration.

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, Dec. 7, 1829.

At 12 o'clock, precisely, the House was called to order by MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, Esq. Clerk to the last Congress.

The roll of members having been called over by States, it appeared that there were present one hundred and ninety-four Representatives, and three Delegates from Territories.

A quorum of the House being present—

The House proceeded to ballot for a Speaker. Mr. CONDUCT, of New Jersey, Mr. RIPLEY, of Maine, and Mr. POLK, of Tennessee, being appointed Tellers, announced, after counting the ballots, that ANDREW STEVENSON had received one hundred and fifty-nine votes; which, being a majority of the whole number, ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia, was declared to be duly elected Speaker of the House.

THE SPEAKER'S ADDRESS.

Being conducted to the chair, the SPEAKER elect addressed the House in the following terms:

GENTLEMEN: I receive this renewed and distinguished proof of the continued confidence and approbation of my country, with feelings of deep sensibility and unaffected gratitude; and since it is your pleasure that I should again preside over your deliberations, I accept the trust, with an earnest hope that the choice of the House may not prove injurious to its interests, or detrimental to its honor.

Of the importance and responsibility of this high office, it is unnecessary to speak. It has been justly regarded, both in relation to its elevation, and the nature and extent of its duties, as one of the most delicate and responsible trusts under the Government. Indeed, the great increase of legislative business, both of a public and private nature, (occupying, as it does, so large a portion of the year,) the number of this House, and the habit of animated, protracted, and frequent debate, have, of late, tended very much to render the duties of the Chair peculiarly arduous to the individual who fills it, and of increased importance to the public.

How far it will be in my power to meet the expectations of the House, by an able and enlightened discharge of the duties of this high station, it is not for me to say. Distrustful of my own abilities, I can promise but little else than zeal and fidelity. I shall shrink from the performance of no duty, however painful; shun no responsibility, however severe; my time and talents shall be devoted to your service; and, in pursuing the manly and steady course which duty directs, I shall, at least, be cheered and sustained by a consciousness of the purposes, and a confidence in the principles, which I shall bring with me into this arduous service. On your part, gentlemen, I shall expect and need your kind and cordial co-operation, and that general confidence, without which all the efforts of authority would be nugatory; and I entreat you to afford me that aid and support in maintaining the established rules and orders of the House, so necessary to the character and dignity of its deliberations, and the despatch of the business of the nation.

In assembling again to consider the condition of our beloved country, I seize the occasion to offer you my cordial congratulations upon its prosperity and happiness, and the still more exalted destinies that await it. Whilst our relations with foreign Powers are distinguished by alliances and good will, which serve but to render our friendship more valuable to each, and more courted by all, our situation at home, under the influence of virtuous and patriotic councils, is peaceful, united, and happy. How long these blessings are to be enjoyed by us, and secured to our children, must depend upon the virtue and intelligence of the people; the preservation of our happy Union; and the virtuous, liberal, and enlightened administration of our free institutions.

That our confederated republic can only exist by the ties of common interest and brotherly attachment, by mutual forbearance and moderation, (collectively and individdually,) and by cherishing a devotion to liberty and union, must be apparent to every candid mind; and, as our fathers united their counsels and their arms, poured out their blood and treasure, in support of their common rights, and by the exertions of all succeeded in defending the liberties of each, so must we, if we intend to continue a free, united, and happy people, profit by their counsels, and emulate their illustrious example.

How much will depend upon the conduct and deliberations of the national legislature, and especially of this House, it is not needful that I should admonish you. I need not, I am sure, remind you, gentlemen, that we are here the guardians and Representatives of our entire country, and not the advocates of local and partial interests: that national legislation, to be permanently useful, must be just, liberal, enlightened, and impartial: that ours is the high duty of protecting all, and not a part—of maintaining inviolably the public faith—of elevating the public credit and resources of the nation—of expending the public treasure with the same care and economy that we would our own—of limiting ourselves within the pale of our constitutional powers, and regulating our measures by the great principles contained in that sacred charter, and cherishing in our hearts the sentiment that the union of the States cannot be too highly valued, or too watchfully cherished.

These are some of the great landmarks which suggest themselves to my mind, as proper to guide us in our legislative career. By these means, gentlemen, we shall not only render ourselves worthy of the high trust confided to us, but we shall endear to our people the principles of their constitution and free institutions, and promote a sentiment of union and action, auspicious to the safety, glory, and happiness, of our beloved and common country.

The oath of office was then administered to the Speaker by Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, (the father of the House,) and by the SPEAKER to the members, by States in succession.

This ceremony being ended—

Mr. RAMSAY, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Matthew St. Clair Clarke, Clerk to the late House of Representatives, be appointed Clerk to this House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said that he was informed that there would possibly be several other individuals who would be candidates for the office of clerk. He therefore proposed to postpone the election to twelve o'clock on Thursday, to enable members to make up a judgment upon the information which they might in the mean time receive of the characters of the various candidates. This officer, he said, was the chief controlling executive officer of this body; his situation was one highly confidential and responsible. It was due to the members, and to the candidates, that a better opportunity should be afforded for selection from amongst the latter, than he at least had enjoyed. He had himself intended to move that on Thursday next, at twelve o'clock, the House would proceed to the election of a clerk; and with this view he moved to postpone until Thursday next the consideration of the resolution now under consideration.

Mr. RAMSAY asked what was the House in the mean time to do for a clerk? Could the House proceed in its business without that officer? In offering the resolution, [Mr. R. said] he had only followed the example, set by former Congresses, of electing the clerk immediately after the choice of Speaker. And he asked that the question of postponement should be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered upon the question.

In reply to a question put to the Chair, whether the late clerk would be considered in service until an election of clerk took place, the Speaker answered that he presumed that he would.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, suggested the postponement of the election to to-morrow instead of Thursday.

Mr. JOHNSON proposed Wednesday, as the medium between to-morrow and Thursday. The object of his motion for postponement, and the only object of it, was to obtain time to make up his mind upon information which he might receive as to the relative merits of the several candidates for this office. To-morrow the message of the President might be expected to be received, and the other officers of the House also were to be elected; so that the election of clerk could not well be made until Wednesday, to which day, therefore, he now moved to postpone the consideration of Mr. RAMSAY'S motion.

Mr. BURGESS, of Rhode Island, said that if the old clerk could continue to act as clerk for several days, without an election, why not for the whole session? When was his service to end?

The SPEAKER said that that was a matter for the discretion of the House.

Mr. BURGESS said that the mere necessity of the case made it proper that the clerk to the last House should act in organizing the present. But, when the House had gone so far as to choose a Speaker, it appeared to him that the necessity was over, and that the House would be without a clerk, unless one should be immediately chosen. Without a clerk thus chosen, he did not see how the House was to make any record of its transactions.

Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, thought that no difficulty could arise from a postponement of the consideration of the resolution. He thought the resolution improper in itself, and, when the gentleman from Kentucky rose, he was about to have risen himself, and propose that the House should proceed to an election by ballot. He preferred that the whole question should lie upon the table for the present, and that, whenever the House should proceed to the election of a clerk, it should be by ballot. As to the old clerk continuing to act, [Mr. A. said] it had been the universal practice that the old clerk should continue to act until another should be appointed.

Mr. RAMSAY expressed his willingness, if it would meet the views of his friend, so to modify his resolution, as to propose that the House should now go into an election of a clerk.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, said he trusted that such a course would be pursued as that the House should at once go into an election by ballot. And perhaps his colleague was wrong in now proposing a different course. It had been the practice, Mr. B. knew, where no opposition to the old clerk was intended, to re-appoint him by resolution. The gentleman from Kentucky, however, had stated that he believed that there were other candidates for the office. Mr. B. said he did not know the fact: but, if there were, the proper course was, as usual in such case, to proceed to ballot for a clerk. He should, himself, vote to lay the resolution on the table, and then to proceed to an election by ballot.

Mr. RAMSAY then withdrew his resolution in favor of Mr. Clarke, and moved, in lieu thereof, that the House do now proceed to the election of a clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved to amend this last motion, so as to go into an election on Wednesday next at twelve o'clock, instead of this day.

On this question the House divided—ayes 54, the yeas being a large majority.

The motion to proceed directly to a balloting was then agreed to. Mr. RAMSAY then nominated Mr. Clarke, and Mr. JOHNSON nominated Virgil Maxcy, of Maryland.

The votes having been collected and counted by Mr. RAMSAY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. BUCHANAN, it appeared that the number of votes given in for Mr. Clarke was one hundred and thirty-five; which, being a majority of the whole number, MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE was elected Clerk of the House of Representatives, and was forthwith sworn into office.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, it was resolved, nem. con. that JOHN OSWALD DUNN be appointed Sergeant-at-Arms to the House.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, the House then proceeded to the election of a doorkeeper. The late venerable (though now infirm) doorkeeper, Capt. BENJAMIN BURCH, was nominated, in a very appropriate manner, by Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina. Several other persons were nominated by different members. The ballots having been counted by tellers named by the Speaker, Mr. TUCKER reported that Mr. Burch had received one hundred and thirty-six votes, (a large majority of the whole number,) and was consequently chosen.

On motion, it was then resolved, nem. con. that OVERTON CARR be appointed Assistant Doorkeeper to this House.

The usual message having been interchanged with the Senate, it was resolved that a committee be appointed on the part of this House, to join such committee as have been, or may be, appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that quorums of the two Houses have assembled, and that Congress are ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make.

A motion having been made for the usual order for furnishing members with newspapers—

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, objected to it. He said, that the subject of furnishing, at the public expense, papers for the private convenience of the members of this House, was referred to a committee last session, and that that committee had, in its report, recommended a discontinuance of the practice. His mind, he said, had undergone no change on this subject. He was of opinion that the application of the public means to this object was not justifiable. But, in order to test the question, he moved to lay the resolution on the table.

This motion was negatived; and the resolution for continuing the usage was agreed to without a division.

TUESDAY, DEC. 8, 1829.

Mr. DRAYTON, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, &c. reported that the committee had waited on the President accordingly, and that the President answered that he would make a communication to Congress this day.

The message of the President of the United States was soon after received, by the hands of A. J. DONELSON, Esq. his Private Secretary, and read. [See Appendix.]

Whereupon, ten thousand copies thereof were ordered to be printed for the use of this House.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 9, 1829.

Mr. CONDUCT, of New Jersey, observing that it seemed proper, before proceeding to distribute among committees the several subjects of the President's message, that the standing committees of the House should be appointed, therefore moved the following order:

"Ordered, That the standing committees be now appointed, pursuant to the rules and orders of the House."

Mr. BUCHANAN said that there was, he believed, an unusual number of new members in the present House of Representatives; and it was desirable, certainly, that the Speaker, who was to appoint these committees, should have time and opportunity for inquiry before he appointed them. It was not probable, he said, that any legislative business would be done in the course of the present week, and for that reason he moved that the motion lie upon the table, to give the Speaker a better opportunity of becoming acquainted with the new members, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to Mr. CONDUCT the expediency of withdrawing his motion for the present, and renewing it to-morrow or another day.

Mr. CONDUCT said, the practice heretofore had been to adopt a similar order before the message was considered; and, as the committees were not announced until the reading of the Journal on the day following the adoption of the order, a whole day was thus given to the Speaker for the selection of the committees.

The SPEAKER said, that it had been the practice, at the opening of a new Congress, to allow the Speaker three or four days for the selection of the committees.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he should not have moved to postpone the motion for now appointing them, if he had not known that to be the fact.

Mr. MALLARY said, that, should the order be now made, it would, he presumed, not necessarily follow that the committees should be announced to-morrow.

The SPEAKER said, that, if the order was now made, the committees must be announced to-morrow.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, if the pending motion was laid upon the table until to-morrow, and should then be adopted, the House might then, following precedent, adjourn over to Monday, and thus afford the Speaker the requisite time of three or four days for a selection of the committees.

Mr. CONDUCT said he had no objection to this course. The motion of Mr. CONDUCT was then ordered to lie upon the table.

THURSDAY, DEC. 10, 1829.

Mr. CONDUCT called up his motion, made yesterday, for the appointment of the standing committees; which was agreed to by the House.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; when the several branches of the President's message were referred to the different standing and select committees.

The several resolutions for the reference of the message were offered by Mr. POLK. On one of them, the fourth, which was in the following words:

"Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the modification of the existing tariff of duties on goods imported into the United States, be referred to the Committee on Manufactures"—

A debate occurred.

Mr. J. W. TAYLOR said, he considered the general arrangement of the business as judicious; and the gentleman from Tennessee had so prepared his resolutions, as to present the various points in the most clear and perspicuous manner. He wished to have, however, some limitations in this resolution which refers to the modification of the tariff. If the gentleman from Tennessee would refer to the President's message, he would find that it contains suggestions looking to proposed modifications of the tariff. One modification is to be found in the ninth page, and begins thus: "The general rule to be applied in graduating the duties upon articles of foreign growth or manufacture, is that which will place our own on a fair competition with those of other countries," &c. presenting the great principle in regard to the protection of American manufactures. The other class, referred to in the 10th page, commences thus: "Looking forward to the period, not far distant, when a sinking fund will no longer be required," and going on to state, that, in reference to tea and coffee, a reduction of the existing duties "will be felt as a common benefit."

His object was to move an amendment to this resolution; which would have the effect of referring that part which relates to such modification as looks to the protection of our own manufactures, to the Committee on Manufactures, while it refers so much as pertains to the modification contemplated by the reduction of the duties on tea and coffee, which is exclusively a revenue arrangement, to the Committee of Ways and Means. Only so far as the duties are regulated with a view to the protection of our manufactures is it properly an object of reference to the Committee on Manufactures. He would therefore move to amend the resolution by inserting, after the words "United States," the words "with a view to the protection of manufactures."

The question being on the amendment,

Mr. POLK said, that, as the resolution had been adopted in committee, it was no longer under his control. It was suggested, however, by a gentleman near him, that the amendment, with a modification, might be proper. The modification which he suggested was, to add the words "except that part which refers to the reduction of the duties on tea and coffee, which is referred to the Committee of Ways and Means."

Mr. TAYLOR reminded the gentleman from Tennessee that he had already referred every thing relating to the revenue to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that reference embraced the object of his present motion. This is a subject of revenue, and it is by no means necessary to go into the particular specifications as to the duties on tea, coffee, &c. That matter is of necessity before the committee, unless it shall be particularly excluded.

Mr. POLK stated that his only object was to render the language of the resolution more specific than it was before he offered this amendment. His object was to give to the Committee of Ways and Means all the duties which legitimately belong to it, and to refer to it all those topics in the message which are within its sphere. It was suggested to him that there might arise a conflict between the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Manufactures, as to which was in possession of the specific recommendation contained in the message; and, in consequence of that suggestion, he had proposed his modification. It could do no harm; if it were productive of no other good, it would indicate the will of the House as to the committee to which the subject should be referred. The Committee of Ways and Means has all the subjects relating to the revenue before it; and the modification he had suggested would have the effect of making this reference more clear.

Mr. EVERETT suggested that either the original resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee, or the amendment of the gentleman from New York, might produce the effect; but the amendment now suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, following the amendment of the gentleman from New York, would lead to the inference that the duties on tea and coffee were laid "with a view to the protection of manufactures."

Mr. POLK then withdrew his proposition to amend.

Mr. McDUFFIE then stated that he disliked the phraseology of the amendment. It seemed to be framed under the impression that the modifications recommended by the message looked exclusively to the benefit of the manufacturers. He hoped that this impression was not the correct one.

Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, suggested to the gentleman from New York the propriety of withdrawing his proposition, and accepting an amendment to the following effect: "And that so much as relates to a reduction of duties on those articles of import which cannot come in competition with our manufactures, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means."

Mr. TAYLOR said he should be happy to give this gratification to the gentleman if he could. But it must be evident to all that the message does recommend the protection of manufactures. Whether the recommendation is judicious or not, is not now the question to be discussed. What he proposed was, to give a respectful reference to the appropriate committees of all the matters which the Chief Magistrate had submitted to the consideration of the House. It was not now for him to oppose, to vindicate, or approve of those matters. That was a subject for discussion hereafter, and "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." Let that matter, therefore, rest. He wished the subject to go to that committee, where it would receive the fullest consideration. When he was up before, he read a paragraph from the message, which, after stating that the general rule was to "place our own [manufactures] in fair competition with those of other countries," went on to state that "the inducements to advance even a step beyond this point are controlling in regard to those articles which are of primary necessity in time of war." The President had thus expressed his opinion on this point in explicit terms. If there be a single article manufactured in the United States, which is of primary importance in time of war, the President, in regard to that article, recommends a protecting duty. Here, then, appears the propriety of considering what class of articles is here alluded to, and what are embraced in the principle, and these are fit subjects of consideration for the Committee on Manufactures. But, in regard to the whole subject, it appears that if we take what is said in the last paragraph in the ninth page, we shall find there is a distinct recommendation to carry the principle further. That paragraph reads thus: "The agricultural interest of our country is so essentially connected with every other, and so superior in importance to them all, that it is scarcely necessary to invite to it your particular attention. It is principally as manufactures and commerce tend to increase the value of agricultural productions, and to extend their application to the wants and comforts of society, that they deserve the fostering care of the Government."

How are these to receive the fostering care of the Government, unless by the protecting duties referred to in the amendment he had offered, with a view to the consideration of the committee? It was far from his intention at this time to invite discussion. He had supposed that, as there were two classes of modifications, the one relating to manufactures, and the other to revenue, it was proper, as the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee would carry the whole subject to the Committee on Manufactures, to limit the reference to those points which the gentleman, doubtless, intended to refer to that committee. To carry that into execution, and to divide the matter according to the arrangement in the message, he had made his present motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, suggested an alteration in the phraseology, so as to make it read, that so much as relates to manufactures be referred to the Committee on Manufactures; and that so much as relates to revenue be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MARTIN said, that his object was not to provoke, but to allay discussion, when he offered his amendment. It appeared, however, that the only difference between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Tennessee, and himself, was about words. The question was simply, how much should be referred to these distinct committees? The only fear of the gentleman from New York seemed to be, that the Committee on Manufactures might decide on matters which did not come properly within its sphere. He thought the committee might be fairly left to determine its own sphere of duties. It appeared to him to be plain and intelligible. The idea is that the tariff, so far as it concerns our manufactures, is a subject appropriate for the action of the Committee on Manufactures; and that the subject, as it relates to revenue, is for the action of another committee. To meet this view, he had submitted his proposition to the House; and he would take occasion to move it, should the amendment of the gentleman from New York be rejected; so that not only tea and coffee, concerning which the gentleman from New York seemed to feel the deepest anxiety, but all articles on which high duties are laid for the purpose of revenue, should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. That was his object.

Mr. POLK agreed that this discussion, which had so unexpectedly arisen, was merely a discussion about words. He could assure the House that his only object was to refer that part of the message which relates to manufactures to the appropriate committee. It was now the time to determine what the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means are. Whatever concerns the revenue of the Union belongs appropriately to that committee. He had thought, when he made his proposition, that tea and coffee required a separate specification. In this he had been corrected by the Chair, who regarded these as subjects to be considered within the cognizance of that committee as a matter of course. If so, the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina would be as unnecessary as that which he himself had withdrawn, which was similar in its import. He had supposed that the resolution embraced all which the gentleman from New York should require. He thought it premature to raise discussions merely as to forms of words, the effect of which might be to give an interpretation to the message which might not be warranted, on partial views, and without that deliberate examination which ought to be taken.

Mr. H. R. STORRS asked if it would be in order to move to strike out the words "modification of the tariff," and substitute "domestic manufactures?"

The SPEAKER decided that the motion would not be in order, until the question should be determined on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STORRS said, that, on reading the message, it did not occur to him that that part which relates to tea and coffee had any reference to the question of manufactures. The question intended to be submitted in the message is, whether the duties on tea and coffee may not be reduced when the state of the revenue will no longer require these duties. He thought this had no reference whatever to the subject of manufactures. His object was to strike out the words "the modification of the tariff," and to insert, in lieu thereof, the words "domestic manufactures." This would be plain language, not to be misunderstood.

The motion of Mr. TAYLOR to amend the resolution was then decided in the negative.

Mr. STORRS then made his motion to strike out the words "the modification of the tariff," and to insert the words "domestic manufactures."

Mr. McDUFFIE said it was originally his object to avoid the inference that the President intended either to recommend any increase, or only a diminution of duties. He thought the amendment seemed to imply that there was nothing in the message on the subject of the modification of the tariff, which did not look to the increase of duties. He thought it might as reasonably be presumed to look to the reduction of the duties. The language of the message is equally applicable to reduction as to increase of duties. He preferred the amendment of the gentleman from New York, which had been just negatived. His object was to convey the idea that the modification of all duties, whether to increase or diminish them, should be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. STORRS, and decided in the affirmative.

The resolution, as thus amended, was then agreed to; and The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1829.

The different Standing and Select Committees, which had been appointed by the SPEAKER during the recess, were this day announced. No other business was transacted.

REFUSE LANDS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. CROCKETT moved the following resolution, viz. Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, with instructions to inquire as to the most equitable and advantageous mode of disposing of the refuse lands lying south and west of the Congressional reservation line in the State of Tennessee.

This resolution being read,

Mr. POLK, of Tennessee, moved to amend the resolution, by striking out so much as proposes a select committee, and moving to refer the subject of the resolution to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CROCKETT said, that he wished this subject to take the same course now as it had done heretofore. The resolution referred [he said] to a few scraps of land lying along in his district, which it was high time should be disposed of. The subject had been already several times before Congress, and had always heretofore been referred to a select committee; and all that he asked was, that it should take the same course now as it had done heretofore.

Mr. POLK said, that a part of this subject was always before the Committee on the Public Lands in the shape of a memorial from the Legislature of Tennessee. He thought, therefore, that a reference of this resolution to that committee was expedient, that all parts of the subject should be placed before the same committee.

Mr. STERIGERE, of Pennsylvania, said, that, at the late session of Congress, a proposition had been made for distributing the vacant public lands, or the proceeds of them, among the several States. This proposition was so connected with the subject of this resolution, that, as he expected it would be renewed at this session, he moved that the pending resolution lie upon the table for the present.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was negatived.

Mr. CROCKETT made some further remarks, in which he was understood to say that the Legislature of Tennessee was disposed to withdraw its former memorial. But, however that might be, he said his colleague [Mr. POLK] had heretofore had this matter in his charge as head of a select committee; and, [said Mr. C.] as I live among the people who are interested in these lands, I want now to have something to do myself with the disposition of the subject.

The motion of Mr. POLK to amend Mr. CROCKETT's resolve was then negatived, 92 to 65; and Mr. C.'s resolution was agreed to.

WESTERN ARMORY.

Mr. DESHA moved the following resolution, viz.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an armory at some suitable point upon the Western waters.

Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, proposed to amend the resolution, by adding to it "or at the falls of ———, in the State of Kentucky," and added some observations to show the strong claims of this location for the proposed armory.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, thought that, considering the variety of conflicting claims for this object, the resolution had better be general in its terms, and refer the whole subject of the establishment of an armory on the Western waters to the same committee; that all the sites in the Western country might be considered together.

The resolution was then modified, with the consent of the mover, so as to propose a general inquiry into the expediency of establishing an armory on the waters of the Western States.

Mr. CARSON, of North Carolina, remarking that no part of the country possessed more valuable water power than the western part of the State of North Carolina, proposed to amend the resolution by adding "or on the Western waters of the State of North Carolina."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, he regretted this motion on the part of his friend from North Carolina, as calculated to produce a collision between the West and the South as to the location of an armory. He was perfectly willing to vote for an independent proposition to inquire into the expediency of the erection of an armory in the South, but he was unwilling to connect it with a proposition for an armory in the West. For the last fifteen years it had been in vain attempted to procure the establishment of a National Armory on the Western waters, notwithstanding the unanimous opinion of the West, concurred in by the executive officers of the Government, that a Western armory was necessary, not to gratify individuals interested in its location, but for the defence of the country, and to prevent prodigal expenditure of the public moneys in transportation of arms, &c. We have now National Armories at Springfield, in Massachusetts, and at Harper's ferry, in Virginia; and a report had been made to Congress, at his own instance, pointing out the various sites which the United States' engineers had thought would be advantageous for an armory in the Western country. But, although his immediate constituents were deeply interested in the establishment of an armory at the Horse Shoe bend, and others equally interested in other sites, he despaired ever seeing in his day an armory established in the West at all, unless upon the broad principle of giving the Executive of the United States the power of selecting a site, as had been done heretofore in the case of the armory at Springfield, and that at Harper's ferry. Having no objection to inquiring into the expediency of establishing an armory in the West, as well as in the South, but being opposed to confounding the two propositions, Mr. J. moved to strike out of Mr. CARSON's amendment the conjunction or, and insert and, which would have the effect to separate the two propositions, instead of connecting them.

Mr. CARSON said, he was entirely disposed to gratify his friend from Kentucky; but, as his motion had been made on the impulse of the moment, and could be readily modified to meet his friend's views, he moved, to give opportunity for that purpose, that the resolution should be ordered to lie upon the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

ANNUAL TREASURY REPORT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report upon the state of the finances.

The report having been announced from the Chair,

Mr. BUCHANAN moved that ten thousand copies of the report, and the documents accompanying it, be printed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY proposed six thousand copies, being the largest number ever printed of a public document before this session.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the Annual Report from the Treasury Department was always looked to with great interest by the people; that it was too voluminous to find admission at large into the newspapers; that its general circulation was very desirable, &c. Ten thousand copies had been ordered to be printed of the documents accompanying the message of the President; and this document, he presumed, would be considered of at least equal importance.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said, he admitted that this document was one of importance, and sought for with avidity. He thought, however, that the largest number of copies ever before printed, was sufficiently large now; especially as the material and substantial part of the report would find its way into every newspaper in the country. He was disposed, he said, to observe, as far as was consistent with a prudent regard to the public interest, the system of economy recommended in the report of the Committee of Retrenchment at the session before the last; and he could not conceal his surprise that gentlemen who were, at the last session, so anxious to reduce the amount of expenditure, especially on objects of this nature, to which they seemed to have directed much of their attention, should now show such a disposition to swell it instead of reducing it.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he was happy to find that the gentleman from Ohio was now so decided an advocate for retrenchment; not knowing, however, that he had ever found him otherwise. He did not know but, in pursuit of this object, he and the gentleman from Ohio would be found going hand in hand. But this [Mr. B. said] was not the point at which they ought to begin to retrench. Retrenchment ought not to begin with communication of information of this sort to the people, who are more interested in knowing exactly what has been the management of their financial concerns, than, perhaps, in any other subject. If we are to begin the work, [said Mr. B.] let it be with something else, more in accordance with the proper principles of retrenchment than this.

The question was then taken on printing the largest number proposed, ten thousand copies, and decided in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1829.

The resolution came up which was yesterday moved by Mr. RICHARDSON, of Massachusetts, for the addition to the standing committees of a COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. RICHARDSON said that his proposition was a simple one, proposing only that a standing Committee on Education should be provided, by the rules and orders of the House. Unless it was made necessary, by objections to the resolution, he should not occupy any portion of the time of the House upon it, but submit it for decision without remark.

Mr. HALL said, in due deference to the gentleman who presented this resolution, the subject was one which he conceived did not properly come within the control of Congress. I shall, [said he,] therefore, feel myself bound to object to the resolution. The subject of education, evidently, so far as legislation can be carried to it, properly belongs to the State authorities. If we go on assuming authority over subjects entirely foreign to our sphere of authority, where are we to end? We already have much extrinsic matter. As an instance, I will mention the subject of agriculture; over which we have, I believe, a standing committee. This, I have always been at a loss to reconcile to my idea of the just power of Congress. If we go on engulfing every subject to which legislation can be carried, to what result must we come? Shall we not effectually assume all the power of the State authorities? This must necessarily be the result. Sir, there is a doctrine advanced, and properly advanced, and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, a doctrine properly deduced from one of the plainest provisions of the constitution—it is, that all the powers of this Government, though limited, are plenary, within their proper sphere. I admit the soundness of this doctrine; but if so, it at once puts this subject to rest. I presume neither the gentleman himself, nor any other, will pretend that the States have not the right to legislate upon this subject. If this be so, it is decisive that this Government cannot, because its power over the subject, being plenary, is necessarily exclusive, and therefore not to be participated. It is not my object to detain the House; but for the reasons given, I object to the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, expressed a desire to know what were the particular views which had induced the gentleman from Massachusetts to bring forward this proposition.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, made a few observations, the import of which was, that he was perfectly willing, when any subject requiring it should be before the House, to give it direction to a proper committee. He was not aware, however, of any necessity for a standing committee on the subject. The only way in which it had heretofore been directly presented to the consideration of the House, was in the shape of propositions connected with grants of public lands, which had been, as matter of course, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. Believing the consideration of such propositions to be safely lodged in the hands of that committee, he had no disposition to transfer it to another select committee. As at present advised, therefore, he should vote against the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON said, that the importance of education to the people of the United States, induced him to advocate the adoption of the resolution now before the House.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. H. R. STORRS] has said that he knows not what a standing Committee on Education can have to act upon. Mr. R. said, he would reply to the gentleman, that such a committee would have the whole subject to act upon—a long neglected subject, and of the highest importance to the welfare of this Union.

This subject had been most earnestly and repeatedly recommended by the great patrons of liberty—the fathers of American independence—the founders of this republic. Permit me [said Mr. R.] to call the attention of the House to the opinion contained in the message of the first President of the United States to Congress, in 1790:

“Nor am I less persuaded that you will agree with me in opinion that there is nothing which can better deserve your patronage than the promotion of science and literature. Knowledge is, in every country, the surest basis of public happiness. In one, in which the measures of Government receive their impressions so immediately from the sense of the community as in ours, it is proportionably essential. To the security of a free constitution it contributes in various ways. By convincing those who are entrusted with the public administration, that every valuable end of government is best answered by the enlightened confidence of the people, and by teaching the people themselves to know and to value their own rights; to discern and provide against invasions of them; to distinguish between oppression and the necessary exercise of lawful authority—between burdens proceeding from a disregard to their convenience, and those resulting from the inevitable exigencies of society; to discriminate the spirit of liberty from that of licentiousness—cherishing the first—avoiding the last—and uniting a speedy, but temperate vigilance against encroachments, with an inviolable respect to the laws. Whether this desirable object will be best promoted by affording aids to seminaries of learning already established, by the institution of a National University, or by any other expedients, will be well worthy of a place in the deliberations of the Legislature.”

—Washington's Message to Congress.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a solitary recommendation of this subject to the attention of Congress. In similar language, it has been repeatedly urged upon Congress by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and others.

If it be true, as the gentleman from New York says, that a committee on education would have nothing to act upon, the fact is enough to encrimson the cheek of every friend to his country with the blush of deep mortification. It is high time that there were a committee to make this a subject of attention—to devise and mature measures to promote an object of vital importance to this republic.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HALL] has stated that he has constitutional objections to the proposed measure. Is it possible that the constitution prohibits the power to raise a committee on education, whilst there are committees on agriculture, manufactures, Indian affairs, and various interests, never named in the constitution? What is the language of the constitution? “We, the people of the United States, in order [among other things] to promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America.” The eighth section, which enumerates the powers of Congress, declares expressly that “the Congress shall have power to provide for the general welfare of the United States;” and “to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution.” Is it possible to doubt that Congress is vested by the constitution with power to pass any laws, or adopt any measures, not prohibited by it, which are essential “to promote the general welfare?” All unite in bearing testimony that the general diffusion of knowledge in the United States is essential “to the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty.” Singular, indeed, would it be, if the framers of the constitution had bound their own hands, and the hands of their posterity, under articles and sections to exclude the great law of self-preservation from the system. I cannot impute to them, nor to the system, a folly so stupendous.

It is demanded, if measures for the promotion of education were deemed so important, why have they not been adopted? My answer is, that a favorable moment for the purpose has not before occurred. Soon after the immortal Washington recommended this subject to the attention of Congress, the civilized world was wrapt in a flame of war and revolution. Our revenue was reduced or exhausted in measures for self-defence. This country suffered from many causes of embarrassment.

When prosperity began again to dawn upon the republic, the illustrious Jefferson recommended to Congress the same subject. But soon again embarrassments and war dried up and exhausted the resources of the country. To the discharge of the public debt the revenue has been applied, until the moment has nearly arrived when it will have been wholly cancelled. At the same time the revenue is gradually increasing, so that a large surplus will remain in the national treasury. To what purpose more valuable to the United States, or more honorable to this Government, can that surplus be applied, than to the purpose of education? It may well become the guardians of the public welfare to consider, that if this surplus of revenue should not be applied in a manner to satisfy the people that it is beneficial to the general welfare, they may indignantly send up a power here that shall cause the revenue to be abolished; an event which all would have cause to deplore. Let the revenue be abolished, and the Union would be prostrate at the feet of her enemies. No, sir, rather let measures be adopted to apply the surplus of revenue to the promotion of education. The present is a most favorable moment to devise a plan for this purpose. It is virtually recommended by the President, in his message just communicated, where we are informed that the amount required for the discharge of the public debt will be at the disposal of the Government for other important objects. For these general reasons, I am in favor of the resolution. Regretting to occupy the time of the House, I submit the question without further remarks.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said, that, in common, he had no doubt, with many members of the House, he should have a good deal to say on the subject of this resolution, if he could conceive (which he did not) that there were any danger of its adoption. He was persuaded that the honorable mover had not meditated fully the extent of the question which the resolution went to raise. It was one of the largest, and, in the most favorable aspect, contestable questions of power which had been ever presented in the operation of the Government. It was true, as the gentleman had suggested, that the subject had been brought to the attention of Congress heretofore, on more than one occasion, but in modes very different from that now proposed. It had been suggested in the messages of Chief Magistrates as a topic of the gravest deliberation, or there had been a formal assertion by resolution that the power resided in the Government, accompanied by propositions for a practical application of it. Mr. A. had supposed that these were times in which republican principles had attained ascendancy, and the revival of this doctrine would not be thought of in this House. If the gentleman did desire the revival, however, and thought he could find any considerable number to think with him, the mode of proceeding should be that to which he [Mr. A.] had just referred; by resolution affirming the power, to which the present resolution might be a sequel. It could not be expected that, by indirection on a mere proposition to raise a committee, a decision was to be had, to let in not only this jurisdiction, but the mass of connected constructions which were equally involved. Mr. A. professed himself entirely prepared now to enter into the discussion and disprove the power. He could not conceive that it could be necessary to do so, however; and in that view, he should content himself with moving that the resolution be laid on the table, with the purpose that it should not be taken up again.

The question on laying the resolution on the table was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows: yeas, 156—nays, 52.

HONOR TO A DECEASED MEMBER.

Mr. BARRINGER, of North Carolina, rose for the purpose of performing the last sad office due to friendship, in announcing to the House the death of his late esteemed colleague, the honorable GABRIEL HOLMES. He said he would have performed this duty at an earlier day, but for his own impaired health. Before tendering to the House a resolution which he had prepared in relation to the melancholy event which he had just announced, he might, he hoped, be excused for saying, that those to whom the late Governor Holmes was known, eulogy would be unnecessary, and to those to whom his deceased friend and colleague was unknown, he felt, in his present state of impaired health, an utter inability to do justice to the eminent virtues of the deceased. He should not, therefore, make the attempt. He had the pleasure of knowing him in all the relations of life; in the endearing domestic relations, in which he was unsurpassed for the gentler virtues of conjugal tenderness and affection, for parental kindness and indulgence; as the chief magistrate of his native State, in which he discharged the duties devolved upon him with a dignity becoming his own elevated character, and the confidence reposed in him by his own constituents; as a representative of the people in this House. How appropriately he performed his duties here, was too well known to require a recital from him.

Mr. B. said, his deceased friend and colleague had been an honored member of the nineteenth and twentieth Congresses, and member elect of the twenty-first Congress of this House. It had pleased Heaven to remove him, and it was due to him to say that his loss was most regretted by those who knew him best; and, as a testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, he asked of the kindness of the House the adoption of the resolution which he now offered.

Mr. B. then presented the following:

Resolved, That the members of the House of Representatives, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the honorable GABRIEL HOLMES, late a member thereof, from the State of North Carolina, will go into mourning for one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape around the left arm.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, Mr. BARRINGER then moved that the House do now adjourn.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1829.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HUNT, of Vermont, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the nett annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives.

The question of consideration of this resolve was demanded by Mr. STANBERY, of Ohio, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. STERIGERE, of Pennsylvania, then moved to amend the resolution by striking out, after the word "States," the words "for the purposes of education and internal improvement." He had no objection whatever to the principle of distributing the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands among the States, but he was opposed to the restriction upon the application of them proposed by the resolution.

Mr. HUNT said, that, by repeated special grants, donations of the public lands had been made to some of the States, and to particular institutions in others of the States, but in all cases for the purposes of education and internal improvement, and for none other. He wished, in the distribution of the avails of the residue of the public lands, to adhere to the same principle.

Mr. TEST, of Indiana, said, that he considered the principle involved in the resolution to be one of great importance, and one which this House ought not to be called to act upon without due consideration. He objected to the resolution, as well in its details as in its principle. It seemed to him to embrace, in effect, the proposition that the public lands should be divided among the States generally; to which he could never consent. He thought that time should be given to reflect upon the subject before it was further acted upon. With that view he moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was negatived, 108 votes to 71.

The question on Mr. STERIGERE'S motion to amend the resolve was then also decided in the negative, 102 votes to 72.

Mr. SEVIER, Delegate from Arkansas, moved to amend the resolve, by inserting, after the word "States," the words "and Territories;" and

This motion to amend was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, asked how the resolve would read thus amended? How could the Territories become entitled to land, &c. "in proportion to the representation of each," &c.? The Territories [he said] have no representation on this floor. They would have no claim to land under this resolve, unless the House should further resolve that delegates are representatives.

Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, entered his protest against the number and variety of propositions brought before the House concerning the public lands, and proposing to dispose of them in various ways. It seemed as if the four quarters of the Union were striving with one another which should get the most out of these lands. The appetite for them appeared to be insatiable and uncontrollable. He was opposed to the whole of these propositions. This was not the time to express at large his views on this subject; but if there was any justice, truth, or reason, in the proposition now submitted to the House, the amendment which he was about to propose ought to have its weight with the House. Mr. M. said, he did not conceal from the House that he meant to vote against the resolution in any shape; but if the resolution is entitled to pass at all, it should be with the amendment. The principle of the resolution is, that a distribution of the proceeds of sales of the public lands shall be made among the several States for certain purposes. If this be a right disposition of them, [said Mr. M.] it then follows that those who have had land heretofore should render an account of what they have already had. Let us see how the balance sheet stands. Let us see what proportion of the public lands has been given to the Atlantic States, from Maine to Georgia. Let us compare that proposition with what has been given to the States west of the Alleghany. If there be any propriety in the mode of disposing of the public lands at all, let us bring this question to the test; what proportion has been heretofore given to the States respectively, or to institutions within those States? He would not now pursue the inquiry in detail, but he said the amount which had been given to the States west of the Alleghany was incalculable; he should hardly be credited were he to attempt to state it. He concluded by moving to insert after the word "inquire," in the resolution, the words "into the amount and value of the public lands which have been given by Congress to any State, or to any public institution in said State."

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, said, that he was very much of opinion that, in the views which he had taken of it, the gentleman from South Carolina had looked to but one side of this question. The people of the Western States had certainly received from the United States grants of land for the purpose of promoting education; or, rather, the Government had said to them, if you will buy thirty-five sections of the public land, we will give you one section for the purpose of promoting education. And the gentleman from South Carolina, if he had gone to the Western country, as the settlers of that country did, and waded through fevers and fogs to clear it, and paid as much money as they did for their lands, would have been entitled to the same benefit as they from this sort of donation. Sir, [said Mr. V.] I am as willing to meet this question at one time as another: I say, that we of the West have had no donations of public land. Every body that got lands in that country paid for them; and the people of that country know how they have been fleeced of their last dollar for that purpose. It was well known [he said] to the people of that country how they had earned their school lands. They had paid for them a sufficiently valuable consideration. He was not prepared, [he said,] any more than the gentleman from South Carolina, to go into this discussion; but at the threshold he was willing to meet the doctrine of the gentleman concerning these lands. Any one who had been raised in the West, or had purchased lands there, had their feelings on this subject; and he, for one, knew how to sympathize with them from his own experience.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, said, that it was true that the subject of inquiry proposed by this resolution was of great importance; but the resolution proposed only to invite to it the attention of a committee of the House, and not to settle any principle. The subject of a disposition of the public lands, it is well known, is agitated in every part of the Union. Various views are entertained of it. We know that, in many parts of the country, the people believe that the avails of the public lands, after the national debt is paid, ought to be divided among the several States. Whether this course should be pursued, or not, was not the question before the House, but whether the subject itself was of sufficient importance to invite an investigation here. In relation to the amendment which had been proposed [Mr. M. said] he did not see any thing injurious in its character, or adverse to the object of the mover of the original resolution. He did not see any thing insulting in this proposed amendment: he was perfectly willing that the committee should turn their attention to it, and he hoped that the result of their inquiries would be to present an interesting document, going to show how much land has been appropriated by Congress for public purposes in the several States. When the facts were ascertained, it would be seen whether, in a general apportionment, there ought to be a reduction from the quotas of these States or not. Mr. M. did not conceive it at all important whether the amendment should be rejected or not; but, of the two, he should prefer its being carried. For himself, he supposed that these donations of land have been beneficially bestowed. He felt, therefore, no alarm at the idea of ascertaining the amount of them; nor would the insertion of such an amendment deter him from pursuing the main object of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that the subject of this resolution was one very deeply interesting to the State which he partly represented, and that he should much prefer that it should be made to contain no proposition or sentiment that in the commencement of the inquiry should promise a quarrel between the different members of the Union. He should prefer that the resolution should stand upon the liberal basis of looking to the future rather than to the time past, though he believed that the State of Kentucky, in regard to donations from the General Government, whether in money or in land, would not lose by the general settlement of the question which the gentleman from South Carolina had spoken of. At its last session, the Legislature of the State of Kentucky had had this subject under its consideration, and had requested its Representatives to present a claim to Congress for a part of the public domain, which [Mr. J. said] was rendered more interesting to the district which he represented, from the fact of its bordering on the Ohio river, by which it was separated from two or three of those States which are alleged to have received an undue proportion of the donations of public land. He thought, however, that the general discussion of this subject had better be postponed. He should vote for the proposition for inquiry on the most liberal principle: but, in doing so, he did by no means admit that the State of Kentucky had received from the United States an undue proportion of aid, either in land or in money.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, rose, not [he said] to engage in debate on this subject, but to show that the information sought for by the amendment under consideration was furnished to Congress at the last session, as would be found by a document on the files of the House, to which he called the attention of gentlemen.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said, he had risen at the same moment as the gentleman from Massachusetts, for the purpose of stating the same thing as that gentleman had already done. The report of the committee raised at the last session on this subject did not give the value of the lands granted to the several States, but he thought that it was sufficiently minute for all practical purposes. The amendment now proposed was, he thought, calculated to embarrass the main question. He invited the attention of gentlemen to the report of the committee of the last session on this subject, which he thought contained a good deal of useful information, and which was deemed so interesting that six thousand copies of it had been ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, avowed himself in favor of the amendment of his friend from South Carolina, and did not consider it a sufficient reason for rejecting it, that an inquiry had been made into similar topics at the last session of Congress, and that the result of it is now to be found on the files of the House. He was opposed to the original proposition. He understood that the whole subject of the disposition of the surplus revenue of the United States, over and above the payment of the public debt, constituting, as it did, one of the topics of the President's message, had been already referred to a committee of the House. It was now for the House to determine, whether, having referred the general subject, in all its extent, to one committee, it would place a particular portion of the question under consideration of another and distinct committee. He was opposed to this separation of its parts.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, moved that the resolution and amendment do lie upon the table; and the motion was agreed to by a majority of about twenty votes.

POSTAGE ON PERIODICALS.

Mr. VERPLANCK, of New York, submitted for consideration the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire and report on the expediency of reducing the rate of postage on periodical publications, and placing them at the same rate and under the same regulation with newspapers.

In offering this resolution, Mr. VERPLANCK said, that it was necessary to observe that the present rate of postage on periodical publications was about three times that upon newspapers. It was properly so graduated when that species of publication had been confined to the higher objects of criticism and polite literature. But it could not have escaped the attention of any one, that it had gradually acquired another character, having become extensively subservient to objects of a religious and moral character—to the diffusion of a knowledge of the popular sciences, and to the purposes of general education. The high postage on these publications [Mr. V. said] was an obstacle in the way of the prosecution of many benevolent plans of this sort. After the great plans for the promotion of education which had been suggested to the House, Mr. V. said his motion might have been considered comparatively unimportant; but it had the merit of being free from constitutional objections, and of being very practical: and, if he succeeded in his object, he trusted that it would turn out to be very useful.

The resolution was then agreed to.

WESTERN ARMORY.

On motion of Mr. CARSON, the House proceeded again to consider the resolution moved on Tuesday by Mr. DESHA, proposing to refer to a committee the expediency of locating an armory on the Western waters.

A good deal of debate took place on this motion, and on proposed amendments to it; in which debate Mr. CARSON, Mr. WILDE, Mr. WICKLIFFE, Mr. POLK, Mr. WHITTLESEY, Mr. BELL, Mr. CHILTON, and Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, took part. The same feeling was displayed by several of the gentlemen, as has often been shown in the discussion of this question in Congress, by those who considered the interests of their districts to be affected in one way or other by it. But, before any question was taken upon it, the consideration of it was terminated by a motion for adjournment; and

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1829.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution originally offered by Mr. DESHA, instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of establishing an armory at a suitable site on the Western waters.

Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, moved that the resolution, with the amendment proposed to it when last under consideration, be laid on the table; but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. WICKLIFFE, who, believing that it was not practicable for this House ever to decide on a site for the armory, wished to move an amendment proposing to inquire into the expediency of giving to the Executive the power to designate the site.

As there was a previous question pending, however, this proposed amendment could not be received.

The actual question being on an amendment moved by Mr. GILMORE, of Pennsylvania, restricting the inquiry of the committee to the expediency of establishing an armory pursuant to the report of certain commissioners under the act of Congress of 1828—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed this amendment with great earnestness. He dwelt upon the impropriety of imposing this restriction, when it was known that other surveys had been since made, in consequence of a resolution of the Senate, which were entitled to as much respect as those which had been made under the act referred to in the amendment. He denied that the last mentioned surveys were exclusively entitled to respect. He expressed his hope that this amendment would be withdrawn by the honorable mover, when he considered that, without it, the committee would be left perfectly at liberty to act upon whatever evidence might be placed before them, &c. He concluded his series of observations, by expressing his regret at being obliged thus early to enter into debate in the House, after having been ten years out of it, a member of another body: but the subject was one of such peculiar interest to the part of the country which he represented, that he could not refrain from expressing his views of it.

Mr. GILMORE expressed his regret that he could not, consistently with his duty to his constituents, comply with the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, to withdraw his proposition. This was a subject [he said] in which the district which he represented felt a great deal of interest. After a full and fair examination, the commissioners under the act of 1823 had given a preference to three sites, two of which were in the district which he represented, viz. if steam power were used, Pittsburgh—if water power, Beaver: the further examination and re-examination of sites [he said] could only tend further to procrastinate the establishment of this armory, the expediency of which was admitted by all. The best proposition that he had seen was contained in the bill reported at the two last sessions, which proposed, in substance, that the three gentlemen who had made the former report, (gentlemen of high reputation for both talents and integrity,) should be authorized to determine the location of the armory. He could not consistently withdraw his motion for amendment, though he believed that, if the subject was thrown wide open, as proposed, we should be farther from the establishment of an armory on the Western waters than we now are.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, took a review of the history of this proposition for the establishment of a Western armory. He was opposed to the amendment; and for reasons, which he gave at large, he was opposed to any attempt to settle the question of location in this House. He showed the difficulties which would attend its settlement here. He was for leaving it open, so as to let the place be designated by the Executive.

Mr. JENNINGS, of Indiana, after a few explanatory remarks, moved an amendment to the amendment of Mr. GILMORE, in the shape of a proviso, that the site of the armory should be fixed "as far west as the longitude of Zanesville, in the State of Ohio."

The question was taken on this last amendment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. SEVIER, Delegate from Arkansas, said, that, as it seemed to be agreed that an armory ought to be established on the Western waters, he could not but urge the claims of the country west of the Mississippi to its location. What was the object of this armory, he asked? It was to manufacture arms, for the purpose of defending the nation against its enemies. The next question was, where was the Western country to be invaded by an enemy? Either by the Indians on the frontier, or at New Orleans. If this armory should be located on the Ohio, what would be the consequence? The Government will have to buy a site, to buy fuel, &c. to manufacture the arms; and, when manufactured, it was well known that for nearly half the year the Ohio was dried up, and for a great part of the other was frozen over, so as to place great difficulty and uncertainty in the way of prompt transportation of these arms wherever they might be wanted. West of the Mississippi were to be found inexhaustible mines of iron ore; the Government owns the sites; the Government owns the fuel; the Government owns the mines, &c. &c. and all the expense of purchasing these would be saved. With these facts before the House, it appeared to him that it would be proper to locate the armory west of the Mississippi, where it could promptly and effectually furnish arms to defend the frontier, and to defend New Orleans, &c. For these reasons, he hoped that the amendment would be rejected, and the resolution left as open as possible, so as to allow of free selection.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, stated, as a reason for leaving this inquiry open and free from restriction, that, when the surveys under the act of 1823 were made, the improvement of the Western country, by means of canals, had not begun; whereas, if there had been a canal then, as now, extending within a few miles of Zanesville, that report would probably have been in favor of the location at Zanesville. At Cincinnati, also, [he said,] an important point was made by means of the canal. The effect of this work of internal improvement at other points was such as to warrant the whole subject being thrown open for further examination. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not withdraw his amendment, therefore, Mr. V. hoped that it would not be agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL, of Kentucky, trusted that the amendment would not be agreed to, for, so far as Pennsylvania was concerned, it was perfectly the game of open and shut. It was true that under the act of 1823 the commissioners had examined and recommended the sites at Beaver and Pittsburg; but they had never examined a great variety of sites in the State of Kentucky, far superior to any others that had been examined in any part of the country. The falls of Little Sandy (as the reporter understood the gentleman) afforded far superior advantages to the Horse Shoe bend, or any other site that had been examined; and if commissioners were sent there, he ventured to predict that they would fix on that very spot, to which their attention had never been attracted, as the site for the armory. Mr. D. detailed the advantages of this position, and enumerated the furnaces, forges, forests, and inexhaustible iron ores of the vicinity; as proofs of the excellence of which location, he said that the best iron was manufactured there that was made in this Union, and cheaper too than in any other portion of the Western country. For this reason he was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, preferring that the whole subject should be left open.

The motion of Mr. GILMORE to amend the resolution was then decided in the negative.

Mr. MALLARY then moved to amend the resolution so as to direct the committee to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the United States to establish an armory at some suitable point on the Western waters.

Mr. VANCE said a few words against the amendment, and expressive of a wish that the whole subject should be left open to the investigation of the committee.

The question was then taken on Mr. MALLARY's motion, and decided in the negative.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, moved an amendment, the object of which was to direct an inquiry into the expediency of a further examination and subsequent location of a site, &c.

And this amendment also was lost.

The question was then taken on the original proposition to instruct the Committee on Military Affairs "to inquire into the expediency of establishing an armory at some suitable point on the Western waters," and decided in the affirmative, nem con.

REFUSE LANDS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. CROCKETT submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorial of the State of Tennessee on the subject of the public lands be withdrawn from the files of this House, and referred to the select committee raised on the subject of the Tennessee lands.

Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, observed that the subject of this resolution had been already referred to a standing committee of this House, (the Committee on the Public Lands,) and he did not see why it should now be proposed to refer it to a select committee.

Mr. CROCKETT said, that, at the last session, this subject had been referred to a select committee. He had himself now taken charge of it, and he wanted all the documents to be placed before his committee. He was not aware that it had been referred to the Committee on the Public Lands at all; but he did not see why one part of the subject should be in the hands of one committee, and one part in the hands of another. He did not know what the Committee on the Public Lands could have to do with it, since it had been specially referred to a select committee. On that committee were several gentlemen from the Eastern States, who know very little about these subjects, and he wanted them to have a fair chance. He wanted them to have an opportunity of looking into the whole subject. He wanted these Eastern gentlemen on the committee to be enabled to examine the subject, and make a fair report upon it. He wanted to act honorably himself, and do justice to the Government on this subject; and he did not see any reasonable ground for the opposition of his colleagues to his motion.

Mr. ISACKS said, that, as a member of the House, he thought he might truly say, he felt very indifferent as to what course this subject should take. But, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, he felt bound to state, that, by the order of the House, the memorial and documents referred to were now in the hands of that committee, and the gentleman's resolution, if agreed to, would, he presumed, be wholly ineffectual. What the sense of the Committee on the Public Lands might be on this subject, he was not authorized to say. It might be that that committee might be disposed to have itself discharged from the consideration of the subject, and have it referred to the gentleman who had taken "charge" of the subject, as if he were the only member from the State of Tennessee interested in it. For himself, [Mr. I. said,] he did not profess to have taken "charge" of it, but, in what he had said, he acted only as the organ of the committee of which he was a member.

Mr. CROCKETT modified his motion so as to propose to discharge the Committee on the Public Lands from the consideration of the memorial, &c. and refer it to the select committee appointed on the subject.

Mr. POLK said, that, at his instance, this subject had been referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, believing that no other direction could properly be given to it. It was presumed that some of the difficulties attending it had been elucidated by the debates of the last Congress, at least to the members of that Congress. He had heard this morning the remark, which he had often heard before, that the report of a select committee had not the weight with this House of the report of a standing committee, and that was the only reason why, the other day, he had opposed the reference of this subject to a select committee. He apprehended that the House had not then understood the objection, or they would not have referred the subject, as they did, to a select committee.

[H. of R.]

He would only add, that, after the subject had been debated here at the last session, he had submitted a resolution calling upon the General Land Office, through the Treasury Department, for all the information which it could present on the subject. That information, he understood, had been obtained, and in a short time would be transmitted to the House. Mr. P. added that he trusted that his colleague would not consider that those of his own State, who expressed any views upon this subject, were at all disposed to interfere with his rights and his privileges here. All that they wished was, that the subject should undergo that consideration which it ought, believing, as they did, that a report from a standing committee would carry more weight than a report from any select committee.

Mr. CROCKETT said, it was certainly an awkward situation for these papers to be placed in, for one committee to have one part of them in possession, and another committee another part. These lands belonged to the United States, to be sure; but he did not know what the committee on the subject of the public lands generally had to do with them. These stood on a different footing from other public lands. There never had been a surveyor of the United States in the State of Tennessee; and these scraps and remnants, left after the location of the North Carolina grants, stood upon a different footing from the general system of the public lands. His object was, that the select committee should propose the most equitable way of disposing of them for the benefit of his constituents and of the State of Tennessee, which, he believed, would be to give these scraps of land to the poor people living on and among them.

The question was then taken on Mr. CROCKETT'S motion, as modified, and decided in the affirmative—90 votes to 67.

FITTING OUT OF THE BRANDYWINE.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, being called to the chair, and took up the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, for making an appropriation for fitting for sea the frigate Brandywine. No objection being made to the bill, the committee rose, and reported to the House without amendment.

On the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. McDUFFIE, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, briefly stated the necessity for this appropriation. The fact was known to every member of the House, that the commerce of the United States in the Gulf of Mexico and with South America was subject to piratical depredations; and, also, that the political relations of the Governments of the South were in such a state as required that the United States should maintain a considerable naval force in that sea. The recent loss of the Hornet made it almost indispensable that another vessel should be immediately despatched to supply her place. For this purpose, this appropriation was necessary.

The bill was then ordered, nem. con. to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1829.

This day was wholly occupied in disposing of motions for inquiry and the consideration of bills of a private nature. The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1829.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BUCHANAN in the chair, on the following bill:

VOL. VI.—61

"Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives shall, at the commencement of each session of Congress, obtain from each member the name of the post office nearest his residence, and shall then procure from the Postmaster General an exact statement of the distance to said post office from the seat of Government, computed according to the post road to said post office; after which, he shall add to, or subtract from, the said statement, as the case may be, the distance from the said post office to the residence of said member; upon which statement the mileage of each member is to be computed.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, on the final settlement of the account of each member, he shall subjoin, at the foot of his account, a certificate that he has deducted from his account all and each of the days on which he may have been absent from the seat of Government during those days on which the House to which he belongs may have been in session."

Mr. WICKLIFFE, Chairman of the Committee of Retrenchment, by whom this bill was reported, briefly explained its objects, which are, as appears from the face of it, generally, to establish a uniform rule for computing the allowance for travelling expenses of members, and to limit their per diem allowance to such days as they shall actually be in attendance on Congress.

Mr. HAYNES asked how the gentleman from Kentucky proposed, where there was more than one post road by which a member's mileage might be computed, (as was the case with many members,) to determine by which of those roads the computation of distance should be made. There ought, [he said] if the bill passed, to be such precision in its terms, as to leave no doubt as to the manner in which it should be construed.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Georgia showed still more the necessity of some legal provision on this subject. If there was a difficulty in determining between post roads as the measure of computation, there was still a greater difficulty where there were river routes, as well as roads, to compute by. In cases where there were various post roads leading to and from the same point, the gentleman from Georgia might attain his object by amending the bill so as that the nearest road should be taken as the criterion.

Mr. W. had no objection himself to such a provision, though he would not move it, because [he said] there were some post routes on which there was no convenient travelling, or accommodation for travellers, even on horseback. He did not see, however, why this objection of detail should be an objection to the principle of the bill.

Mr. HAYNES expressed his regret that the gentleman from Kentucky should have misconceived the motive of the very few remarks which he had made. It was no part of his purpose to interpose any obstacle in the way of the bill. He only suggested a difficulty in its detail, which he wished to see obviated.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, moved to amend the bill, by inserting the word "shortest," so that the distance should be computed according to the shortest post road.

This amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERIGERE moved to amend the bill, by striking out, where they occur, the words "and shall then procure from the Postmaster General." In support of this amendment, Mr. S. said, that, when we reflect upon the manner in which the distances on post roads are ascertained at the General Post Office, it was probable that the Postmaster General would know as little accurately about them as the members of this House, and perhaps less. The distances upon these roads were more or less uncertain, even where best known; and he believed that the information could be got from the members of the House better than elsewhere, and he thought that credit ought to be given to their statements on the subject. It was a fact beyond dispute, that no certain reliance can be placed on the distances between different post offices, as stated on the Post Office books; and he thought, therefore, that the statements of members ought to be relied upon in preference.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, that one main object of this bill was to throw from the members here the responsibility of fixing the amount of their own mileage. That, if they were allowed to fix that, it would involve the exercise of as much discretion as if they were to be allowed for the amount of their own per diem allowance. He knew no better standard [he said] by which the distance of the residence of the members could be ascertained, than the books of the Post Office Department. More universal certainty, he thought, would be attained by fixing the distances in this way, than by leaving the matter to the discretion of the members of the House.

Mr. STERIGERE said, that his amendment did not propose to leave this matter wholly to the discretion of each member in each case, for it confined him to stating the distance of the nearest post road to his residence—a responsibility which, Mr. S. thought, ought to be thrown upon him, and him alone.

Mr. BURGESS said, he would not permit himself to doubt that any gentleman, making a statement to this House, would make it truly; and if any misstatement of distances had been made, he felt bound to presume that it had been made accidentally, and would be corrected as soon as discovered. He could not see the utility of this bill at all, [he said] unless it was intended to say, by a solemn enactment of this House, that the members of Congress are not to be trusted in questions in which their interest may come in conflict with their veracity. If, however, facts warranted such an assumption, there might be sufficient reason to justify the passage of that bill. Until some statement of facts, showing grounds for this assumption, should be made on the authority of the committee which reported the bill, he could not be warranted in voting for a bill authorizing such a reflection on the House. He had never heard that any such report had been made by the committee. He had never heard authentically that any gentleman of this House, or of the Senate, had ever taken any more money for mileage than, on a fair calculation, he was entitled to receive. He could not vote for this amendment, therefore, or for the bill, but should be disposed, when the bill came before the House, to move its re-commitment, with a view to obtain from the committee a report of such facts as should show that the bill was not merely justified, but called for, by a due regard to the public interest.

Mr. STRONG, of New York, hoped that the amendment would prevail. It was proposed by the text of the bill to impose on the Postmaster General the responsibility of determining the distances which members travel from their residences to this House. This [said Mr. S.] was distrusting the veracity of the members of this House. It was, besides, turning over the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House to the direction of the Postmaster General, who is not an officer of this House, and ought to be allowed no control over its officers or its action. The Sergeant-at-Arms was responsible to the presiding officer of this House; and why was he to be turned over to an officer not responsible in any manner to this House? Why rely upon him, and take away the supervising power of the Speaker of this House? Mr. S. hoped that the amendment would prevail, and that the subject would be left in charge of the officers of this House, as it now is, and to whom it properly belonged.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, in reply to the gentleman from Rhode Island, who said that he could not vote for the bill, because the committee which reported it had not reported a statement of facts, stated, as a member of the committee, that the facts of overcharge of mileage by members was within the knowledge of that committee.

He felt no disposition, as a member of the House, to present, in a specific report, the names of individual members, who, under the law of 1818, had drawn an undue amount of mileage, but he now stated the fact generally, that a practice had obtained in this House, as its records would prove, by which members from the same State, and the same neighborhood, have been in the habit of computing their mileage differently, some by water and some by land. It was believed by the committee that there should be some uniform standard by which this mileage should be computed. He alluded to the fact, within the recollection of gentlemen near him, that, in the year 1823, the practice first began in this House of charging mileage by the river route; since when, the practice had been gradually extending itself. At that time, a gentleman, not now a member, claimed the privilege of charging for the distance of descending the Mississippi, ascending the Ohio, and thence by land. Nor was it for that session only that the charge was made; for he went back six preceding sessions, and claimed and received the same rate of allowance. This fact would be shown by the accounts now on file in the Treasury Department. Nor was this [said Mr. W.] the only instance of such changes. We (the committee) then conceived, that, whilst we were complaining of constructive journeys, and charges for journeys never made, &c. on the part of other public agents, it was proper, from a regard to consistency, that we should at least put a stop to this business of constructive journeys among ourselves. The act of 1818, declaring that the computation of the distance of travel of members of Congress should be made by the most usual route, the computation of the circuitous river route was a plain perversion and abuse of the law. To remedy this evil, the committee thought it best to give to the Postmaster General the power to determine the distances. If the amendment now under consideration should prevail, by what criterion will the officers of the House be governed in ascertaining the nearest post road? It will not do [said he] to tell us, with the facts before our eyes, that the decision of each member, in his own case, will be an infallible test. For the same reason, we might leave the whole subject of compensation open. But, [said Mr. W.] we propose to take from the member the privilege of fixing, at his own will and pleasure, the extent of his compensation. If the House should require from the committee a statement of facts, they would discharge that duty rigorously, as far as they could. They would ascertain what were the actual distances of the post offices near which members reside, and report the sums which each had received for mileage. But they had not conceived this necessary. They wished to make no implication of individuals, but simply to provide for carrying into effect the intention of the act of 1818.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, doubted whether the mode of ascertaining mileage, prescribed by the bill, would be found more correct than that which has heretofore obtained. He concurred with his worthy colleague, however, in the main object of the bill. He thought there ought to be a reasonable accuracy in the mode of ascertaining the mileage of members of Congress: that there should neither be required, on the one hand, a horizontal measurement of distances, nor, on the other, should there be allowed an excursive or circuitous measurement. He had never heard that there had been any complaint as to reasonable accuracy in computing mileage, except in cases where the meanderings of rivers had been made the basis of computation of mileage, instead of the common and usual route of travelling on horseback and in carriages. There is [said he] an intrinsic difficulty in bringing this matter of computing distances to a mathematical precision. Nor did he think such a precision necessary: reasonable accuracy was all that ought to be expected in it. He agreed with his colleague, that the practice of following the courses of streams, so as to double the compensation, if admitted at all, should be extended and permitted to all, or that all ought to be confined to the computation upon terra firma. The same rule should be extended to the one as to the other. As the difference of practice in this case, however, was the only matter complained of, he doubted whether the respect due by him to his constituents required or allowed him to go, or to ask the officers of this House to go, to the Postmaster General, to ask of him what mileage they ought to charge. The usual course had been for members to state their own mileage, and, if doubt arose, to call upon some other source for better information. He asked his colleague, the committee, and the House, whether, although in forty years' experiment some mistakes had been committed, the House was not able to adjust this matter by its own organs, without calling on the Postmaster General to help them? And, if they did so, was there any reason to expect that, in the same period of time, equal errors might not occur under the new rule proposed? As the remedy would be complete without such resort, Mr. J. was in favor of the amendment. Mr. J. concluded by adding a few words as to the trouble and additional clerk-hire which this business, small as it appeared, would devolve on the General Post Office, as the distances of members of successive Congresses, even in the same districts, were continually changing, &c.

Compensation of Members of Congress.

Mr. BURGESS said, that, in the remarks which he had made, he did not intend any reflection upon the committee which reported this bill, nor did he wish unnecessarily to increase their labors. But he did think that, on a question of this nature, it might have been well deemed expedient for the committee to lay before this House the grounds on which they had proposed this bill. But it seemed that there had been some mistakes in the charges of compensation. Now, Mr. B. supposed that no gentleman had, under his privilege, taken more compensation for his mileage than he supposed himself to be justly entitled to; and he presumed that there was no member of this House, or of the Senate, who was not willing to have the fullest inquiry made into that matter. After some observations as to the relative distances of land or water routes, Mr. B. said that this was a question which must always be left to the honor of members of the House, who had always as much knowledge on the subject as the Postmaster General possibly could have; and he thought that, without being obliged to get that officer's certificate, every member of Congress was entitled to his pay. It was sufficient, if any doubt existed on the subject, to restrict the compensation to the land route. He was willing to vote for a bill to obviate mistakes, but he could not deliberately vote for a bill implying that any member of Congress would deliberately take more pay than he was entitled to by law.

Mr. COULTER vindicated the committee from the suggestion of their having presented this bill unadvisedly to the House. All the facts on which this bill is founded [he said] were distinctly stated in the report of the Committee of Retrenchment at the session before the last, when a bill was reported to the same effect as this, but not acted on for the want of time; as, too, was the case with the same bill at the last session. If the facts stated in that report were true, (and that they were true there could be no doubt, for they had not been questioned,) it was important that some remedy should be provided: for, it appeared, either that the law was defective, or that, in the execution of it, abuse had crept into the proceedings of the House. He presumed, now that the evil was so clearly pointed out, the presiding officer and subordinate officers of the House might correct it, and the passage of the bill might therefore be said to be unnecessary. But, inasmuch as the attention of the House, and, through the report of the Committee of Retrenchment, that of the nation, had been heretofore attracted to the subject, it would be as easy now to pass the bill, if it affords a remedy, as to reject it. That the bill does afford a remedy, [he said] could not be denied. It must be admitted, as argued, that this law, too, may, in course of time, come to be abused. What human law cannot be abused? You cannot place a barrier to human ingenuity or error. The only question is, does this bill offer a competent remedy to an admitted evil? On that subject there can be no question: for, if it passes, a computation of distance by water courses can never be substituted for a computation of distance by land. It was comparatively indifferent to him, [he said] whether the proposed amendment prevailed or not: but, if it did, the distance of travel, and, of course, the amount of compensation for it, would still be left in each member's own breast. He meant no imputation on members of Congress; but [he said] all laws go upon the presumption that man is not a competent judge or witness in his own case: and it was assuming too much for this House to ask for its members exemption from this rule of law, established and practised upon in all civilized nations. The rules of this House have already made all the imputation upon members which can be inferred from this bill, by excluding any member from voting upon any question in which he is personally interested, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said, that one of the present rules of the House, in stating the duties of the committee of accounts, says "it shall be the duty of the committee [among other things] to audit the accounts of the members for their travel to and from the seat of Government, and their attendance in the House." As far as he was advised, [Mr. T. said] the practice of the presiding officer always had been, when any difference arose between any member and the Sergeant-at-Arms as to compensation, &c. to refer the question for decision to the committee of accounts, and to settle with the member according to the decision of that committee. He knew that this had sometimes been the case, and, as far as he was advised, it had always been the case. The Speaker had not been at liberty to decide such questions, since they were thus, by rule, especially referred to another organ of the House. My own choice would be, [said Mr. T.] thinking, from the statements which have been made, that a remedy is required, instead of imposing the duty on the Postmaster General of fixing the distances, so to amend the bill as to require the officers of the House to procure the necessary information. After requiring that the shortest post road should be the standard of computation, I would leave it to the officers of the House, under the direction of the proper committee, to ascertain the distances.

The question was then taken on Mr. STERIGER's amendment, and decided in the affirmative, 60 votes to 46.

Mr. SEMMES, of Maryland, moved to strike out that part of the first section which follows the word "post office" in the ninth line, as above. He thought this was descending too much into minutiae, giving much trouble without any practical benefit.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved an amendment of a proviso to the second section, exempting members detained from the House by known sickness from the operation of this section. With these amendments, the bill was reported to the House.

A motion was made by Mr. VERPLANCK, that the House do reconsider the vote taken on Thursday last, the 24th instant, on the question to agree to the following resolution, moved by Mr. CARSON, viz.

"Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch of the United States' Mint in the gold region of North Carolina."

And on the question, Will the House reconsider the said vote? It passed in the affirmative.

Mr. CARSON rose, and said that he had been induced to offer the resolution from various considerations, one of the most important of which was, the highly interesting information he was induced to believe would be elicited by such an inquiry. That it will prove necessary to establish a mint in North Carolina, to the extent to which such an establishment now exists in Philadelphia, he was by no means prepared to say; and were he to hazard an opinion, as at present advised, he would say that it would not be necessary. A branch, however, of the Mint might be found necessary. For instance, [said he] an office, under national authority, connected with the mother institution, to assay our metals, and show us their correct value—to stamp our bars of gold, and prepare them for a circulating medium, or as an article of deposit, upon which circulating medium might issue. This would also prevent frauds from being practised: for, while it would show the owner the real value of the metal, it would also secure the purchaser from frauds, such as mixing alloy with the gold, which otherwise would be difficult to detect. In a word, [Mr. C. said] the inquiry would do no injury, while there was a probability of its doing good, for any report made by the committee will be subject to the future action and control of the House.

When I introduced the resolution on Thursday last, [said Mr. C.] I will not disguise the fact that I felt considerable solicitude for its passage. But, sir, my anxiety has in a degree been diminished, not that I deem the inquiry less important, but because I observed an honorable colleague, [Mr. CONNER] voting in opposition to the resolution. For that gentleman, sir, I have always, since our first acquaintance, entertained the highest personal respect, and so also have I for his opinions: and, sir, from a knowledge of the fact that no part of the State is more deeply interested in all subjects connected with the precious metals than the district represented by my colleague, (for, sir, the greatest proportions, as yet, have been found within his district and by his constituents,) I am constrained to believe that important considerations have induced his opposition. What those considerations may have been, I have not been able to learn, and it may be that his withholding them from the House has resulted from his kind feelings towards me, wishing rather to cover than expose the defects of my proposition. Should this be the case, sir, I certainly thank him. Mr. CARSON concluded his remarks, by tendering his thanks to the House for agreeing to the motion for reconsideration, and, as no injury could result from a mere inquiry, hoped the House would adopt the resolution.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD rose, and remarked, that, as his colleague had made an individual allusion to a member from North Carolina coming from the gold region, and being himself from that desirable country, he wished to know whether the remarks of his colleague were intended for him. [Mr. CARSON explained, and said his allusion was to his colleague representing Mecklenburg—that he did not know how his colleague now making the inquiry voted on the question.] Mr. SHEPPERD continued by saying, that, owing to his bad health he was necessarily absent at the time the resolution was offered and rejected; had he have been present, he should have voted for its adoption, not merely because it happened to come from a colleague, and to embrace a subject interesting also to his own constituents, but from a belief that, upon a mere question of inquiry, it was the more courteous, if not indeed the more prudent course to accede to the proposition, unless it be absurd in itself, or clearly adverse to some established rule of legislation. Should the resolution be adopted, the committee raised upon it would doubtless elicit much information, interesting not merely to the country in which the precious metal is or may be found, but to the nation at large; and even if the inquiry proposed should not at this time result in a transfer of a branch of the Mint (that powerful attribute of Government) to the region proposed, yet it cannot but be important, in a national point of view, to have authentic information as to the probable capacity of any portion of our country to produce this important basis of the circulating medium. I repeat, sir, that, was there not (as indeed I think there is) a manifest importance in the proposition, courtesy to the mover would, in my humble opinion, be a sufficient reason to lead to its adoption. I would, Mr. Speaker, have preferred that the terms of the inquiry had been more liberal in their character, by embracing also the States of Virginia, Georgia, and South Carolina; in all of which gold also is found, though by no means so extensively as in the State from which I come; for, whenever, sir, any inquiry is proposed here, relating to any particular interest in our country, I am not for confining it to my own State or immediate district, but would embrace also any other portion of this Union where the same interest is known to exist. But without waiting to cavil about the terms of the resolution, permit me to hope that it may be adopted in its present form.

The question was then taken on the resolution moved by Mr. CARSON, and decided in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1829.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT, of Vermont, on the 17th instant, proposing an inquiry into the expediency of appropriating the nett annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States and Territories, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives.

The question being upon agreeing to the motion of Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, so to amend the resolution as to direct an inquiry also “into the amount and value of the public lands which have been given by Congress to any State, or to any public institution in said State,”

Mr. MARTIN said, he was indebted to the kindness of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPIGHT] who yesterday moved the postponement of this resolution, and to that of the House, which agreed to it, because of his casual absence when it was called up. The subject of the resolution [he said] was one of great delicacy, and respecting which he felt much difficulty: it was one of great public importance, also, and in which the people take great interest. He knew of no subject on which, at this moment, public opinion was more divided, or on which public inquiry was more excited. It seemed to him, therefore, before deciding any thing in reference to this question, it ought to be examined with much deliberation and with great caution, that nothing might be done in regard to it which should produce confusion or difficulty hereafter. He had so fully believed that the subject was laid upon the table for the remainder of the session, that he had not prepared himself, as he otherwise should have done, for entering freely into the discussion of it. He had intended to prepare a statement showing the amount of the public debt, for the payment of which the public lands were pledged: for, though he entertained no doubt that the public debt might be paid from other sources, there was still an indelicacy in touching upon the security which had been given for the payment of that debt until it should be redeemed. Whatever may be our ability to discharge the public debt according to our obligations, [he said] the proposition to alter the security for its payment certainly ought to come from any other quarter than that by which such security had been given. The precise amount of debt for which the public lands stand pledged, he was not, for the reason already given, prepared to show; but that it does stand pledged in this manner, no one would question. Mr. M. went on to say that he was opposed to the whole object of the resolution; he should be so if the amendment which he had proposed should be adopted: but, if the mover and supporters of it were serious in their proposition for the distribution of the proceeds of sales of public lands according to representation in this House, or according to any other ratio, they ought to recognise the principle to its full extent; which would require that those States which have already received a large portion of the public lands should receive of the residue only in their due proportion.

In the few remarks which he made the other day, [Mr. M. said] he had not intended to draw out the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE] as he had done. He had not meant to rouse his feelings: for, though the gentleman had not said a great deal on the occasion, he seemed to suppose that some unkind allusion had been meant to that State. In alluding to the extent of the grants of land to the Western States, [Mr. M. said] he did not do so for the purpose of complaining of them, or with reference to any particular State, but only to state the fact. The gentleman from Ohio, upon this allusion, had spoken of the thirty-sixth sections, and, from the manner in which he spoke of them, seemed to imply that these sections were all the donations of lands which the States had received from the General Government. Now, [Mr. M. said] he had meant no allusion to those reserved sections, but had intended to allude to the very large grants of land which had been made by Congress to the different States of the West for the purpose of canals, of asylums, and various other public undertakings. Indeed, so common had these grants been of late, that when any important public undertaking was meditated in those States, they seemed to look almost of course for an appropriation, and a large appropriation, too, of public lands towards it. He would now [he said] turn to document No. 95 of this House at the last session, to show the quantity of land which had been thus appropriated, but he did not wish to consume the time of the House, especially as each member could turn to that document for himself, and ascertain the facts.

But he might be told again, as he had repeatedly heard it said on this floor, that these grants of land to particular States, &c. were beneficial to the Government and to the people at large, because they increased the value of the remaining lands belonging to the United States. Of all the arguments which sophistry every invented, this [Mr. M. said] was one of the most convenient. It might be resorted to with equal facility in every question of public policy. In matters of internal improvement, it was easy to say that whatever benefited a particular town, or village, or neighborhood, was a measure promotive of the general welfare. And [said he] by the same process of reasoning, if, for the benefit of a particular branch of industry, or class of people, their pursuits are protected, properly or improperly, at our expense, we are told that, ultimately, we shall be benefited, inasmuch as the establishment and encouragement of manufactures, like internal improvement, must, in the end, benefit the whole country, &c. On every question of grants of privileges, &c. this argument was resorted to. Admit all the force that was asked for it, yet it must be allowed that it was only true in part, because those to whom a grant is made have the immediate benefit of it, whilst others have only a remote one. Then, if the public lands are to be distributed among the several States, (which would look very much, he thought, like the case of a man dying, and his children dividing his estate among them before paying his debts,) let us have the good common sense rule of each bringing back to the general stock what each has taken from it. This was the proper footing on which to place it; that those States which have hitherto received no lands shall have their allotment of lands or money, in the same proportion as those that have hitherto received them.

Mr. M. then answered some of the objections which had been made to his amendment. The existence of the information which he asked for on the files of the House, was, as had been said the other day, no argument against his amendment, because the committee would have the less difficulty in coming at it, and presenting it in a condensed form. A difficulty had been suggested in arriving at the amount of land granted to each State, but he did not perceive the force of it: the States, which had received lands, either had them or had sold them, and it could readily be ascertained what lands they now hold, and what quantity they have sold, &c. Upon the whole, Mr. M. concluded by saying he was opposed to the principle of the resolution; but, if it was to pass, he wished it to be put in the best possible shape, which he thought would be assisted by the adoption of his amendment.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, said, that he, too, with the gentleman from South Carolina, had supposed that this resolution had been laid upon the table for the remainder of the session. Without going into the subject at all, he rose to suggest that this subject had been already referred to one of the select committees appointed upon the President's message. [At his request, the resolution was read referring so much of the message as relates to internal improvements, and the distribution of the surplus revenue, after payment of the public debt, among the several States.]

Mr. PETTIS, of Missouri, regretted that the resolution now under consideration had been offered, and he regretted, also, that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MARTIN] had thought fit to offer this amendment. Whatever his opinions might be in relation to the proposition for making a distribution of the nett proceeds of the public lands among the several States according to their representation in this House, he thought the present an improper time to make the inquiry proposed. The resolution seemed to contemplate an immediate distribution. The public lands were pledged to aid in the liquidation of the public debt; and he asked gentlemen, if this plan were immediately carried into effect, whether it would not embarrass the Government in its views in paying off this debt. The offering of this resolution was to be regretted on another account. It was expected that some improvement in regard to the mode of disposing of the public lands would be attempted, and he feared that the plan proposed by this resolution would throw difficulties in the way of that measure. Sir, the people of the new States desire to see some reasonable prospect for the arrival of the period when the title of the United States to lands within their several limits may be extinguished. They thought that some better mode might be provided for, which would be better for the Government as well as the new States. He said he regretted to see the excitement which prevailed in this House on this subject; and he supposed from this that the public mind was also excited. It did appear as if gentlemen considered this a mere scuffle for the public lands, who should get most. And while he thought that some improvement could be made in regard to the mode of disposing of the public lands, he could assure the House, that on this, as well as every other subject of legislation, he should, while attending to the interests of those he represented, not be unmindful of the interests of the United States.

He would say a few words on the amendment in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN.] The gentleman seems to think that each State should render an account of the public lands which have been given; that there should be an account current made out, and that there is nothing in the argument, that, by the donation of these lands, and the sales and improvements of others, the remainder of the public lands are not enhanced in value. Sir, the argument is not so light as the gentleman supposes. Is there nothing due to the enterprise of the West? Is there nothing due to the exertions of those who have gone as pioneers to the improvement of the West? It is a fact too well known in the Western country now to be doubted, that, by the sale and improvement of one tract of land, the contiguous tracts are enhanced in value; and it is equally well known that the grants of land to the new States, for various purposes, were intended to promote the improvement of the country, to induce the sale and improvement of the lands, and thereby to increase the value of the lands unsold.

But if this account is to be taken, he asked the gentleman if the same justice and equality would not require that we should extend our inquiries back, and ascertain what States had contributed most of the public lands to the common stock. This being ascertained, should not the States, according to his principles, be reimbursed in proportion to the quantity granted by each? If this were the case, the State of Virginia (and he begged pardon of her delegation for taking an interest in the welfare of the Old Dominion) would be entitled to much the greatest share. He was opposed, however, to the whole inquiry. When the public debt shall have been paid, it would be time enough to make this inquiry. When that time arrived, it might be worth the consideration of gentlemen here, holding certain opinions, whether, if we have the power, the contemplated distribution for the objects mentioned in the resolution (internal improvements) might not assist very much in freeing us from the many difficult and perplexing questions which were constantly arising on this floor.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, said, it had been remarked that this subject excited more of the public attention at this moment than perhaps any other. If so, did it not become the more the duty of the House to examine it? As to the proposed amendment, [Mr. R. said] he had no disposition to retrospect in this matter, considering the argument to be correct, generally speaking, that the gifts to the new States have not diminished the value of the public domain, but that they have increased the value of the remainder sufficiently to compensate for the loss of what has been given away. As coming from one of the old States of the Union, [Mr. R. said] he claimed nothing, and wanted nothing, for the past. But, as regards the future, the disposition of the proceeds of the public lands was a question which presented much difficulty, and should be met unincumbered and unembarrassed. He thought the amendment wrong, therefore, because it tended to embarrass the main subject. When a proper occasion should offer, of so much consequence did he deem the main purpose of the resolution, he should move to refer it to a select committee, rather than to the standing committee, which is already too much burdened with business to give to this question the attention which its importance demands.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, was in favor of the amendment, and gave his reasons for being so. What, he asked, was the object of the resolution? To inquire into the mode of disposing, for the future, of the proceeds of the sales of public lands. We all know that Congress has, from time to time, made disposition of portions of them, sometimes in answer to the demands of justice, sometimes in liberal donations towards the accomplishment of useful public objects. The question presented by the amendment is, whether the committee shall be charged with an inquiry into the amount of donations which have been thus already made to different States. He was in favor of the amendment, because it would enlarge the scope of inquiry. He should vote for it, to disembarass, and not to embarrass, the inquiry, as some gentlemen seemed to suppose it would. If the amendment were rejected, what would be the effect? The gentleman from South Carolina would institute the inquiry in a different form, and ultimately it must and would connect itself with the main inquiry. Was it not more important that the House should have this information in the outset, than have it called for in a later stage of the proceedings? Whether these grants of land heretofore ought to be taken into account or not, in any arrangement for the future, was a different question. He was for having all the information, which was or would be asked for, at once; for [said he] meet this question, we must. We have got to hear it; and the more we can anticipate the difficulties which are likely to embarrass it, the better.

Gentlemen had urged that this was an inauspicious time for considering this question; that the lands are pledged for the payment of the public debt. Mr. M. said he did not suppose that any committee, which should consider the subject, would ever think of violating that pledge. The object was to provide, beforehand, for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands whenever the national debt shall have been paid. When that payment shall have been accomplished, what shall then be done with the public lands? That is the question. Some intimation had been thrown out that some motive of interest was at the bottom of this proposition. It is a motive of interest, [said Mr. M.] I freely avow it a motive of interest in behalf of the rights of the people whom I represent, which influences me in favor of it. I think that the gentleman from Missouri intimated that, when we come to the question of the actual disposition of the public lands, some intricate questions will arise. I know not, sir, exactly, to what the gentleman refers. I will refer, however, to one—to a principle which has been very commonly spoken of in some portion of the Western country, viz. that the United States do not, in fact, own a foot of land in the Western States. When sentiments of this kind were publicly stated, and found strenuous if not numerous advocates, [Mr. M. said] he was willing and anxious that the question should be met as early as possible. I am one [said he] who believes that the United States have land there; and when their right to them is endangered by false pretensions, I am ready to defend it. We cannot, at too early a day, look to the security of our own interests in that particular. These [he said] were his reasons, frankly expressed, for desiring this inquiry, and he had no objection to the amendment which would go to make it broader and more liberal. He would endeavor to procure a fair, and liberal, and equitable distribution of the public lands, such as was due to the people of his State and to the people of the United States in common. He was in favor of at once asserting the rights of the several States in that great interest.

Mr. DUNCAN, of Illinois, said, he was perfectly willing to see a full investigation of every subject which relates to the public lands. He cared but little about the resolution, or the amendments offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN] although he was opposed to the general object. His object in rising was to notice some of the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, and those made by the gentleman from Vermont. He said that the gentleman from South Carolina, and other members of the House, appear to misapprehend the objects, or considerations, received by this Government for the grants of land, or donations as they are called, which have been made to the new States. He said that the largest portion of those donations, as they have been styled, was the school lands, or the sixteenth sections given to the inhabitants of each township for the use of schools to be established in said township; and as these lands have always been appropriated before the sale, they have been justly considered as a part of the consideration, and an inducement to the purchase of all the remaining lands in the township; and so far from their being a donation to the States, they have been, and are selling to the inhabitants of the townships in which they lie.

He said that some small grants of land had been made to the new States by the General Government when they received their admission into the Union; but they were made upon the express condition that those States would never tax the public lands within their limits, nor those sold by the General Government within five years after the sale. Surely [he said] this is no donation, it is a fair bargain, and the new States have much the worst part of it, as they have given up a right which would be worth more to them now than a hundred times the quantity of land they have received. He said that it was a fact, which could not be questioned, that the new States would now have the power to tax all the lands, public and private, within their bounds, if they had not bartered away their right to do so for a few acres of land, and some other equally unimportant considerations. He said that those lands had been purchased by the surrender of all right to levy a tax, which would have amounted every year to more than the land is worth. He said, if it should be determined now to charge these new States with this land, (and the proposition to give an equal quantity to each of the old States before the contemplated division takes place, is, in effect, to do so,) he hoped that the new States would be restored to their natural rights—the right to tax and exercise a sovereign power over their own territory, which in a single year would be worth more to the new States than all the lands in question.

Mr. D. said that the gentleman from South Carolina could not certainly be acquainted with the situation of the new States, and their peculiar relation to the General Government, or he would not have raised a claim by the old States for those lands which have been given to some of the new ones, to assist them in making internal improvements, such as roads and canals. He said that it was a fact well known to every man of common observation, that every valuable improvement in a country, such as a road or a canal, is calculated to increase the value of the lands through and near which they are constructed; and as the General Government owned much the largest part of the land in the new States, and especially where some of those improvements are to be made, he thought he should hazard nothing in saying that, in every instance where the improvement is made, the increased value of the public lands occasioned exclusively by the improvement will amount to ten times the value of the donation. He said that a policy which would be wise in an individual owning large quantities of wild land, would also be wise in a Government; and he appealed to any gentleman to say whether he would not consider a portion of this land well appropriated in this way, when there was a certainty of its hastening the sale, and increasing the value of the residue.

Mr. D. further said that the United States were bound by every principle of common justice to contribute something to the improvements which were making, and contemplated to be made, in the new States, as every canal, road, or bridge, made in those States, had a direct tendency to increase the value of the public lands. He said that about eighteen-twentieths of all the lands in the State he represented belonged to the General Government, and that his constituents were burdened with a heavy tax to construct roads and bridges, which, though necessary to their own convenience, had a direct and certain tendency to raise the value of all the lands over which they are made. He said he knew the States had no power to compel the General Government to contribute its part to these improvements; but he hoped that a sense of justice would prevent its receiving such advantage without contributing its full portion towards it. He said that all the old States had the power of taxing the lands over which they made roads or other improvements, and that the holders of land rarely complained of a tax of this kind, as it generally gives a great increase to the value of their estates. He said that there was a county in a remote part of the State of Illinois, containing about ten thousand inhabitants, all of whom are tenants of the United States, and pay near fifty thousand dollars per annum tax or rent to the Government; and he supposed no one could think it reasonable or just that those people should be burdened with an additional tax to make roads in a country where every foot of land is owned by this Government. Mr. D. regretted to hear the reasons given by the gentleman from Vermont in favor of this proposition. It was true [he said] that some individuals, and one State, had asserted a claim to all the public lands, but he did not believe that any large portion of the people would sustain any pretension of that kind. He said he believed his constituents would be satisfied with having their just and reasonable claims satisfied, which were, that the price should be reduced, and the sales so regulated as to enable all the settlers to obtain their homes on reasonable terms.

When Mr. DUNCAN concluded, the SPEAKER arrested the discussion for the day, the hour allotted for the discussion of resolutions having elapsed. It will come up again to-morrow.

PAY AND MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

The bill to regulate the mileage and pay of members of Congress coming up for consideration, and especially the amendment proposing to strike out the clause referring the computation of mileage to the Postmaster General.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, that, as a member of the select committee which had been raised during the last session, and re-appointed at the present session, on these subjects, he felt it a duty to himself and to the committee to explain why he thought the amendment ought not to be adopted. He felt satisfied that, if the amendment passed, they might lay the bill at once upon the table, and say no more about it; for its chief object would, in a great measure, be defeated. The House had heard a great deal of the necessity of reforming abuses and retrenching expenses. He was one of those who was willing to give evidence of his sincerity, by carrying the principle into effect in every department of the Government. As a member of that committee, he had brought this subject up as a matter fit for legislative action—as a matter imperatively requiring the interposition of Congress. Yesterday he had offered his explanation of the object and effect of the bill. The objection to that part of the bill proposed to be stricken out by the amendment was, that it implied a want of confidence in members of Congress, and cast, by implication, a suspicion upon their integrity. He thought that that matter had been well answered by his colleague of the committee yesterday, who argued that all legislation was based upon an admission of human fallibility—upon a presupposed liability of the human mind to be influenced by interested motives. The object of that bill was to take from members the possibility of being thus biased in a calculation where they were personally interested; and in which the estimates were not limited except by their own discretion. In reply to the objection that the calculation would much encumber the business of the Post Office Department, he would state simply that this morning a clerk in the department had furnished him with statements of the post offices, and distance of every member of Congress (two hundred and sixty-one in number) from the seat of Government, in less than an hour. This was for the members of the last Congress. And this calculation would be necessary only once in two years. By the amendment, it was proposed to leave the decision to the Clerk of the House. He had as much confidence in the present Clerk as any man, but this regulation was for the future—for future Clerks and future Houses. It was not proposed, as had been said, that every member should call upon the Postmaster General for a certificate of the distance for which he was entitled to charge mileage. It was to be the business of the Clerk of the House to make a general application.

It had been said, both in the House and out of it, that this was a small matter, not worthy the attention of the House. Were gentlemen aware of the amount of mileage annually overcharged for the last ten or fifteen years? He had calculated upon the table of distances furnished that morning by the Clerk of the Post Office Department, that the number of miles charged, under the act of 1818, for mileage, should have been one hundred and six thousand nine hundred and sixty-one; the amount actually charged was one hundred and forty-two thousand seven hundred and two, being an annual charge for more than thirty-five thousand miles above the strict construction of the law, and a sum exceeding the proper amount of money payable for that object by twenty-eight thousand dollars. Was that a trifle? It was [he said] not so small a business, and very well worthy of gentlemen who were very clamorous, abroad and at home, for reform and retrenchment.

He believed this charge to have been made under an erroneous construction of the law. He could not say that any member had wilfully overcharged. But here were gross mistakes, which the bill of the committee was intended to prevent for the future. We have been calling upon the departments to account for these expenditures. Was it not time to work at home, and correct the loose practices and mistakes which had occurred in this House?

These facts he had mentioned for the satisfaction of those gentlemen who had called yesterday for the reasons on which the committee had framed this bill. He would not unnecessarily impeach or impugn the motives of any member now here, or who had been here. But, being called upon yesterday, he had stated the facts. He now had in his hands the record of the facts. In parliamentary language, he had the documentary evidence. Believing that the abuse was the result of accident, of miscalculation, of changed roads, shortened distances by improved roads, &c. yet, when the abuse was ascertained, it was the duty of the committee to correct it. He concluded by saying that he was opposed to the amendment, because it would still leave the calculation of mileage at the discretion of each member.

Mr. PETTIS said, from his distant residence, and from the intimations which had fallen in debate, he was constrained to ask the indulgence of the House, while he expressed his opinion of what he considered the true construction of the existing law on this subject, and while he gave his views in relation to the bill now under consideration.

Coming, as he did, from the most western State, he might not be considered sufficiently disinterested to take any part in this debate, but he could assure gentlemen that he was quite disinterested; he did not expect to gain or lose by the passage of this bill. He said, without imputing improper motives to any gentleman who had given a different construction to the law, he had never had but one opinion as to the true construction. He had come hither by what was called the water route, because it suited his convenience to do so, but he expected to charge according to the most usual post route—the most usual stage road. Whenever there was room for a misconstruction of any law—whenever an improper construction had been applied, he was in favor of taking away the ground for such a misconstruction; but he thought that we should take care that we cast no unworthy imputation upon ourselves. For these reasons, he was in favor of the main principle of the bill—that which fixes the true rule of computing the mileage—but he was opposed to referring the question to the Postmaster General. He was in favor of uniformity in the charges, but was opposed to placing members of Congress under the control of any officer of the Executive. When the rule provided for in the bill shall have been established, he did not expect that any gentleman would make a false statement in regard to the distance he had to travel. He therefore hoped that the amendment of the committee would be agreed to by the House. The rule being fixed, he was not afraid to trust this subject to each House, to the officers of the House, or to the members themselves. He preferred, however, that, instead of the provision now in the bill, the computation should be made according to the nearest post road—that it should be according to the most usual stage road. Under the apparent excitement which this subject had given rise to, he considered it due to himself to make this explanation of his views to the House.

[At this stage of the business, Mr. CHILTON made a motion to recommit the bill for the purpose of reducing the specific allowance for pay and mileage of members; which was opposed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, on the ground that its effect would be to defeat the practical and attainable object of this bill, and defended by Mr. CHILTON, on the merits of the retrenchment itself, and on the ground of a pledge given to his constituents to move it. Mr. BURGESS made a few humorous and rather sarcastic remarks upon the last motion, and Mr. BUCHANAN made some observations deprecating a debate out of place, as this was. When Mr. CHILTON withdrew his proposition, with a view to offer it at a future stage of the bill.] When, the question on the amendment recurring,

Mr. CARSON, of N. C. said, as to the amendment now under consideration, he felt perfectly indifferent. Yet, if the estimate made out at the Post Office Department, and presented to the Chairman of the Retrenchment Committee this morning, as he states, is to be made the standard, sir, the amendment ought to prevail. The palpable errors in that estimate ought not, nor cannot be received. I will state one, sir. This estimate gives my colleague, [Mr. CONNER] by whose post office I travel, (and I am compelled to do so if I travel by stage,) a distance of thirteen miles less than the distance they have given me. Now, sir, the fact is, I live near eighty miles further than my colleague. The same book, sir, places Lincolnton, North Carolina, three miles distant from my residence, when, in fact, it is sixty short of the distance.

With regard to the distance for which I have received pay, I believe I can safely say that I never knew it till this day. When I first took my seat upon this floor, Mr. O. Carr, your cashier, came to me, and asked my distance or mileage. I told him I did not know, that I had not travelled directly to this place, but had passed by the Sweet Springs in Virginia, on account of my health. He then asked me how my residence was to that of my predecessor. I answered thirty-three or five miles nearer. He then said he could arrive at the distance. I told him if he took the mileage of my predecessor, "to deduct forty miles," and I presume he did so. If so, it will be found that the distance given in by my predecessor was six hundred miles—for it appears that the distance allowed me was five hundred and sixty miles—should it appear otherwise, the responsibility must rest on Mr. Carr, our clerk, who settles our accounts; for, sir, I never did know the distance for which he paid me, nor did I ever scrutinize his accounts, for my confidence in his honesty and correctness left me without a doubt as to the accuracy of his settlements. I therefore placed my signature to his receipts whenever he presented them, without inquiry. Nor have I any thing to reproach myself with, except for negligence in not calculating the distance myself, and placing it beyond the power of any man to impute to me the slightest disposition to obtain more than was due to me. But, sir, there is a remedy left, and I shall avail myself of it. It is this: I have already directed the clerk to get an estimate of the distance of the most direct mail route from this to my residence, and to calculate my mileage from that; and, if it should be found that I had received an excess heretofore, to deduct it from my wages of the present session. I will not have a dollar that is not due me; but what is right I want. This explanation [Mr. C. said] he considered due to himself to make.

Distribution of Public Lands.

[H. of R.]

Mr. C. made some other remarks upon the merits of the bill, and took his seat.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, made some remarks, which we are accidentally prevented from reporting at large, but the general object of which was to show how inapplicable and incorrect a test the post office account of distances would be.

After a few observations from Mr. STERIGERE, vindicating his amendment from Mr. WICKLIFFE'S objections to it,

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER, 30, 1829.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT, of Vermont, proposing to direct an inquiry by the Committee on the Public Lands into the expediency of distributing the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands among the several States for the purposes of education and internal improvement.

The question being stated on agreeing to Mr. MARTIN'S proposed amendment, for directing the committee to report the quantity of lands already granted to each State by the General Government,

Mr. POLK, of Tennessee, said, that, from the time which had been already occupied in the discussion of this resolution, proposing an inquiry merely, it must be evident not only that this discussion is premature, but that it is not likely to arrive at any profitable end. It was admitted by those who supported the resolution, that it is not expedient to make this distribution, at all events until the public debt shall have been paid. That the public debt will not be paid for several years to come, was known to every one, and therefore this discussion was premature. Another reason against entertaining the resolution at present, was, that the whole subject of the distribution of the surplus revenue, after the payment of the public debt, had been brought to the notice of Congress by the President of the United States, and was now under consideration before a committee of the House. When this whole subject was thus before one committee, why should this part of it be referred to another committee? Another reason against the present discussion was that, that if it should be the policy of the country, after the public debt was paid off, to levy more taxes than the Government should require for the ordinary administration of public affairs, and the question should be between the present plan of internal improvement and the proposed plan for the distribution of the public revenue, he was free to say that, between the two modes, he should prefer the latter. But this was a question which it will be time enough to argue when it shall actually have arisen. It might be, possibly, that, when the public debt should have been paid off, there would be no surplus revenue, and no occasion for this absorbent process.

There was still another reason why he thought that no good would result from prolonging this discussion, and that was, the course that this debate had taken. The amendment now under consideration involved a proposition to raise an account current between the States, and the discussion of it could have no other effect than to produce an unnecessary excitement between members of the same family. With as much propriety might an account be raised of the money expenditure of the General Government among the several States. Suppose it were proposed to instruct a committee to inquire into the amount of debts of the several States assumed by the General Government at the date of the funding system, and strike a balance of account between them; what an excitement would it not produce! Gentlemen must see [Mr. P. said] the labyrinth of difficulties into which this sort of discussion would lead them, and that its prolongation could do no possible good. Mr. P. said he purposely abstained from entering himself into the discussion of the merits of the proposition before the House, having risen principally for the purpose of moving to lay this resolution on the table, with the understanding that it should not be called up again at the present session.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, asked the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw this motion, (which by rule admits of no debate,) to allow him to make a few observations.

Mr. POLK said he would accommodate the gentleman with a great deal of pleasure, but the very object of his motion was to stop the debate.

The question on the motion of Mr. POLK to lay the resolution on the table, was then taken by yeas and nays, and was decided as follows—yeas 72, nays 95.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN then rose, and said, he felt himself indebted to the vote of the House, and not to the courtesy of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK] for the privilege of making a few observations on this subject. He ought not perhaps to complain of that gentleman's course, because it was sanctioned by the rules of the House; yet he would say, it was not very liberal, after a member had himself addressed the House upon a question, to conclude his remarks by making a motion, which, if successful, would prevent all others from making any reply to his argument.

The House [said Mr. B.] is placed in a singular position in regard to this resolution. The course pursued by its friends has been unfortunate. Upon this resolution, which merely proposes to institute an inquiry before a committee of the House, the skilful tactics of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MARTIN] have involved us in such a debate, as can only become proper in case the committee should report a bill for the division of the nett proceeds of the public lands among the States in proportion to their population, and that bill should be before the House for discussion. Yet, in this preliminary stage of the business, we have been drawn off from the main subject of inquiry, and have been seriously engaged in discussing the question, whether the new States, who have hitherto received donations of public land from this Government, shall account for them in the general distribution. The gentleman from South Carolina, who proposed this amendment, has frankly avowed, that, whether it prevailed or not, he would vote against the resolution. Such is my regard for that gentleman, and of such value do I estimate his support, that I might be willing to sacrifice something of my own opinion to secure it; but when he proposes to amend our resolution, and informs us, at the same time, he will oppose it in every shape, we ought to view his amendment with jealousy and distrust.

"Timeo Danaos, et dona ferentes."

Without being drawn into an argument upon the subject, it is my decided opinion that it would be both unjust and ungenerous to charge the new States with donations of land which they have already received, and that an inquiry into the expediency of such a measure could only tend to distract and divide the friends of the resolution.

What [said Mr. B.] is the true and the only proper question for discussion at this time? It is, whether the subject of the resolution is of sufficient importance to demand inquiry. Upon this question can a doubt be entertained? The vast importance of the measure proposed must be impressed upon every mind, whether we regard its consequences to the people of the old or of the new States of this Union. The public feeling of the country is alive to the subject. And shall such of us as are friendly to its thorough investigation suffer inquiry to be stifled? I trust not.

The report of the select committee of the House, at the last session of Congress, has furnished us all the statistical information upon the subject which can be desired. There are two important questions which that report does not embrace, and which ought to be carefully investigated by a committee of this House. I desire to have a report from such a committee, upon the question whether the proceeds of the public lands are pledged in such a manner to the public creditors, that, without violating our faith, we cannot distribute them among the States until after the total extinguishment of the national debt. In the course of the debate, the affirmative of this proposition has been stated with a degree of confidence which would almost seem to preclude doubt; and yet there are probably strong reasons to sustain a contrary opinion.

It is very true, that, when the funding system was first established in 1790, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands were directed to be applied solely to the extinguishment of the debt of the Revolution; but it is equally certain that this pledge was often disregarded. In the year 1817, when the present sinking fund was established, all previous laws which had made appropriations for the purchase or payment of the funded debt were repealed. That fund of ten millions of dollars annually, for the discharge of the public debt, was to be raised from the import and tonnage duties, from the internal duties, and from the sales of Western lands. It may be [said Mr. B.] that the obligation imposed by this act will be equally satisfied, whether the annual sinking fund shall be provided from one or from all these sources. Such was probably the opinion of Congress, when, in less than one year after they had created this fund, they abolished all the internal duties, and thus cut off one of the sources from which it was to be supplied. I wish to express no decided opinion upon this question; but it is certainly well worthy of investigation by a committee. Its proper understanding and correct decision may aid us much in arriving at a just conclusion in regard to the main question.

Mr. B. wished to be distinctly understood, that even if we could, consistently with the public faith, at once distribute the annual proceeds of the public lands among the States, he had not for himself determined whether it would be expedient to do so until after the national debt should be discharged.

There is [said Mr. B.] another important question involved in this inquiry, on which I desire to have the report of a committee; and that is in regard to the constitutional power of Congress to make the proposed distribution among the States. The power to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States to which they now belong, is, in my opinion, very different from that of distributing among them the surplus revenue arising from taxation. I purposely refrain from entering upon the discussion of this question at present; but I think I might appeal with confidence to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARSH], whether there is not an obvious distinction between the two cases. A gentleman might, with perfect consistency, admit the power of Congress in the one case, and deny it in the other.

Mr. B. said he thought this resolution ought not to be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, as the mover of it [Mr. HUNT] had proposed. Highly as he respected that committee, it was well known they were chiefly selected from the members representing that portion of the Union within which the public lands were situated, and who were therefore best acquainted with the laws which related to them. The subject proposed to be referred was one of deep and general interest to every State. In his opinion, a select committee, composed of members from different portions of the Union, should be raised for the purpose of investigating it. The subject involved important questions in regard to the construction of the constitution and of the laws of the country, which did not appropriately refer themselves to the Committee on the Public Lands; and the information peculiarly within the province of that committee, we have already received from the report of the select committee raised at the last session.

Mr. B. said he thought the present the peculiar and the appropriate time for inquiry. The country were expecting, nay, they were demanding it. Are we prepared to stifle this inquiry? Are we prepared to declare that we do not think this important subject even worthy of a reference? Such, he trusted, would never be the determination of the House; and he was convinced the friends of inquiry would never be diverted from their purpose, until they had obtained all the information necessary to enable them to act with wisdom.

Mr. B. said he would read a substitute for the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HUNT] which was in accordance with the remarks he had just made. He trusted it would be acceptable to that gentleman. He knew that, under the rules of the House, he could not at present offer it as an amendment; and if he could, he would not, because his time was already too much occupied on the committee of which he was already a member, to make him desire to be placed on the select committee to which this subject ought in his opinion to be referred.

Here Mr. B. concluded by reading the following:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, to which shall be referred the report of a select committee made to the House of Representatives the 25th February last, relating to the distribution of the nett proceeds of the sale of public lands among the several States, in proportion to the population of each; and that the said committee be instructed to inquire, and report to this House, whether there be any provision of the constitution, or of any act or acts of Congress, in relation to the discharge of the public debt, which ought to prevent Congress from making such distribution, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TEST, of Indiana, then rose to address the Chair. Before he began, he was warned by the Speaker that it was the question on the amendment which was before the House, and he must confine his remarks to the question.

Mr. TEST remarked that he thought he understood the question, and should endeavor to confine himself to it as nearly as he could, but he considered the original proposition and amendment so connected together, that he could not do justice to the subject without a partial notice of both. Coming from the part of the country where I do, [said Mr. T.] and where a question of this kind so vitally affects the interests of my constituents, it will be expected that I should say something upon the subject. Indeed, I should think myself derelict from my duty if I were to remain silent. The amendment, sir, looks forward to the general operation of the original resolution. I shall, therefore, be necessarily led into the examination of the principles of the latter, to come fairly at the effects of the former. What, sir, is the question before the House? The first or original proposition is to appropriate the nett proceeds of the public lands towards internal improvements and the promotion of learning, to be divided among the States according to their representation in Congress. The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina proposes an inquiry into the quantity and value of those lands, in order, as I understand it, to a division among the States, with a view to come at a fair settlement as he calls it; and that those States, who have received a portion of those lands, may be charged in the account current with what they have received. It is necessary to look into the motive or consideration which induced the State of Virginia, and others, to cede their wild lands to the United States; and then to see if the proposition now before the House is calculated to promote the grand object which those States had in view when they made these cessions; and the determination of this point will test the utility of the measure. It is considered, on all hands, that one of the motives was to enhance the resources of the Federal Government, which were at that time very limited indeed, and to enable them to discharge their obligations to their creditors; but, sir, I am very far from believing this was the most prominent or urgent motive. There were higher and more important considerations. The prime object of all was, to maintain and secure a continuation of the confederation. Virginia possessed almost as much territory as any two or three of the other States, and it was readily seen that, in a course of time, an increase of population must give her a vast ascendancy over the balance of them. Looking with a philosophic eye through the course of events, it was not difficult to discern that the growing greatness of an individual State, already the most powerful in the confederation, would be calculated, in the very nature of things, to create fears and jealousies in the smaller States, which might, in time, grow into discontents and bickerings, which, being fostered by those fears and jealousies, would lead directly to a dissolution of the Union or confederation. The prime motive, then, must have been to provide against that event, by reducing the amount of territory in the larger States, and limiting their size as near to an equality as possible, thereby to produce a balance of power in some measure like that of Europe. Passing, for the sake of brevity, over all the intermediate steps, and without adverting to further evidence, it must appear clear to any gentleman in the House, that that must have been the most powerful inducement or motive (and truly patriotic it was) in the larger States to make this great sacrifice of their power and resources; which, coupled with the idea of doing justice to their creditors, and relieving the confederation from its distressing embarrassments, form the consideration upon which these lands were ceded to the General Government; and I hold it to be the duty of Congress to sacredly regard this consideration in all its legislative acts, and to promote the generous and benevolent views of the States in making those enormous though necessary sacrifices. Let us see then whether the amendment to the resolution which forms the proposition before the House is calculated in its consequences to promote that great and magnanimous object. So far from doing so, I view it as the most dangerous proposition that ever was agitated in this House, or brought before this nation. What is it, sir? It is to divide the public lands among the different States, and to require the new States to answer, and pay for all the appropriations made by the Government toward their improvement, while you have reaped the benefits of those improvements to a much greater degree than they. You have furnished the capital, we have done the labor, and we are now to be called upon to pay back all that we have received, after doing the labor for you. How are you going to make this calculation of value? what is to be the standard? where are you to begin? at what point of time? shall it be calculated for the future? will you make it as of now, or shall it be nunc pro tunc? We are very gravely told by the gentleman from South Carolina, that to talk about the benefits the United States receive from these appropriations for improvements, is the most fallacious and preposterous idea he ever heard suggested. Let us see if it be so silly and fallacious as that gentleman supposes. What is the effect of those appropriations and improvement of the country? Do they enhance the value of your lands, or do they not? Do they not induce population to flow in by hundreds of thousands? Are they not the means of selling thousands and millions of acres of your land, which would otherwise lay waste and wild? Does not this add to the resources of our country, besides augmenting the value of the lands? To reduce to practical results the argument of the gentleman, I will make such a calculation as I suppose he would ask the committee to make, and see whether he be right or wrong.

Shall we make it at the minimum or maximum price? Sir, I presume the gentleman would calculate them at the price which they sold for. I will gratify him in making it so: then, suppose, by your appropriations and our labor, the lands shall bring ten dollars per acre, do you gain nothing? And the more labor we add to the appropriation, the more it enhances the price, and we are to be charged at that price. Sir, it amounts to this, the more labor we do, the more we have to pay; the more money you receive in consequence of our improvements, the more we have to pay you—we could have purchased the land of you at the minimum price, but in consequence of receiving it as a donation (as the gentleman would call it) we have to pay three prices. It is a valuable gift to you, but it beggars us—and I should say, take back your “Deganire,” take back your fatal gift, it is poisoned. Sir, it is like a man laying out a town, and selling his lots for a high price, and afterwards calling upon the purchasers to pay him for the streets and alleys which he had laid out. You have been cunning enough to give, and we silly enough to receive. Sir, it is reversing the whole order of things; upon this calculation the less we have of your gifts the better. Poor Indiana, there is a terrible day of reckoning coming; she has been silly enough to receive some of your gifts; and on the great day of reckoning, if it shall be found that she has received more than her share of the lands, she must pay up the balance; and how is she to do it? Sir, she never will do it, no new State will do it; and to enforce such a proposition would be to strike them from the confederation and dissolve the Union.

Do you believe, sir, that the new States would stand and look on, and see you carrying away the fruits of their hard labor, without a struggle to prevent it. It would take away every motive in them to remain a part in the confederacy, every ground of attachment to the Union, and cause them to look to their own resources for protection. I have said that your appropriations had been the inducements to thousands to emigrate to those new States. They have broken up, and left their homes, to seek a home in the wilderness, allured by your deceitful gifts, and, after arriving there, they find themselves called upon to pay back the pretended boon. What will they say to you? Would they admire your justice, or would they despise your avarice and fraud? Sir, I have inquired at what point of time will you refer this calculation of value and division of the spoil. Will you commence at the present period? Will you go back to the time when those lands were ceded to the States? or will you refer it to some point of time in advance? If you refer it to the time when the cessions were made, little Delaware would receive as much as any of you in the general distribution, for she had as many representatives in Congress then as New York; and would she not contend with you that that was the correct principle? She had then, and has yet, all the burdens of sovereignty to support, without the means of the other States; and the lands being a gift to you at a time when she had as much right in the confederation as any of you, it would seem an argument in her favor to fix the division, or allotment, at that point of time. The object of the trust having now expired, and the trustees about to take the estate into their own hands, and appropriate it to their own use, it seems to me it would be equally if not more just to distribute it according to the situation and relation in which the parties stood at the time of its creation. I say, by this sort of distribution, Delaware would get a share. Suppose you refer the calculation and distribution to the present time, how would it stand? What would Delaware get? However, sir, I will pass by this part of the subject for the present, and take another view of it. Sir, I shall never consent, nor will my State, or the new States generally, consent to stop here with the division, calculation, or distribution. We must go the whole, or perchance we shall not be able to pay you for the liberal donations you have made us; and where will be the justice of distributing a part of the public domain without the whole?

Here Mr. TEST was reminded by the SPEAKER that the hour for the discussion of resolutions had passed by, and that he must desist.

CONGRESS MILEAGE AND COMPENSATION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for regulating the compensation for mileage and attendance of members; and

The question being upon concurrence in the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, the object of which is to strike out that part of the bill which places the calculation of distances travelled under the direction of the Postmaster General,

It was taken, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

On motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, the bill was further amended, so as to require the proper officer of the House to obtain from each member the place of his residence, and then, with the aid of the presiding officer of each House, to ascertain and fix the distance, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, adverting to the second section of the bill, (requiring from each member, at the close of each session, a certificate of the number of days he may have been absent from the seat of Government,) expressed the opinion that (this principle being introduced into the bill) it ought to be still further amended, so as to make it effective to secure the attendance of members at the sittings of the House. This would not be accomplished by requiring an account of days of absence from the seat of Government, because, in legal phraseology, the seat of Government includes the whole ten miles square of the District of Columbia. To make the provision of the bill more definite, therefore, Mr. T. moved to amend the bill so as to require from each member a statement of the number of days that he should have been absent from the sittings of the House.

After some observations between Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. TAYLOR, this amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved further to amend the bill, so as that the computation of distance of the residence of members should be by the shortest road, instead of the shortest post road—on the ground that the post road was frequently not the nearest or most convenient road for travelling to a given point.

After some observations between Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. TAYLOR, this motion was negative, 100 votes to 50.

Some further verbal amendments were made to the bill, on the motion of Mr. STORRS, of New York, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. HAYNES.

Mr. CARSON moved to strike out the second section of the bill; upon which motion the mover, and Mr. WILDE and Mr. WICKLIFFE, made some remarks, the first and last of these gentlemen at considerable length. When

Mr. SPEIGHT, of North Carolina, moved an adjournment. This motion was negative.

Mr. LETCHER, of Kentucky, said, that with the greatest pleasure he would have accorded with the request of the gentleman from North Carolina for an adjournment, were it not for what he believed an unnecessary consumption of time which it would have occasioned. This House [said Mr. L.] has been already four days engaged in vain debate on a plain and simple proposition. An evil is admitted by all to exist in the variant computation of the mileage of members, and a bill is before us to make the construction of the legal provision on this subject uniform: and, somehow or other, great difficulties seem to stand in the way of the passage of this bill. But, when we take into consideration the word "retrenchment," that powerful and magical word, so much the favorite of my colleague, and his idea of its beginning "at home" by the passage of this bill, with a view to that object I would earnestly recommend to him the saving of time. Time, sir, itself is money, and we ought to economize it. And, although it may be due to that gentleman that he should be allowed to advocate this darling of his bosom with zeal, I might yet acknowledge, without intending any personal disrespect, that he has occupied an undue proportion of the time of the House in doing so. If he had allowed the bill to pass without so much debate, after going through the Committee of the Whole, there would have been no difficulty in it. I invite the attention of that honorable gentleman, when he next looks into the subject of retrenchment, to the devising of ways and means by which we can get along with business in this House a little better: that we may not be obliged to hear any gentleman, on a subject of this sort, more than one hour at a time, nor have him repeat the same speech more than three times within that hour: nor to hear him take a wide range concerning himself and the difficulties he has encountered in getting here. I speak of this in general terms, as an evil that needs the correcting hand of the retrenching committee, or some other committee. Upon principles of justice and equality [Mr. L. said] he thought that this bill ought to pass in some shape or other, and he could not but regret its delay, and the obstacles which its friends had, no doubt unintentionally, thrown in the way of its progress. He admonished his colleague not to be too particular as to terms, and, if he obtained a bill sufficient for a correction of the evil, to be satisfied. This might have been done [he said] without any great parade, by the introduction of a resolution declaratory of the opinion of this House as to the intention and construction of the law of 1818. The committee, however, having preferred a different mode of accomplishing the same object, he was disposed to acquiesce in it.

This child of the bosom of his colleague had been long in coming into the world. The nation has looked for it with intense anxiety. It had been slow in its conception, and tardy in its delivery. It was old; though it had been said to be small, yet it was comely. It was a production which [Mr. L. said] he himself admired very much, since it had seen the light; although, from the great difficulty in bringing it to life, some had apprehended that the Cæsar operation would have become necessary before it saw the day. It has come, however, [said Mr. L.] and I rejoice to see it. I rejoice the more, because it has a striking resemblance to its father—not to the colleague of mine who laid claim to it yesterday, but to him who has the charge of it; though, really, from the affectionate struggle between my two colleagues as to its paternity, I did not know but we should have to resort to the plan of Solomon of old, and settle the question by dividing the offspring between them. But, to speak seriously, he believed that his honorable colleague who reported the bill was the real father of it, and should have all the credit of so hopeful an heir. He hoped to see it carefully nursed, but not too closely, lest perchance it might be smothered by too much kindness. He also desired that it might inherit all the good properties of its father—all his industry, ability, and usefulness; and, in saying this, he was not speaking ironically, but he hoped that it would not at the same time inherit an unconquerable desire to talk. Mr. L. hoped [he said] that we should have its twin brother, and a good many of the same progeny. He liked the breed. He wished to see "reform" here in expenditures, as well as elsewhere throughout the country. Though it might be thought small game by some, he would be glad if his colleague would go on and pursue it. So much saved is so much gained.

As every body seemed willing that this bill should pass, [Mr. L. said] he had got the floor to ask why the House should hesitate longer about it. Why not pass it to-day? He never had himself a doubt as to the intention of the law of 1818; for he never had the acuteness himself to be able to find out that "the usually travelled road" was the bed of a river, and, therefore, never thought of making such a charge; but, at the same time, he did not condemn the gentlemen who had calculated their travel in that way, if they thought it just and according to law.

Those parts of the bill which had been stricken out, [Mr. L. said] he did consider as conveying an imputation on this House, by referring the computation of the mileage of members to the Postmaster General. For himself, [he said] he wanted no overseer or supervisor of this House, or what might be called a Congress-Master General. He could never agree to let any officer out of this House regulate its peculiar and exclusive concerns. Gentlemen might, on the stump, or elsewhere, harangue about the want of integrity in this House. Mr. L. said, he considered its integrity the last stay of the nation; and when that reliance was gone, he should think the Government was gone. Such things may be talked of as electioneering topics, and to be witty upon. But, when we come to be serious, the truth is known and acknowledged, this House has integrity. Having no doubt on that subject, ought we ever so far to bring ourselves into disrepute by our own vote, as to intimate that any individual at the head of a department is likely to have more honesty than we have? I do not acknowledge that any one man, the Postmaster General, or any other executive officer, up to the highest, deserves such preference over ourselves: for I believe that there is as much honesty and patriotism in this House as in any equal number of people upon earth. I look to them with hope and confidence for safety in the worst of times. Let the times be as bad as they may hereafter—I do not now speak of the present time—I look to this House to protect the public interest. I never will consent to say, either directly or indirectly, that there is any head of a department that can and will do more justice to this nation than the nation may rightfully expect from the House itself. The Post Office Department has already heavy duties to perform, with fewer responsibilities, with more power and patronage, than any other department of the Government; and all the ability and all the honesty of its head is required for its own faithful management. He would not therefore agree to place this House under the control of him, or any other officer whom it might be proposed to make its comptroller general. Mr. L. concluded by saying he did not wish to consume time unnecessarily, and expressed a hope that the House would pass the bill before its adjournment.

Mr. SPEIGHT said, he had not submitted the motion for adjournment with a view of making a set speech on the subject of retrenchment and reform. He was fearful that the patience of the House was already exhausted; he had not originally intended to take any part in the discussion; but the innumerable amendments which had been made to the bill had induced him to make a brief statement explanatory of the vote he should give. He could scarcely expect that the House would attend to him with the same good humor with which they had listened to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. LETCHER.] That gentleman had been pleased to call this bill a child, which needed nursing and attention to rear to maturity, and professed himself willing to aid in rearing and educating it to useful purposes. Mr. S. thought that the chairman of that committee might say, in reference to the friendship manifested by his colleague, in the words of the Spanish proverb: "Save me from my friends; from my enemies I can protect myself." When the bill was first introduced into the House, he was opposed to it, and had so stated unreservedly, mainly on account of that clause in the first section, about which so much debate had been had, directing a reference to the Postmaster General. When this part was stricken out by an amendment, he was disposed to vote for the bill. His objections to that clause were the very incorrect estimate which the post office books give of the distances on some of the post routes. Their distances were no doubt generally obtained from deputy postmasters and mail carriers, who evidently knew very little of the matter. In his district, he had heard no complaints about the per diem allowance on the mileage of members. The committee had, however, reported an abuse or an error, and had demonstrated how it had originated, and had proposed a remedy. The fact that this matter, thus disclosed, had not been spoken of at such a distance, shows that this error has been gradual in its growth, and that the people have never been fully apprised of its extent. It ought, therefore, to be corrected, and the amended bill afforded a proper remedy. Mr. S. could not agree in opinion with his friend and colleague, [Mr. CARSON] his bosom friend, he might say, that in this matter corruption or dishonorable motives were to be imputed to members, and that they should resent such attempts.

He saw nothing in the bill to awaken such feelings. It was based upon the admitted fact that something had been done which ought not to have been done; and that the present law was so defective that such errors might occur even with good intentions. The enactment of this law would prevent a recurrence of these things, by establishing a uniform rule. He saw in this nothing to impeach the character or rattle the complacency of members. He reprobated the doctrine that members of Congress were too honorable to need accountability, and that they should be exempted from responsibility. Members of Congress were, he doubted not, equally fallible with other men; and, in this matter, the question is about that in which men are most fallible, their self-interest. He was for discarding such pretensions, and for putting a stop decisively to these malpractices. Mr. SPEIGHT said, that two years ago, when these matters were first broached, this Hall, and every Hall in the country, rung with the accounts of the waste of public money, constructive journeys, double outfits, &c. He was then, as now, of opinion that the question of retrenchment should be fully met, and a thorough investigation ordered into all the departments of the Government. But his opinion was, unequivocally, that this reform and investigation should commence, like charity, at home, and here in this Hall. This bill, in part, met his view; and when this should be settled, he hoped the committee would prosecute the inquiry into certain other matters about the House, the use of stationery, &c. And when the affairs of that House were retrenched and reformed, he hoped they would proceed through all the departments, from the Executive down through every office, and examine and reform all the abuse which may exist. He had heard, during the last nine months, a great deal of the removal of faithful public officers, men who, for many years, had served the public well, and the appointment of others. If these things have been done without cause, it is proper that such an abuse of power should be detected, and its authors punished by public opinion. In these remarks he had no intention of alluding to individuals; the question simply was, the abuse being admitted, should not the remedy be applied? He thought it should, and therefore supported the bill as amended.

The question was then taken, by yeas and nays, on striking out the second section of the bill, and decided in the negative by a large majority, [153 to 15.]

Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, then moved further to amend the bill, by adding the following as a new section:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of six dollars per day, and six dollars for each twenty miles travel, and computed according to foregoing provisions, be allowed to each member of Congress, in lieu of the present allowance; and that all laws making a greater or different allowance be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

This motion Mr. CHILTON supported by a speech of some length, and concluded by asking for the yeas and nays upon it.

The House refused to order the yeas and nays to be taken, by a vote of 162 to 19.

A motion was then made to adjourn, and decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the motion of Mr. CHILTON, and decided in the negative, ayes 26.

And then the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, in the following form, viz.

"Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives shall, at the present and at the commencement of each subsequent session of Congress, obtain from each member and delegate the name of the post office nearest his residence, and shall then, with the aid of the presiding officers, ascertain and fix the distance to said post office from the seat of Government, computed according to the shortest post road on which letters are usually transmitted by mail from the seat of the General Government to said post office; after which, he shall add to, or subtract from, the said statement, as the case may be, the distance from said post office to the residence of said member; upon which statement, the mileage of each member is to be computed.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, on the final settlement of the account of each member or delegate, he shall subjoin, at the foot of his account, a certificate that he has deducted from his account all and each of the entire days on which he may have been absent from his seat in the House of which he is a member, during those days on which it may have been in session: Provided that nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent a member receiving a daily compensation, if the absence of such member was occasioned by sickness after his departure from home; in which case, a member so prevented from attending the House shall annex a certificate of the fact of sickness, and its duration."

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House having resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. HUNT, proposing a distribution of the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands among the several States for the purposes of education and internal improvement,

Mr. TEST rose, and said that he had but a few words more to say, and he should close. I think, sir, [said Mr. T.] I was calling the attention of the House to the modus operandi under the provisions of the amendment to the resolution by the gentleman from South Carolina, and particularly what was to be taken into this account current which was to be made out. I had said, we shall call upon you to go the whole; we shall not only call upon you to throw in all the lands in this district, besides the useless millions you have laid out upon this building and the President's house, but we shall call upon you to take an account of your navy also, for it will be extremely onerous to call upon us in the new States to pay for the lands you pretended to give us, without allowing us to draw out of the general stock our money portion of the funds. I shall be told that these public buildings are a part of the staple improvements of the country, which were never intended as a fund; this I admit: and so, by your pretended gift, these lands (so far as they have been applied) have become a part of the permanent improvements of the country as much as your public buildings; but we are called upon to pay for them, and we cannot do so except we be permitted to draw upon the joint stock. It will be no answer to our proposition to tell us that the cost of these buildings, &c. are money appropriations, and not land. Sir, I would inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina, what distinction he will draw between an appropriation of money and of land—except that money is preferable.

The State of Indiana would have much preferred the money, or I would for her. It would have been much easier managed. I shall be told that the navy ought not to be taken into the account, because it is for the security of the country and the protection and facility of commerce—so are the roads and canals erected, and to be erected, from the proceeds of those land appropriations; they serve as means to transport your arms and munitions of war from one point to another, and to disseminate the various objects of merchandise through the country. Yes, sir, the navy in time of peace serves only to protect the merchants in their commercial pursuits. We can, therefore, with perfect propriety, call upon them to aid us in paying back our share of these appropriations so generously made, by paying us our share of the value of the navy. We shall call you to an account for your forts, your arsenals, your armories, your light-houses, your sea-walls, and all the improvements upon the seaboard; and shall I be told they are for the general protection of the maritime frontier? Sir, our public and private improvements protect your inland frontier much more effectually than all your navies, and forts, and arsenals do your maritime. How long since this very spot was a howling wilderness, infested with the wild beast and the savage? Now, sir, the improvement and settlement of the new States form an impassable barrier between them and you; and when you have not made us appropriations towards the erection of these improvements, and we have not been able to make them ourselves, we have presented our breasts as a rampart to protect you. It is to the industry, the enterprise, the toil, and the labor of these new States, that you owe a greater share of protection than from all your navies and forts; and yet you ask us to suffer you to retain the navy, together with all your permanent improvements, while you call upon us to pay back to you a miserable appropriation of land in the midst of the wilderness. Could the gentleman from South Carolina have the face to ask it? Sir, are we to be charged with all these improvements which have been called western? Shall we have to pay for the Cumberland road, and all its repairs, too? I hope not. But, according to the gentleman's amendment of the resolution, Virginia, with all her constitutional scruples about internal improvements, and Pennsylvania, with all her objections to the termination of the Cumberland road, will have to pay the expense of making and repairing it, unless it can be shown that there is some distinction between appropriations for land and money. Do you think, sir, Virginia or Pennsylvania will ever pay you back the appropriations for that road? I will answer for them, and I will answer for all the Western States—they will neither of them ever do so. I think, sir, the gentleman from South Carolina, and every gentleman in this House, cannot but see the gross injustice he would do the people of the new States by carrying into effect the principles of the amendment to this resolution. It is calculated to injure and oppress the bravest, the hardiest, and most virtuous part of your community—men who have borne the burden in the heat of the day—men who, when your country was invaded by both the civilized and the savage foe, stepped forward with alacrity to defend it. No murmuring was heard. They never inquired, is my country right or wrong? The only inquiry was, where are her enemies? The story of these appropriations which you desire us now to repay, drew thousands of emigrants to these new States, upon the faith of the Government that they were real, not fictitious. They settled down in the midst of a wilderness, where, perhaps, the human foot never trod; they have honestly toiled and labored till they have made themselves a little home, perhaps near the spot where by your donations (as you were pleased to call them) you seduced us to make a road or canal. What will they say when they are told they must pay back this deceitful, this Indian gift? Sir, you would create heart-burnings and discontents that time will never heal. Sir, I will say something more to the gentleman from South Carolina concerning his calculations of the price of these public lands. Are his calculations of the value of these lands to have a retrospective operation or not? If so, and you go as far back as to the time of the cession of these lands, why then the small States will get a full proportion; but then great injustice must be done if you place them at the present time; the small States would get almost nothing." The State of Delaware, for example, would get the two hundred and thirteenth part, and Indiana would get three two hundred and thirteenth parts; for it is to be kept in mind that the territories as well as the States are to share in the plunder. Yes, sir, and while Delaware and Indiana receive this little miserable portion, New York will be entitled to about one-sixth of the whole of your wild lands. Fix it prospectively, still injustice must be done; so that, as an original proposition, and established on the very best footing, it is evident that the grossest injustice must fall somewhere; and to carry it through upon any principle would tend to defeat the great, indeed the prime object of the donors of the trust. So far from tranquillizing the people of this confederation, it would lead to a state of public feeling in every respect the reverse.

A few words to my friend from Vermont, and I have done. I have never been more astonished than at seeing the course which he has taken; and when I call him friend, I do so sincerely and candidly. I have always found him generous of heart, liberal in his sentiments, and the steady, untiring supporter of all the valuable institutions of the country. I found him with me in obtaining the appropriation of land for the Wabash and Erie canal, and my heart has never ceased to recollect with gratitude his kind aid on that occasion; but if he now turns about, and calls upon us to pay back the amount of that appropriation, I shall have, however reluctantly, to cease to cherish those pleasing recollections. To say there have been appropriations made without a view to the general benefit of the whole nation, is a direct imputation upon the honesty and integrity of the gentlemen who composed that Congress; and I am ready to answer for my friend from Vermont, that he never gave a vote in this House through mere whim and caprice; but when he did vote on any question, it was an honest, and, generally, a very judicious one.

[Here Mr. MALLARY rose, and begged to be heard in explanation. He said he was sorry that he should have been so misunderstood; that he had declared in the outset that he had no disposition to call upon the new States to repay the appropriations made them; that he believed them to be of national benefit, calculated rather to enhance the value of the public domain, than to diminish it.]

Mr. TEST resumed. My friend from Vermont has misunderstood me, and not I him. If he had waited a moment, I should have satisfied him and this House that I never intended to attribute to him any such intention. I had intended to say that he had in the outset disclaimed every idea of calling upon the new States to repay the value of the appropriations they had received; but, at the same time I heard him thus disclaiming every such intention, I could not help but see him advocating the passage of the resolution and amendment before the House, which led to all the evils I have deprecated. He says he is not for an immediate distribution of these lands, but he wishes this as a mere preparatory step. If nothing is to be done now, why push the measure? Why arouse the excitement, and all the angry feelings consequent upon it, if nothing is to be done? Why not let it sleep till he thinks the time arrived when it ought to be awakened? He says he hears a sentiment propagated by many, very many, which, if it shall ultimately prevail, all their prospects of obtaining a share of the public lands are at an end; that is, that the lands of right belong to the States in which they lie; wherefore, he says, he wishes to be paving the way for a proper disposition of this part of the public domain in time.

Sir, I should think the gentleman's precipitancy a conclusive evidence that he was afraid to submit his proposition to the deliberate cogitations of the people. He is fearful that that monstrous sentiment which he has heard in whispers might assume a more audible tone—he is fearful it may gain upon public opinion. Sir, if it be true that such a sentiment or opinion be gaining ground, it is one of the strongest reasons under Heaven why the decision of the question should be postponed. Let the people deliberate upon it, and my life for it they will come to a correct conclusion concerning it. Is the gentleman afraid to postpone it till after the next census? I should think so, from his desire to push the matter now. Why, sir, drive us into a decision now? Why not let it remain till public opinion has decided upon it? The new States are but weak in numerical strength; why cram this measure down their throats before they shall have acquired the strength which the new census will give them? It shows there is something wrong about it, and that he is afraid to trust it to the searching investigations of time. If we must have a scramble for this property, give us a chance with you—do not take the advantage of our present representative weakness, when you know we have a large portion of original physical strength just ready to organize and bring into action. It would not be fair; if we must lose our lands, let us at least have the benefit of all our strength before we commence the unequal struggle. Sir, I can say to my friend from Vermont, I have never heard such principles as he mentions contended for—I have never heard any man deny but that Congress had the right to dispose of those lands according to the tenor of the compacts with the various States which have made cessions. But I will say to my friend, that whatever lands the United States may have in the new States, at least the Western ones, Vermont has no land there, nor ever will have, until the Western States consent to it, or the most solemn engagements shall be violated by the Congress of the United States. Sir, I have said this, and I will say it here, that the gentleman may be apprised of it, that when the motives or considerations for ceding these lands to the United States, by the several States, shall have been fulfilled, that, from a principle of equity, connected with the contract, they must and will fall to the States in which they lie; and, sir, I will give the gentleman the grounds of my opinion. Sir, it is evident that these lands were ceded to the United States upon two considerations, the most prominent of which was, to create a sort of political balance in the Union, as I have heretofore said; the next was, the payment of the public debt. The lands are, therefore, a trust estate in the hands of Congress or the United States, for the purpose of fulfilling the design of the States which ceded them, that is, to lay off a certain number of new States, not to exceed a certain size, so as to create the balance of power I have before stated—which States were to be free republican States, possessing all the rights of sovereignty and independence of the original States; and, at a proper time, to be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with them. Now sir, it is not a settled principle, in the construction of all trusts from which no tribunal ever thought itself at liberty to depart, that when the whole object or consideration for which the trust was created shall have been fulfilled, that the estate reverts to the original donor, unless otherwise directed by the terms of the trust. Here, sir, it is otherwise directed; it never can revert to the donors. But, sir, when these new States shall have been laid out, and the public debt paid, these lands must go to those new States according to the provisions of the grant—having all the rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence of the original States. Sir, I am forbidden to travel upon this ground—it belongs not to the amendment, but to the original resolution, which

[Dec. 31, 1829.]

I have been warned not to discuss. When a proper occasion, however, shall offer, I may take up the subject more at large, but, for the present, I will not trouble the House longer.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, spoke briefly to the question, with a desire to have it modified, and placed in a more definite shape before the House.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, said that he rose to make a very few remarks. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] had correctly stated that the resolution was merely for the purpose of inquiry; it was an initiatory proceeding with a view to certain results, and every thing pertinent to the inquiry should be embraced in the resolution, if nothing more. He presumed it had not been the intention of the mover of the resolution that donations in land, or otherwise, to the new States, should be taken into consideration; and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MALLARY] although he had expressed an intention of voting for the amendment, had distinctly disavowed taking into the final account those donations against the new States. He was opposed to any retrospect as to grants or donations to any of the States, and he believed those who acted with him in support of the resolution were opposed to it. In the first place, they wished to avoid any excitement; and, in the second place, they considered such retrospect unjust. He fully agreed with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE] that the donations which had been made had promoted the interests of the United States, by greatly increasing the value of the residuary lands; and he even felt that those hardy adventurers, who had entered our forests, and, amidst privations and sufferings, reduced the wilderness to pleasant abodes, were entitled to even more than they had received. He said the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN] was a Pandora's box, and had produced the excitement which had been displayed; that gentleman, instead of uniting to put that down, had opposed the original proposition, as containing the unjust principle of taking the donations to the new States into account in the final distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public domain. The gentleman from South Carolina had candidly avowed that he was hostile to the inquiry, and should vote against it if his amendment was adopted. He had never perceived the propriety of the amendment, and was satisfied that it would produce no other purpose than that of exciting, unnecessarily and improperly, the feelings of the representatives of the new States. His own opinion was, that the subject should be examined now, and that it should be settled by this Congress; and that opinion had been strengthened by what he had heard from the gentleman from Indiana. He had never before heard the reasons assigned by that gentleman for the cessions made by Virginia and North Carolina. He had never supposed that these cessions were for the purpose of making new States. It was notorious, that, by the treaty of peace terminating the war of the Revolution, the lands falling within the original boundaries of those States were wrested from the crown, and enured to the States within whose limits they were situated; in consequence of the arduous struggle for independence in which all the old States participated, and by the common blood and treasure of the then States, these lands had been acquired. Virginia, and the other States who made cessions, magnanimously surrendered a portion of the territory thus gained. This surrender was dictated by a high sense of justice, and never has been, and never ought to be, viewed as a donation. He should suppose that the ratio of representation in this House was the proper measure by which to ascertain "the proportion of charge and expenditure." Let inquiry be made, as it ought, in order that, in our future distribution, we may conform to the intention of the grantors. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TEST] had admitted that the legal title to these lands was in the United States, but he has said that eventually they ought in justice to go to the States within whose boundaries they were. Suspicions that such sentiments were entertained by the new States had probably led to the introduction of the resolution. It must also be recollected that there was a vast quantity of public lands, which had been acquired by purchase, for which the United States had paid large sums, and assumed onerous burdens. He referred to Louisiana, Florida, and the Georgia and Alabama lands. Have the United States been reimbursed for the consideration money paid out of the common treasury for these lands? He believed not. And on what plea then can the new States claim the unsold lands as theirs? It certainly was to be apprehended that at some future time the claim which had been intimated by the gentleman from Indiana would be more boldly advanced, and that the right of the old States would eventually be denied. He was glad that, in the enumeration of the States which had largely participated in the public expenditure, the gentleman from Indiana had not named New York; she had indeed had but little of the expenditures of the General Government; she had applied for its aid when about to undertake her great work, but was denied all assistance on the ground of unconstitutionality. She then went on with that great enterprise unassisted and alone, and had succeeded, and was now enjoying the rich harvest of her enterprise. He thought this the precise time to make inquiry as to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, and he desired to make the inquiry and measure entirely prospective. He thought the friends of the resolution should unite to disencumber it from the amendment, and that they should adopt the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] and send it to a select committee.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, remarked that he was sorry to see, in that House, such a strong and inveterate disposition to scramble for the public funds. During the short time they had been in session, frequent attempts had been made to commit that House on the subject of appropriating public lands, or setting apart the "surplus revenue" for objects of "internal improvement" or education. Some gentlemen seemed to be very much afraid we should not know what to do with our surplus revenue. This reminded him of the story about the hunter, who sold the skin before he had killed the bear. Mr. B. said, he thought common prudence and ordinary delicacy would require gentlemen to wait until the Government had paid its debts, and had really a little spare cash over and above its necessities, before they undertook to dispose of its surplus funds "in advance." Mr. B. said, although he very much wished to see this Government out of debt, yet he never expected, and he never wished, to see it possessed of surplus revenue to any considerable amount. He feared it would only serve to engender discord and corruption. The true policy of this country [he said] was to pay off the public debt as soon as possible, and lessen the duties on imports so as to meet only the real exigencies of the Government. It was a folly to say, or to imagine (as he had understood some gentlemen to intimate) that the people, after having realized the convenience and advantages resulting from low duties, would resist such an increase of them as might become necessary to meet any contingency or emergency that might arise. This [he said] would be a bad comment on their patriotism. He hoped they had not yet so far degenerated from the political virtue of their Revolutionary fathers. No, sir, [said Mr. B.] when the people see the Government disposed to ask no more from them than is really necessary to support it, they will, in cases of necessity, submit to the greatest burdens. They will not only give their last dollar to aid a Government thus mindful of their interest, but, along with their money, they will freely give their blood. Mr. B. further said, that, after the public debt is paid off entirely, and the public lands thereby redeemed from the pledge they are now under for the obligations of the Government, he did not know that he should have any objection to a fair and equitable distribution of that territory; and if South Carolina could only get justice—sheer justice—in all other respects, he should not be disposed to squabble about those lands. Those who seemed to have such an “itching palm” for them, might take them, rather than he would enter into a scramble with them, like school boys scuffling for chesnuts. But, until our honest debts were paid, (if he might call them honest,) at any rate until all the pecuniary obligations of the Government were discharged, he hoped the public lands would be held as sacred as is the cash in the treasury itself.

[Here Mr. BLAIR's remarks were suspended, in consequence of the hour for discussing resolutions having expired.]

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1830.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th ultimo.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN, on the same day, to amend the same; when

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, addressing the Speaker, said, he had concluded his remarks on Thursday last, by expressing a hope that, until all the pecuniary obligations of the Government were discharged, and the public lands thereby redeemed from the pledge they are under, no distribution of that territory would be made, but that it would be held as inviolable as the cash in the treasury.

It has been said by some [continued Mr. B.] that the public lands are a very inefficient fund for national purposes. This has been owing more to bad management, than to the inadequacy of the fund itself. At any rate, [said Mr. B.] the public land has been found, on former occasions, to be quite a convenient article with which to enlist recruits for your armies; and it is not at all impossible, but he thought it altogether probable, the Government might stand in need of it again for a similar purpose. Suppose [said Mr. B.] that, during the late war, instead of a bounty of one hundred and sixty acres of this land, you had been compelled to launch out its equivalent in money to every private soldier you enlisted, and a still higher amount to each of your officers, what would have been its effect on public credit? and would it not have made a serious inroad upon your strong box? I guess it would, [said Mr. B.] He therefore thought sound policy required the public lands to be husbanded with care, at least till the public debt was paid. I am one of those [continued Mr. B.] who think the best “provision for the common defence and general welfare,” and the best preparation for war, would be the payment of the public debt in the time of peace. At the commencement of the last war, your public debt was much smaller than it is at present; the war itself was feebly conducted on the part of Great Britain, yet your credit became so low during the contest, that you could effect only limited loans—very limited loans at an enormous premium. And it ought never to be forgotten how abortive, futile, and disastrous were some of your operations for the want of means. Indeed, the Government acknowledged it had not the means wherewith to defend South Carolina against the common enemy. South Carolina, therefore, had to use her own purse. And she has not even yet been refunded or reimbursed the money she expended. Her memorial on that subject has been presented to this House this morning. The war, to be sure, was occasionally characterized by a brilliant exploit, particularly by one at the Moravian towns, in which an honorable gentleman of this House took a distinguished part; and the conflict was finally terminated with great eclat and success at New Orleans. But that is almost entirely to be attributed to the rare energy, skill, and courage of the illustrious individual who commanded in that quarter, not to the Government or its means, for these were poor indeed.

But, [said Mr. B.] notwithstanding the true policy of the country requires that we should husband with care and economy all the public treasures until the national debt is paid, I very much fear a great many gentlemen do not wish the public debt extinguished. Their greatest fear is, that, under the administration of our present worthy Chief Magistrate, the Government may happen to get out of debt.

Mr. B. said, he hoped he was not disposed to judge too uncharitably, but he inclined to think the stockholding interests did not wish the trouble, the loss, and the hazard of making new and frequent investments. They would not only lose money by it, but they would then have to contribute something to the support of the Government. The manufacturers also were desirous of a pretext for continuing a high tariff. It was not for their interest, then, that the public debt should be discharged; nor was it for their interest that the national domain should continue to be a source of revenue. He would not say that the friends of the stockholding interest combined with the advocates of high protecting duties, and the friends of internal improvement, in order to divide and to squander away the public funds for selfish sinister purposes, but he did think the circumstances to which he had alluded warranted such a conclusion. But, [said Mr. B.] it has been said by some of the senior members of this House, for whose opinions I have a high regard, that this is not a proper time to discuss this matter; and I certainly have no disposition to pursue the disagreeable subject any further. He had not been able [he said] to reply to those gentlemen on his left, who perhaps had differed from him in opinion, because he had not been able to hear them. He knew that some gentlemen had objected to the amendment proposed by his worthy colleague, [Mr. MARTIN] but those objections, so far as he had distinctly heard them, appeared not to be valid. He hoped, if the House was determined to adopt the resolution, it would be with the amendment offered by his colleague; but, whether that amendment should be adopted or not, he would finally vote against the resolution. He was at present [he said] opposed to the whole proposition in every possible shape and form. He hoped, therefore, that it would be laid aside now, and if not for ever, at least for years. He had been desirous that the motion, made some days ago by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK] to lay the resolution on the table, would have prevailed. He was not now disposed to renew that motion, because he did not wish to seal up the lips of such gentlemen as might wish to present their views of the subject. But, when a proper time arrived, if no other gentleman renewed that motion, he would. At present, however, he made no motion.

[The debate here ended for this day.]

FORAGE TO OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. DWIGHT in the chair, on the bill to regulate the allowance of forage to officers of the army.

The bill was in the following words:

“Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the passage of this act, the officers of the army, entitled by existing laws to forage, shall be allowed, in lieu thereof, the following sums, respectively, viz. A major general, brigadier general, adjutant general, inspector general, quartermaster general, and commissary general of subsistence, each twenty dollars per month; a colonel, sixteen dollars per month; a lieutenant colonel, major, quartermaster, paymaster, and surgeon, each twelve dollars per month; and every other officer, entitled to forage, ten dollars per month,

Forage to Officers of the Army.

[JAN. 4, 1830.]

"Provided, That the officers of the line and of the staff, when their duties require them to be mounted, shall be allowed to draw and receive, at their option, forage in kind, in lieu of the sum allowed them by this act, for as many horses as they may have in actual service, not exceeding the number allowed now by law to such officer of the line or staff."

Mr. WICKLIFFE (chairman of the committee which reported the bill) explained the scope and object of its provisions. After doing which, he remarked, that being admonished by what fell from his colleague [Mr. LETCHER] the other day, that it ought to be a part of the duties of this committee to provide for the retrenchment of debate and the economy of the time of the House, he should desist from any further unnecessary consumption of it on this occasion. Mr. W. said, he did not envy his colleague the consolation which he must have derived from the amusement which he had furnished the House, at the expense, as might be well supposed, of the feelings of one who had never harmed him, and of one who had ever treated him with the highest respect. He was not conscious of having, on the occasion referred to, consumed more of the time of the House than was proper to defend the measure for which he, as one of the committee which reported it, was responsible. He had thought that some response was due to the observations which the gentleman had made; but he forbore from it, under an impression, that, left to his own reflections, the gentleman would find the satisfaction which his course afforded him would not be as great as it seemed to be in the immediate enjoyment of it. He was deterred also by another consideration—the want of time. He well recollected, when that gentleman made his last appearance upon the boards, two years ago, he furnished the House with a somewhat similar dish of amusement; condemning and reprobating much talking—in doing which, he had spun out a speech covering about five columns of the Intelligencer. I do not [said Mr. W.] envy him the gratification of being considered the wit of the House. I yield to him the palm he so much desires, and only ask of him to let me enjoy the humbler consolation of endeavoring to render myself useful to those who have sent me here. I would admonish my colleague that it is not by wit and humor the business of the nation is to be advanced; and, above all, he who indulges in it should never do it at the expense of private friendship. In reference to the unconquerable desire to talk, which he imputes to me, of that let those judge who have known me the longest and best. With a view to its influence on those who know me not, this premeditated judgment on my character and motives seemed to be a little unkind. On the subject of the character of the labors of the committee, [Mr. W. said] it had been fashionable for gentlemen out of the House to attempt to turn them into ridicule and contempt. The same attempt was made when the subject was first broached in this House. Mr. W. said, he should never, in the duties assigned him as a member of the Committee of Retrenchment, be prevented from presenting subjects which he believed worthy of the attention of the House, by the opinion of individuals either in or out of the House; and, if necessarily called upon to explain them, when he found individuals professing friendship acting with the opponents to the retrenchment of unnecessary expenditure. If he successfully defended the committee against such insidious hostility, he should be content to receive the censure for a disposition to talk too much, gratuitously bestowed by his colleague. Mr. W. said thus much he added, not from a disposition to provoke a renewed attack upon him, but to vindicate his own course. He trusted, however, that the measure now before the committee would be more acceptable to his colleague, than that which had, the other day, excited his wit and provoked his irony.

Mr. LETCHER said, he regretted that his colleague had not received what fell from him the other day in the same spirit in which he had uttered it. Mr. L. said he never had, at that time or at any other, a disposition to use any severity towards his colleague; and he believed that the whole House perfectly understood that he meant no personal reflection upon him. If he had supposed that his colleague had taken unkindly what he said, he would have taken the earliest opportunity to put him right in that particular. In his colleague's remarks, the other day, Mr. L. said he thought he had gone out of his way to throw improper reflections upon the last administration, in speaking of a travelling cabinet and of constructive journeys; which language formed a part of the electioneering machinery of the late contest for the Presidency. Mr. L. had thought, after the violence of the war was over, and victory had ranged herself on the side of his colleague, that generosity, magnanimity, liberality, would have marked his course, and that, of all the members of this House, he would be the last to revive the topics of the old contest. He had thought that the nation was tired and weary of the thread-bare story; that his colleague's allusion to it was wrong; and he acknowledged, very frankly, that it had excited him a little. But he had not intended to be personal in his remarks; for, when he meant to be personal in his observations, there should be nothing equivocal about them. When he had spoken of the industry, integrity, and ability of his colleague, he had meant nothing ironical.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that he must relieve himself from the imputation that he had the other day made some unkind attack on the late administration. He had not done so. In answer to the gentleman from North Carolina, who had criticised the bill in harsh terms, he had spoken of what had been said out of the House, of individuals receiving compensation and neglecting their duties, and had called his recollection to the great deal that had been said of a travelling cabinet, &c. Sir, I am not obnoxious to the charge imputed to me by the gentleman. I have not desired, nor do I intend to disturb the ashes of his favored and favorite dead. In peace let them sleep. I do not believe that my colleague has admitted, or is willing to concede, that the battle is over, the victory is won. Not so. Richmond is in the field again, else I am deceived by things which surround me. Mr. W. had not supposed that that remark invoked the ire of his colleague; but had rather supposed him to have been excited by the remark, that the abuse in the computation of mileage, from a misconception of the law, had originated under a former presiding officer of this House, who was a particular favorite of his colleague.

Mr. LETCHER said, he had no disposition to have any further controversy of this sort with the gentleman from Kentucky. I had a right [said Mr. L.] to explain my own motives, and he has no right to suggest for me a different one. I am no man's bull-dog: I take up no man's quarrel. I never had that sort of ambition. I act for myself, as I think for myself; and it is the height of my ambition to do my duty to the satisfaction of those who send me here. I did not know, sir, that Richmond is in the field; if he is, he is very able to conduct his own campaign. When the campaign does begin, if I have not the prudence to get upon the fence and see which way the victory is to go, I will take my part at once, and do my duty—not as a partisan officer, but as an unambitious private, determined, as far as possible, to promote the interest of my country.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, then made some inquiry of the chairman of the committee which reported this bill, with a view to the more particular understanding of its object.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that the principle of the bill was, to give to officers of the army a certain allowance in lieu of forage, whether they kept horses or not, instead of making the allowance dependant upon that contingency.

JAN. 4, 1830.]

Forage to Officers of the Army.

[H. of R.]

As the law now stands, the amount of annual expenditure for the article of allowance for forage of officers was forty-four thousand six hundred and forty dollars, resulting from the fact, that, being required by law, the allowed number of horses was either really or nominally kept by officers. The bill proposed, in lieu of this arrangement, to make an allowance to officers, which would amount to the annual aggregate of twenty-three thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight dollars, thus saving annually to the Government the sum of twenty thousand seven hundred and twelve dollars. If this arrangement, besides saving this money to the Government, was also better for the officers, (as he believed would be the fact,) Mr. W. said he could see no valid objection to the bill.

Mr. STORRS objected [he said] to the principle of the bill. The existing law presumes that the officers of the army will keep each a certain number of horses, and, if they do so, allow them forage accordingly. Would not this bill introduce a new principle into our legislation? Instead of paying forty thousand dollars for certain expenses required or justified by law, this bill proposed the allowance of twenty odd thousand dollars for nothing: because the effect of it would be, undoubtedly, to exempt the officers of the army from keeping horses at all, and to allow them a monthly sum for no consideration whatever. Mr. S. said, he did not call this alteration retrenchment. He should say that, if there was no necessity for the officers keeping horses at all, they ought not to be paid for not keeping them. The bill proposed, in a word, to convert an actual compensation for services rendered into a sinecure. This [he said] was not exactly the kind of retrenchment which he desired to see put in practice. It was vicious in principle to grant the proposed perquisites by way of compensation for duties which the officers were not bound to perform. If any part of our legislation required to be particularly guarded, it was that in which money was allowed to be paid for sinecures—for constructive services—for services never performed. He concluded by saying that he was not for decreasing the compensation of officers of the army; but he had no idea of passing a bill professing a retrenchment of public expenditures, but in reality proposing to pay money for services not rendered. Mr. S. then proposed to amend the bill by adding to it the following:

“And provided further, that no allowance shall be made to any officer under this act, for forage, unless it shall appear by his certificate, or otherwise, that he has kept the number of horses for which he claims compensation.”

The question was taken upon motion of Mr. STORRS, and decided in the negative—ayes 65.

Mr. DRAYTON then rose, not so much to object to the principle of the bill, as to consider some of its details. He was of opinion that the nature of the allowance for forage was not well understood by the House. Besides what is properly designated as the pay of the officers of the army, there were several allowances in addition, such as rations, forage, quarters, &c. But, however denominated, they were intended to constitute a part of the pay or salary of the officer. Thus, under the present system, the allowance of forage to an officer was, in effect, an item in his pay. Mr. D. took further views of the subject, all tending to show that these allowances to the officer do in fact stand on the same footing as his pay. The question for the decision of the House is, whether or not the officers of the army do or do not at present receive too much pay. If they do, then this bill, in its present shape, might pass. If otherwise, it should not. Mr. D. proceeded to show some defects, as he conceived them to be, in the details of this bill, if it were to pass at all: such, for example, as the reduction of the allowance to officers of different grades for forage to the same amount; the effect of which would be, to take from one class of officers a much larger proportion of their pay than from another class, as he showed by various instances. This [he said] was neither liberal nor just, &c. &c. Mr. D. said, however, that he admitted that under the present law there was an evil requiring correction, and he was willing to exert the power of Congress to remedy it. The present law [he said] was certainly evaded. He would not be considered, by any thing he should say on this floor or elsewhere, to imply any thing derogatory to the character of the officers of the army, for which he had the highest respect in general, and which, as far as he had any knowledge, was highly honorable. But [he said] an irregular practice under the laws was easily fallen into. The fact is, that, in many cases, under the present system, the officer does not actually keep the number of horses that he is entitled to keep; but he says, here are horses at a livery stable at my command: these horses I keep. There is an understanding between him and the keeper of the livery stable, and the officer certifies that he keeps so many horses, &c. Upon this composition, Mr. D. did not undertake to stand in judgment: he believed that every officer who made out his account in this way, did so under a conscientious conviction that he was doing right. But, [he said] considering it an evasion of the spirit and meaning of the law, he thought that it ought by some means or other to be rectified; and he thought that a pecuniary compensation, in lieu of an allowance for forage, was advisable, on principles of justice and of policy. When, therefore, this bill should be so amended as to allow such commutation as should be in an equitable rate to what the officers now received, he should be willing to see it pass. Until that was done, he thought the bill ought not to be acted upon. Mr. D. said, he was exceedingly averse to courting business for the committee (on Military Affairs) of which he was a member—he would rather shun it—that committee had much business before it; but he thought that this bill required so much remodelling, and the subject to which it relates was so immediately within the sphere of the duties of that committee, that he felt it to be his duty to move to recommit this bill, for revision, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DWIGHT said, he should vote for the recommitment of the bill, under the expectation that the committee would report a specific monthly compensation, in full of all allowances, &c. for every officer of the army, that it may be as readily known what pay they receive, as what pay is received by any other officer of the Government.

Mr. WICKLIFE said, he did not mean to throw any obstacle in the way of any direction which it might please the House to give this bill, but with a single request that the bill be not so overloaded as to be at last unable to travel from this House to the Senate. Nor did he regret that the labor of conducting it through the House was transferred from the select committee to the Committee on Military Affairs, should such be the pleasure of the House. The bill, rightly understood, however, was not subject to the criticisms which the gentleman at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs supposed, as Mr. W. made some observations to prove. Mr. W. said, he was glad to find that the principle of the bill met with the approbation of the chairman of the military committee. But, should that committee undertake to establish a monthly allowance to officers in lieu of all other compensation, Mr. W. said they would find greater difficulty in their way than the gentleman from Massachusetts seemed to suppose. He wished, sincerely, that it could be done in regard to every officer in the employ of the Government, &c.

Mr. SEMMES, of Maryland, wished to amend the motion for commitment, so as to instruct the military committee to report a provision that no allowance should be made to any officer for forage, except for horses actually kept for service. We had heard much of constructive travelling, to which he had always been opposed: he was equally opposed to constructive horses. There had been much abuse [he said] in reference to this matter. Horses had been kept at farm work, &c. and certified to be kept for the use of officers. In saying this, he intended no reflection on the motives of officers, for no man more respected the high character of the officers of our army than he did; but the law required to be made more clear and specific.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, thought it would be inexpedient, as this bill was to be referred generally to the Committee on Military Affairs, to tie up their hands. If that committee should not report a provision, such as to meet the gentleman's views, it would be competent for him, when the subject should be again before the House, to move an amendment.

Mr. DRAYTON suggested that what the gentleman from Maryland proposed to instruct the committee to report, was exactly what is now required by the law.

Mr. SEMMES, on this suggestion, withdrew his proposed amendment; and

The recommitment of the bill to the military committee was agreed to.

TUESDAY JANUARY 5, 1830.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th ultimo, concerning a distribution of the public lands among the several States.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN, on the same day, to amend the same.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said, that, but for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN] he should have claimed no share of the indulgence of the House on this occasion. That amendment [he said] involved the rights and interests of the new States, one of which he had the honor to represent, in part, in no small degree—at least, according to the exposition of its friends—consequently, he felt it a duty incumbent on him to repel some of the remarks which had been made upon the subject.

Mr. C. said, he did not wish to be understood as being ready to assent to the general proposition embraced in the resolution, as originally offered by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HUNT.] He would not undertake, at this time, to say what might be his vote upon that proposition when the proper time for giving it might arrive, but he certainly now considered it objectionable. It seemed to him that the measure contemplated was entirely premature. Though Congress might now deliberate and act upon the question, by passing such a law as was proposed, of what avail would it be? It was agreed on all hands that it could now have no effect, nor would it have any for several years to come. In the mean time, for several successive sessions, the measure might be discussed, and changed and modified again and again, or even repealed, before it went into operation; which, it was agreed, could not happen before the extinguishment of the public debt. Mr. C. said, he believed it was an acknowledged axiom in political economy, that too much or unnecessary legislation was always improper; that it was always a sufficient objection to any measure which might be proposed, when its inutilty could be demonstrated. If it be allowable to adopt the measure now proposed, we might, with equal propriety, be continually legislating in advance, and upon contingencies. Upon the same principle, we might begin to legislate upon the subject of apportionment in this House, four or five years before the proper period arrived; though any act which could be passed upon the subject would, for four or five successive sessions, be open to consideration, alteration, or repeal. He would ask whether this would not be an indiscreet consumption of the public time, and an unwarrantable expenditure of the public money. He thought it would, and, under such impressions, he was not prepared to give his assent to the proposition, in any form.

But [said Mr. C.] the amendment is much more objectionable. It assumes the fact, as explained by its friends, that many and large donations have been made to the Western States, and calls on us to perform the ungracious and unenviable task of now raising an account, a charge against them for their value. Sir, [said Mr. C.] I will leave to other gentlemen to determine, if the fact be as supposed, how far it is consistent with the generous spirit in which gifts are presumed to be made, to demand or claim an equivalent in this manner. But [he said] the assumption of facts on which the amendment was predicated, he by no means admitted. On the contrary, he felt authorized to controvert them. He believed that it would be found, on examination of the various grants alluded to, that every one of them had been upon some consideration, supposed to be adequate, and upon terms and conditions. As to the sixteenth sections of every township reserved for the support of schools, they were part of the original consideration of purchase offered by the Government, in "an ordinance for ascertaining the mode of disposing of lands in the Western Territory," passed as long ago as the 20th May, 1785. The like reservation, had, he believed, been made in every subsequent law which had been passed for the disposal of the public domain, from that time down to the present. It was part of the consideration and inducement held out to the adventurous pioneers, that, if they would buy thirty-five sections of a township, they should have the remaining one to assist in the education of their offspring. They cannot be said to be donations, then, but are part of the original contract between the Government and the purchasers.

Mr. C. said, there had been other grants for different purposes; some for roads, some for canals, and some for seminaries of learning. It would be found, however, that all these grants were for the advancement of some great improvement, of a character national rather than local, or for some advantage, or benefit, which amounted to an equivalent. Grants had been made to Ohio, to Indiana, to Illinois, and more recently to Alabama. In all instances, the Government still retained lands, the value of which would be greatly enhanced by the improvement; and in many, perhaps half the cases, every alternate section through which the road or canal was to run, was reserved from grant or sale, thereby increasing the value twofold. He believed in every case of a grant for a road or canal, one condition was an exemption of the property of the United States and persons in their employment from toll; and another pretty general feature in them was a rigid accountability on the part of the State receiving for the application of proceeds or funds arising to the particular object contemplated. But independent of this, every road and every canal, for which an appropriation had been made, improved facilities of commercial intercourse, as well as of defending the country in time of war. One of those grants contemplated the construction of a road from the Atlantic coast to the Ohio river; others contemplated canals, or roads establishing communications between the Northern lakes and some of the principal rivers of the Western States; and still another class were made for the removal of obstructions to the navigation of our rivers, so as to admit of uninterrupted navigation at all seasons far into the interior. Mr. C. asked, could it be pretended that any of these grants were for the exclusive benefit of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, or Alabama? He thought it could not with propriety; but contended, on the contrary, that the State to which any of those grants were made, was constituted a sort of trustee or agent, to superintend the accomplishment of improvements, in which her sister States were often equally, and sometimes more deeply, interested than herself. The experience of the last war has shown the want and the value of such facilities of intercourse between remote parts of the country; and had, probably, induced the making of some of these appropriations.
